If He Falls...
Who Pays the Bill??

By David C. Greeff

A bill designed to protect Vermont ski areas from assuming liability for a skier while traveling downhill was passed unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday, January 18. However, the bill failed to outline any specifics and, under pressure from the insurance companies, the ski industry objected to its final proposals, forcing it back into committee for reevaluation. At this juncture, the committee has yet to reach a compromise solution satisfactory to all concerned.

The controversy is centered around the case of James Sunday, a Burlington resident, who while skiing one afternoon at the Stratton ski area in Stratton, Vermont, fell, and was paralysed from the neck down for life. Sunday alleged that his injury was caused by a twig irresponsibly left on the trail by Stratton, and sued for one and one quarter million dollars in damages. The jury awarded Mr. Sunday $250,000 more than he asked.

In the decision Chittenden County Federal Judge Wyn Underwood stated: "Ski areas should not hide behind the doctrine that people who ski accept the dangers inherent in the sport." He continued by stressing that due to technological improvements, ski areas have a better opportunity to clear, and therefore increase the safety of their trails.

This decision firmly repudiated case law precedent established in the Wright vs. Mt. Mansfield case of 1951. In that case, Florine Wright claimed she broke her leg because she hit a stump which was negligently allowed to remain in the middle of the trail. Denying her suit, Federal District Judge Ernest Gibson, father of David Gibson, R(Windham), said:

"The Plaintiff, in hitting the snow covered stump, was merely accepting a danger which inheres to the sport of skiing. To hold that the terrain of a ski trail down a mountain in weather and snow conditions that constantly change its appearance and slipperiness should be kept level and smooth, free from hole or

The Bus: A Doomed Alternative?

By Peter MacAusland

The UVM Bus shuttle, which began trial runs just last week, may not continue through the semester and even may stop as early as next week, according to Bill Sisson of the Chittenden County Transportation Authority (CCTA), which is sponsoring the program.

The bus shuttle, which runs through the major segments of the UVM campus, is designed to transport students and other members of the University community around the campus for fifteen cents per ride. A semester pass is available for fifteen dollars which entitles the holder unlimited use of the shuttle plus limited use of the other CCTA bus lines.

The major problem confronting the bus shuttle is that very few people are aware of its existence. As of last Monday approximately 150 passes had been purchased. The CCTA, which is financing the project, hopes to sell up to 2,000 passes which would guarantee the shuttle's continued existence. Bill Sisson is "very pleased" with the progress thus far but is taking a wait and see attitude as to the future of the shuttle.

At present, two thirty-seven passenger buses are serving as shuttles, running approximately every fifteen minutes throughout the day, Monday through Friday. If the shuttle catches on, service will increase and regular bus stops will be established.

Terry Switzer, who lives in Chittenden Hall and has classes every day in Southwick, rides the shuttle an average of three times a day. "It's the best thing they've come up with yet," she said riding the shuttle late Monday afternoon. "I'll be getting a semester's pass if the bus continues." She has ridden the shuttle at least a dozen times so far. Her traveling friend, Janis Throckmorton, doesn't use the shuttle as often, about five times weekly, because she lives in Harris Hall, which is close walking distance to her classes at Southwick. She pays for each individual ride, adding, "It's really reasonable, especially when I get out of classes (on main campus) when its dark." Debi Ennis, a junior who lives just off campus between UVM and downtown, has different things to say. "I think I can walk anywhere on campus in less than fifteen minutes and so by the time I wait ten minutes for the shuttle, it doesn't make sense for me to take it. If I lived far enough off campus, then I would take the city buses and the shuttle. That would make sense."

Eric Ennis (no relation to Debi Ennis), who lives in Wing Hall, rides the shuttle ab twice a day. "If it's goo weather, I'd like to walk," explained Eric. He has no set pattern in riding the shuttle.

Student Association officers Linda Purdy and Geoff Liggett are hoping that the shuttle will take hold, yet have their doubts. Liggett explained, "I think they (CCTA) popped it on UVM too early. Nobody had time to gear up to help them out. I'm not sure it's going to make it. I think it could be a good service though." Purdy suggested a "tremendous public relations campaign" and said it could be a better service especially for students living near the campus, provided the CCTA expands the shuttle route.

One person who rides the shuttle all day long is Michael Prue, one of the shuttle bus drivers. When asked what he thought of driving the figure-eight loop, he replied, "complete boredom" though he added that he enjoyed talking with the students. He, too, hopes the shuttle continues since those who have been using it have expressed to him that they have really enjoyed the convenience.

The shuttle bus rumbles down its appointed route.

...But It May Relieve Parking Situation

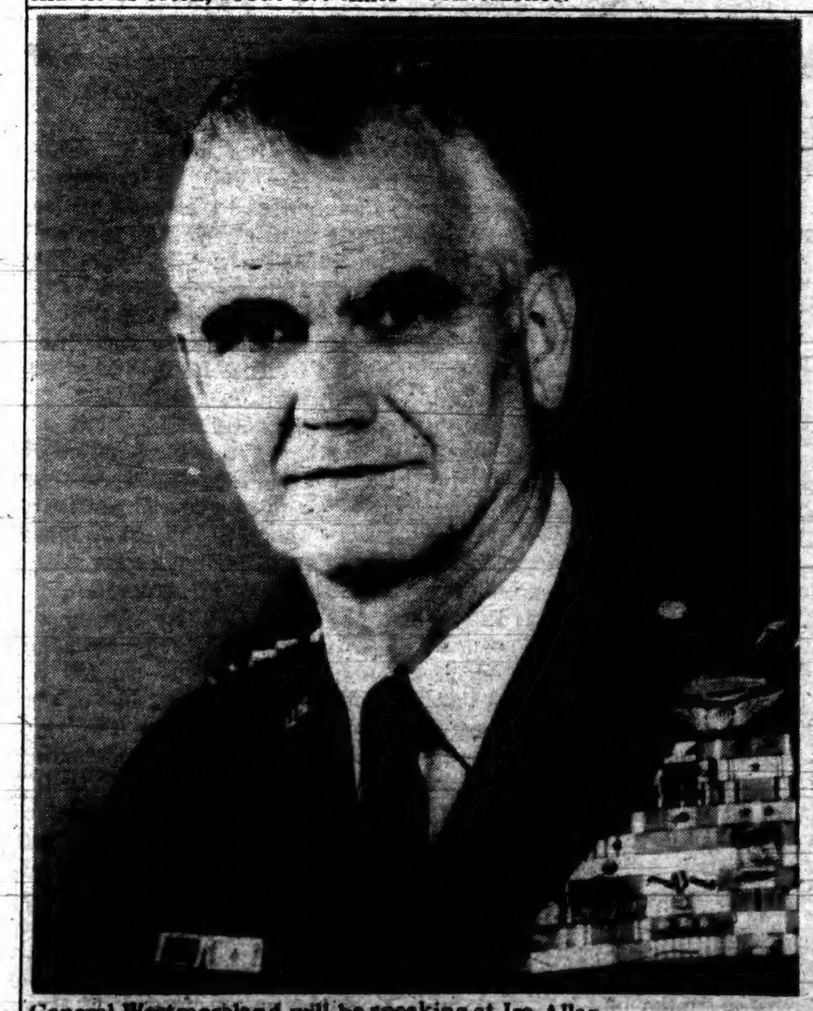
By Curtis Haynes

Tired of tromping through snow and dodging cars? As of January 18, the Chittenden County Transportation Authority (CCTA) has begun a bus loop around the UVM campus. Every ten minutes, one of three buses will be at stops along the figure-8 circuit, and buses will stop on campus anywhere a rider flags down the driver. The campus buses start and finish at Gutterson Field House, and also connect with bus routes throughout Chittenden County.



Campus buses run five days a week from 7:30 to midnight. A single ride costs 15 cents and a semester pass, which includes travel on any CCTA bus, is $15; however, the semester pass is good only for off-peak hours, 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. to midnight. For information on semester passes, call 864-0212.

CCTA anticipates that 90% of the riders will be on-campus students who can use the buses to get to and from classes. Faculty and staff will find the buses helpful in getting around the campus; and hospital personnel also are expected to use the buses too. The CCTA recently purchased five new 45-seat buses to inaugurate this new route. The buses will help utilize off-campus parking and hopefully, people will opt for taking the bus from peripheral parking areas such as at Gutterson.

A SOLUTION TO THE PARKING PROBLEM?

The institution of a campus bus service follows the recommendations made in November 1976 by the University Parking Commission on Peripheral Parking. The Commission concluded that "the peripheral plan will meet the immediate and long range parking needs of the University with the greatest flexibility, least cost, and greatest equity. By decentralizing parking to the periphery, valuable central campus space remains open, traffic is diminished, intra-campus transportation is established, and costs for construction, maintenance, and operation are minimized. Additional potential benefits of a peripheral system include

Controversial U.S. Commander in Vietnam Will Lecture At UVM

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

News Analysis

General William C. Westmoreland's visit to UVM next week will be one marked by controversy surrounding his past actions as Commanding General of the U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam during the years 1964-1968.

An ad-hoc, anti-Westmoreland group, tentatively calling themselves the "Westmoreland Committee," is spearheading a campaign to hold a Vietnam "Education Day" and also a peaceful demonstration, to take place outside of Ira Allen Chapel directly before Westmoreland speaks.

The Jan. 30 Education Day, according to group spokesman Dana Baron, is to keep the memory of the Vietnam War alive and to "prevent another U.S. intervention in some other country's civil war."

In a recent interview Baron said, "The demonstration will not be directed at Westmoreland personally, but at the system that led us into Vietnam and Chile, and almost led us into Angola." The group, which consists of about 30 members, met on Jan. 19 to organize themselves and plan out a strategy to gain awareness and support for their cause.

Part of that strategy will include circulating flyers around campus. One flyer which has already appeared on a number of bulletin boards stated very specifically some of the group's complaints about Westmoreland. Among those complaints:

–Westmoreland's "search and destroy tactics."

–Body counts as a measure of the war's progress.

–The fact that he will try to gain support for future wars and "explain away" Vietnam.

–His fee, $3000.

Debate over Westmoreland's visit originated last Nov. 17 when members of the Sociology Department introduced a resolution into a Faculty-Senate meeting stating: "As persons who were citizens in the 60's, we recognize that General Westmoreland became a symbol, perhaps the symbol, of the war and its misconduct."

The department's resolution to block his visit was passed by its members 12-3, but defeated overwhelmingly at the Senate meeting 50-9.

During the Senate meeting, the emotionally heated debate raised questions about freedom of speech and most faculty members present were adament about which side of the argument they were on.

Sociology Department Chairman James Loewen said Westmoreland's visit is "somewhat analogous to having Eichmann speak to us on Jewish problems."

Economics Professor Timothy Bates added that Westmoreland "is a technician – he is basically concerned with killing people in a cost-efficient fashion."

Most of the points brought out, however, supported

Who Is William Westmoreland?

By Robert Moore

Retired General William Westmoreland, former Commander of U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam, will lecture on "Lessons of Vietnam" at Ira Allen chapel at 8 p.m. on January 31. Westmoreland will be the first speaker in the Vermont Seminars Program "U.S. Power and the Third World."

Born in Spartanburg County, South Carolina, on March 26, 1914, Westmoreland attended schools in South Carolina and finally the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. After graduating in 1936, he successfully commanded troops in North Africa and Europe during World War II. Westmoreland was promoted to Brigadier General in 1952 while leading forces during the Korean War. Shortly thereafter he attended the Advanced Management Program of the Harvard Business School and was named Secretary of the Army General Staff in 1955. As the youngest major general in the Army, Westmoreland assumed command of the 101st Airborne Division, more commonly known as the "Screaming Eagles." Following a short three year stint as Superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, he became commanding General of both the 18th Airborne Corps and what was labelled the Army's Strategic Ready Force.

In January of 1964, Westmoreland arrived in Vietnam and within a few months was promoted to full general. At the same time President Johnson appointed him Commander of U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam, and Military Advisor to the Republic of Vietnam. It was due to his prominent position in the controversial Vietnam War that Westmoreland himself became, and still is, a controversial and well-known figure. A few months after the Viet Cong's successful 1968 Tet Offensive, President Johnson announced that on July 3, 1968, Westmoreland would be sworn in as the Chief of Staff, the highest position in the Army. He retired in 1972 upon completion of the four-year term, which is set by law. This ended his thirty-six years of military service during which he received nineteen U.S. military decorations.

Recently, Westmoreland was elected to the board of directors of Tyco Laboratories Inc., an electronics and industrial complex with headquarters in Exter, New Hampshire. He is also current director of Aladdin Industries of Nashville, Aladdin Lts. of London, the United Services Life Insurance Company of Washington, D.C. and the Pantasote Company of Stanford, Connecticut.

No liability bill, no Vermont skiing?

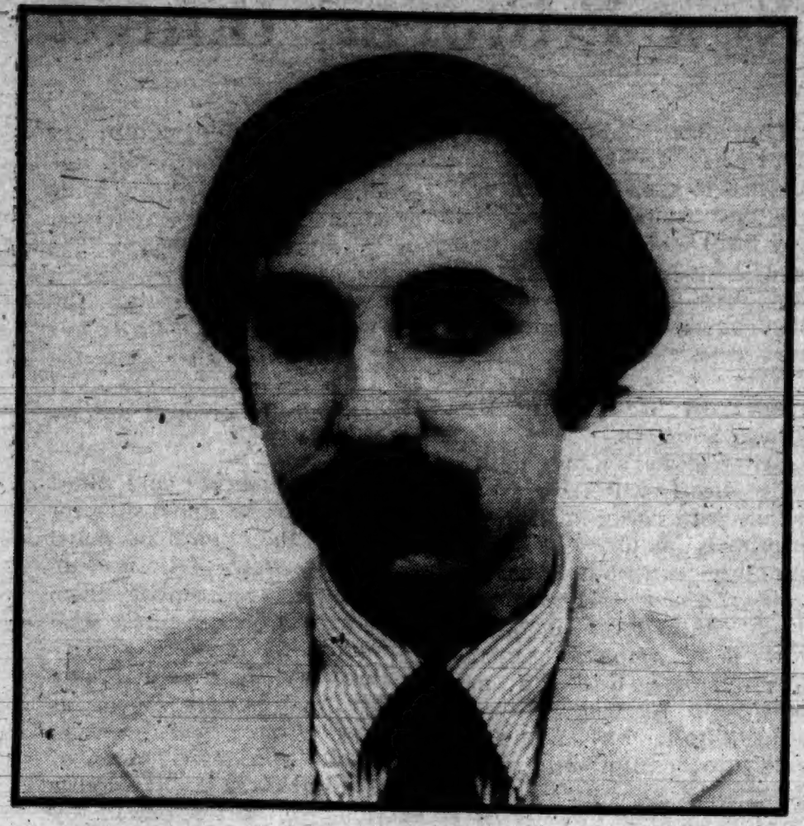
depression, would be to demand the impossible.

The bill just approved by the judiciary committee essentially concurs with Judge Gibson's opinion. It states specifically that any person who participates in any sport must accept risk "as a matter of law." There will be no opportunity to sue for damages if injury is due to obvious and necessary conditions of that sport.

The Sunday decision immediately triggered trepidation among ski area operators, as they were threatened with cancellation of their insurance coverage if a bill was not passed in the legislature limiting their liability. L. H. Collier, vice president of American International Insurance Group Co., the parent company of American Home Insurance which insures nineteen Vermont ski areas, said "no official deadline has been set." The intention is to give the legislature adequate time to deal with the measure. This quote, received last Wednesday outside the hearing on liability of the House Judiciary Committee, is more lenient than an earlier company statement which cited the date February 1 as adequate time. Both American Home and Lloyd's of London, the only other company servicing Vermont ski areas, maintain the option to cancel their policies within ten days.

While most members of the legislature support action in favor of the ski area operator, they are concerned that a bill offering blanket exclusion from liability would incite owners to be negligent of their safety responsibilities. A majority would admit that certain environmental hazards are inherent to the sport and cannot be controlled. The main concern is about the possibility of a skier colliding with an improperly marked snow making machine or the like, who has no legal recourse because owners are protected by an excessive law.



In their lobbying efforts for passage of a limited liability law, they are quick to point out that Maine and New Hampshire, among others, have already passed similar bills.

There is little doubt that if Vermont ski industry were forced to shut down, it would have gravely detrimental consequences for an economy so largely dependent upon tourism. One owner said that "9 percent of the state's jobs are directly related to skiing and many more when you consider the jobs created because hotels and other businesses are patronized by visiting skiers."

Further, the owners maintain that even if they could possibly convince insurance companies to insure them at all, premiums would be so high as to force lift tickets well over $20 per day.

Insurance costs for most mountains are somewhere between 10 and 14 percent of operating costs. For some of the larger areas like Stratton, this can amount to almost one half a million dollars per year. Presently, any skier might sue for even the most minimal damage. The total potential liability is inestimable. Up until now, rates have not risen. But without the presence of a new liability law, prices will skyrocket in the future.

VPIRG Selects Former Staffer as New Director

The Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) recently announced the selection of former staff person Barry Steinhardt as its new executive director. VPIRG board President David White said that Mr. Steinhardt, who is currently completing his law degree at Northeastern University Law School, will fill the position March 1, 1978, vacated by Whitey Bluestein who recently resigned for personal health reasons.

Steinhardt, who as a member of the VPIRG research staff from 1972-75, is the author of VPIRG reports on small claims court and the Consumer Fraud Division of the Attorney General's Office. He also authored The VPIRG Guide to Small Claims Court and A Citizen's Guide to the Mobile Homeowner's Bill of Rights.

"We are very pleased to have Barry rejoin the staff," said Board President White. "We feel his appointment will assure continuity of leadership," he added.

Both Steinhardt and White emphasized that VPIRG will continue its long-standing work in the areas of environment, health and open government. White added however, "I expect that VPIRG will begin to concentrate more and more on issues that have a direct impact on people's pocket books." Steinhardt noted, "In particular, I'm interested in the way that the Vermont state government taxes its citizens and spends state monies."

Steinhardt also said that he expects to be spending much of his time expanding VPIRG's membership. "VPIRG has been and will continue to be aggressive advocate for Vermont's consumers. In the coming months, I hope to get more citizens involved in our efforts," Steinhardt said.

Mr. Steinhardt also stressed that there would be a shift in VPIRG emphasis from its customary involvement in environment and health issues to what he referred to as "pocketbook economic issues" such as tax reform, pension funds and general economic development.

Committee Narrows Student Trustee Candidates To Ten

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

The Student Trustee Selection Committee narrowed the number of applicants to ten last weekend and a decision is forthcoming Feb. 1 as to whom the two new trustees will be.

Of the two selected, one person will serve for a two year term and the other for one year. The field of 18 applicants was trimmed down by the committee last Saturday through extensive review of the applications and recommendations.

The ten remaining applicants have been undergoing personal interviews this week that are expected to be completed on Saturday. Those persons still in the running are: J. Thomas Carroll, Galen A. Crandall III, Dana DelGizzi, Jerome Fischer, Craig Hawkins, Lewis Lerman, Andrea Pearl, Helen Pelzman, Jay Piccirillo, and Dale Rocheleau.

Committee member Scott Sartorius commented on the selection process thus far: "We spent Thursday, Friday, and Saturday last week reading the applications and another three hours Saturday afternoon making the initial cuts.

"The remaining ten will each be interviewed by the entire committee for about 45 minutes and our final deliberations will probably take place on Sunday. There's been a lot of discussion on every applicant and the decisions haven't come easy," he added.

The student trustees, once selected, will take office immediately as full-voting members on the board. The bill enabling students to sit on the board as trustees was signed by Gov. Snelling last Fall.

Starting next year, each student trustee will serve a two year term meaning only freshmen and sophomores can apply. An upperclassman must attend UVM graduate school to be eligible. Only one will be selected each year, instead of the two chosen this year — something which was done to start a "stagger" effect in future selections.

CYNIC Elects New Editorial Board

The Cynic editorial board elections, an annual event designed to keep Cynic editorial positions available to all full time UVM undergraduates, were held last semester in late November. The results showed only two editors returning from last semester's board, and a variety of sophomores and freshmen occupying key editorial positions.

Last semester's Copy Editor, David Greeff, will serve as the Cynic's 96th editor-in-chief. An off-campus junior, Greeff has previously contributed feature stories and news analyses to the Cynic. "As editor I intend to place more emphasis on the news section than my predecessor. We feel the Cynic looks good, but lacks an abundance of informative copy. We've got a good staff and are certainly looking forward to a good year," said Greeff before leaving for the semester break.

Russell Flannery will assume the position of Executive Editor at the Cynic throughout 1978. The only returning editor other than Greeff, Flannery will deal specifically with the Cynic's past problems of poor copy and incomplete news reporting.

In an unusual move, last semester's board separated the duties of the management and layout staffs. In the past, management has included all technical aspects of the paper. Alex Walker, a leading ad designer at the Cynic last semester, will replace Kimberly Honza as the paper's Managing Editor. Walker will work closely with the new layout editor, Ned Andrews, at continuing the production of the Cynic, while developing a new layout format by the end of this semester. The addition of Andrews, a former Managing Editor at the award-winning Andover Philippian, will also ease the production duties of non-technically inclined literary editors.

Two sophomores and three freshmen will be responsible for organizing the Cynic's individual sections. News Editor, Rob Moore, a sophomore from Rutland, Vermont, will coordinate the increased activity in the news department. Randy McMullen's replacement as Features Editor will be Alan Marshall, Cynic staff veteran of two semesters. The sports section will be co-edited by freshmen Rich Chalmers and Steve Larose. While reported frequently during the fall semester, Larose gained additional sports writing experience at The Lamoille County Weekly. The elections were concluded as Vaune Davis, an active staff member last semester, was selected as this semester's Arts and Entertainment Editor.

Although the editorial board positions have been filled, the 1978 Cynic staff invites students interested in journalism to spend some time getting involved with the paper. We are located in the lower section of the Billings Center. Feel free to stop by any time.

Admissions Accepts 270 Spring Applicants

270 new students, approximately half of the over 550 applicants, are now enrolled at the University of Vermont for the spring semester, Richard Steele, director of Admissions, said Monday.

Steele was very pleased that the Admissions office had come so close to its estimated target number of 283 new students. He pointed out that the number of first semester freshmen is slightly lower than expected but was compensated for by the number of transferring second semester freshmen. There are only twenty-six first semester freshmen compared to about fifty second semester freshmen. Because the Admissions office discourages college seniors from transferring to UVM, this leaves the bulk of the new student population to be made up of sophomore and junior transfers. Of the 289 new students the number of Vermonters was slightly higher than the number from out-of-state, 142 versus 128.

Asked how Admissions arrived at a target figure for new students for the spring semester, Steele said it was based on past University averages. The normal percentage of attrition per class was computed by the Institutional Studies program of the University. The average attrition percentages are then applied to the number of students presently enrolled in each class and these figures are added to arrive at the target figure.

Steele pointed out that due to fewer applications, it is easier for a candidate to gain admission to the University for the spring semester than for the fall. He admitted the irony of the fact that an applicant's chances for admission depend upon which field of study he plans to pursue. Fields such as Nursing, Allied Health and Business are almost impossible to get into in the spring he added. Admissions works closely with all departments so as to prevent overcrowding and to concentrate on applicants that can be incorporated into departments with low numbers of students.

Questioned as to whether he felt pressure to meet any in-state, out-of-state student ratios for reasons such as budgetary income, Steele said he did not and that it was something the "trustees clearly would not approve." Admissions policy is to first accept all qualified Vermont applicants and then distribute whatever positions remain to the most qualified out-of-staters. Qualified Vermonters are rarely put on waiting lists he added.

Minimum Wage Increase Causes A Financial Squeeze at SAGA

An Unexpected Budget Increase Is Responsible for Serice Cutbacks

By Russell Flannery

The passage of a bill increasing the minimum wage by Congress last summer may have been designed to help lower income families cope with inflation, but it has also left colleges and universities with a mid-fiscal year problem of a mandatory wage hike to non-salaried, full-time employees.

On the UVM campus, SAGA, an employer of roughly 300 part-time students and 105 full-time workers, was faced with two bleak alternatives: a mid-year price hike in the cost of the Base Plan, or a service cutback.

The price of raising the hourly pay of SAGA's full-time employees up to the new minimum wage and of granting wage increases to those veteran employees who had previously earned a rate equal to that of the new minimum wage was $54,000, according to Steve Peterson, who as director of the Department of Residential Life, serves as the link between SAGA and the UVM student body. Had this cost been shared among the 4,050 students utilizing the SAGA plan, the result would have been a $13.50 increase per person this semester.

Opposed to a mid-semester price increase, SAGA opted for a moderate service cutback amounting to a savings of $54,000 in operating expenses. Peterson explained to the Cynic that "It's very hard to justify to students any increases, even when based on inflation, which is a very real factor. To have suggested last spring that we should increase board rates even more (than an inflationary raise) because we thought there might be a change in the minimum wage might have been as irresponsible as some of the solutions we now have to face in this short order."

"The solutions we now have to face are the following:

—Marsh Dining Hall is now closed as a dining facility.

—Harris/Millis Dining Hall is no longer serving breakfast.

—Several sandwiches will cost 5 to 10 cents more at on-campus snack bars.

—Prices at non-coupon catering events have increased 4%.

The elimination of breakfast at Harris/Millis was simply a matter of common sense. The 1,650 students of Redstone Campus have one cafeteria, Simpson Dining Hall, available for breakfast. Although less students reside on East Campus, they have had the luxury of two breakfast services. The number of students served at these two cafeterias combined is still less than the number of students who eat breakfast at Simpson on Redstone. Peterson noted that from a savings point, "We probably should have made the decision to have breakfast in only one of those facilities a long time ago. We preserved this because it's a nice service."

By the fact it effects only non-coupon catered events, the price increase for catering is obviously not designed to effect any student organization. Concerning the issue of higher sandwich prices, this writer interviewed seven patrons of the "Den" before he found one who was aware of a price difference from last semester.

The most controversial adjustment caused by the new minimum wage was the closing of Marsh Dining Hall. The fact that only a nightly average of 200 students were being served dinner at Marsh was heavily weighed in the decision to close the facility. In order to accommodate the MAT residents who would be served in the Harris/Millis cafeteria, 120 seats were added to the dining room, Production Supervisor Doug Kaiser told the Cynic.

A Harris/Millis freshman, Mary Beth Creed, reflected a general feeling of discontent with the adjustments on East Campus and said she didn't notice any additional seating. "It's really packed at dinner now. They said that they were going to make extra room — there's maybe one extra table. And it was crowded before, even when MAT was open. Harris/Millis has always been crowded for dinner because the kids that have basketball practice always come over at 6:30, so it's really packed. They usually walk around, and you feel like you have to give them your seat..." Creed said.

Barth Hamberg, a MAT resident, said "You go in there (Harris/Millis) and there's no place to sit. You can't eat with your friends."

Commenting on the elimination of breakfast at Harris/Millis, one Millis resident complained "I don't like it at all. I have all eight o'clock classes in the morning and I usually get up for breakfast and then go to the gym. This (new) way, I don't go (to breakfast) anymore — I just starve."

SAGA, however, has apparently tried to please everyone in an obviously "no win" situation. For those who are seeking an alternative to the overcrowded conditions at Harris/Millis, Walter Fulmer, the manager of the Living/Learning Dining Hall, told the Cynic that "the change hasn't effected Living/Learning" and that he is actually "serving less people" now than last semester.

While this semester's adjustments have generally effected only East Campus residents, SAGA's financial woes will become an inescapable fact to all on-campus students next semester. The price tag of September's Base Plan will bear an increase reflecting not only this year's wage increase hike to $2.65, but also next January's rise to $2.90, not to mention the inflationary effect on the cost of goods. "I think it's going to be a substantial jump," said an unoptimistic Steve Peterson. "The last couple of years we've been very tight in our negotiations with the food service, and we've held the board increase to a minimum. They've tightened their screws and done a good job, but there's no more internal tightening that can be done."

"It's really packed at dinner now. They said that they were going to make extra room - there's maybe one extra table. And it was crowded before . . ."

Leahy Criticized

Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vt) has aroused the vocal opposition of Washington's city politicians and businessmen who say he holds the Capital's pursestrings too tightly.

Leahy said, "It wouldn't be fair to the cities to come down from the little towns and tell them how to run things." But that is what District of Columbia officials claim Leahy has been doing in a spending debate that has left Washington without its fiscal 1979 budget and without a convention center that civic leaders say is needed.

Leahy claims the city is spending money needlessly. He cites a proposed $100 million convention center as a prime example. Leahy said, "It's a lousy idea," and also chided city officials for not pressing hard enough to collect parking fines and not collecting bills from patients at the city's public hospitals more efficiently.

Leahy has virtual veto power over the proposed convention center because he is Chairman of the Senate's District of Columbia Appropriations Subcommittee.

Although the District has limited home rule, Congress must still approvesits budget. By Senate tradition, committees rarely cross their chairman and the full Senate generally goes along with committee recommendations.

While the House has approved the center, the Senate defeated the appropriation measure by a wide margin.

Washington Mayor Walter Washington has accused Leahy of interfering with home rule and claims the center would broaden the city's tax base, provide jobs, attract thousands of conventioneers and revitalize a faltering downtown area.

The Mayor, the head of the City Council, both of the city's major newspapers, and most of the business leaders are the center's boosters.

City Council member Marion Barry Jr. said he couldn't understand the interference from what he called — "this little rinky dink Senator from a state like Vermont." Barry later apologized.

Leahy recently received an 80% rating by the Liberal Americans For Democratic Action for his overall voting record. But he also is one of the Senate's 12 most conservative members on fiscal issues, according to the National Taxpayers Union.

Leahy says the proposed convention center is an example of other bad spending habits by Washington.

Industrialist Kidnapped

Baron Edouard-Jean Empain, head of the French-Belgian Empain-Schneider Industrial Group of 150 companies, was kidnapped near the Arc de Triomphe Monday after his chauffeur-driven limousine was trapped in an ambush. The motive behind the kidnapping remained a mystery with no demands for ransom having been received as late as Tuesday night.

Miller Faces Committee Banking

The man President Carter has named to head The Federal Reserve Board, G. William Miller, told the Senate Banking Committee Tuesday he feels he's fully qualified for the job. Miller, who is Chairman of the Board of Textron Incorporated, said he feels he's qualified because of his success in dealing with the mechanics of the economy as head of a large corporation. Provided there are no unexpected developments at the confirmation hearings, it is expected that the Senate will confirm Miller by a wide margin.

The Chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator William Proxmire, told Miller he is seriously concerned over his lack of experience in banking or economics. He said this means Miller will have to spend several months of on-the-job training if he becomes Federal Reserve Chairman.

Miller would succeed Arthur Burns in the job which, in effect, makes him the nation's central banker.

Carter's Budget

President Carter submitted to Congress a $500 billion budget for 1979 that emphasized the limited to what Government can do to cure social problems. The $25 billion tax cut he proposed to Congress Saturday and the $60.6 billion deficit in his budget, Carter said, would keep the economy on a path of steady, but moderate growth of 5% a year. He hinted broadly that another tax cut would probably be needed in the autumn of 1980 when he may be running for a second term.

Satellite Crashes

A Russian military satellite, powered by a nuclear reactor, fell from orbit Tuesday and hurled toward a sparsely populated area of Canada. A Canadian Government spokesman said there is no reason for concern about any danger from radioactivity. The spokesman said it is not clear whether all of the satellite disintegrated and burned when it entered the atmosphere, about 850 miles north of the U.S. border. But President Carter's National Security Advisor, Zbigniew Brzezinski, said the satellite broke apart and burned when it hit the atmosphere. He said the chances are very slim that there was any resulting contamination. The satellite's nuclear reactor was used to generate power and was not a weapon.

The Russians launched the satellite last September. There had been about two weeks of intensive consultations between U.S. and Russian officials when it became apparent that the satellite was going to drop out of orbit. Soviet technicians had been unable to get it to work successfully despite repeated radio commands. The Russians had told the United States there was no danger of a nuclear explosion.

Brzezinski said the United States had been following the satellite and knew that it might fall from orbit. Government officials said experts thought Monday that it would come down near Brazil.

Marston Inquiry

The Justice Department wants some answers about circumstances surrounding the firing of the U.S. Attorney in Philadelphia, David Marston. The Department's internal investigations office turned over the results of its probe to Solicitor General Wade McCree Tuesday. A spokesman said the focus of the investigation is the time sequence surrounding Congressman Joshua Eilberg's call to President Carter asking for Marston's removal. And the Justice Department wants to know when Carter first learned Eilberg was under investigation by Marston's office.

President Carter said on January 12 that Representative Eilberg had asked him to expedite the replacement of Marston. A public furor arose with the disclosure that Eilberg had been under investigation by Marston's office in connection with the Federal funds obtained by Hahnemann Hospital for a $65 million construction project. Eilberg's law firm was representing the hospital.

Marston, who is 35 years old, led a number of successful corruption investigations in his 18 months in office, including two that resulted in the convictions of the Speaker of the Pennsylvania House and the chairman of the State Senate Appropriations Committee, both Philadelphia Democrats.

CIA Reorganization

President Carter signed an executive order Tuesday that will reorganize the Federal Government's intelligence operations and give CIA Director Stansfield Turner a greater role in overseeing intelligence activity. Turner will be given added authority over the preparation of intelligence budgets, such as those of the National Security Agency. The order also will place limits on covert intelligence activities to avoid abuses such as those uncovered by Congressional investigators.

A White House official said the executive order does not give Turner as much authority as he had hoped for. The official said the CIA Director wanted broader powers over the Pentagon's intelligence operations.

In recent weeks, unconfirmed reports from Washington have indicated that Carter has been trying to find a face-saving way of easing Turner out of the CIA.

Wilmington Ten

North Carolina Governor James Hunt reduced the prison terms of eight of the "Wilmington Ten" but refused them outright pardons because he said they received a fair trial.

Racial controversy has continually surrounded the case. Of the ten defendants, nine are black. They were convicted of firebombing a white-owned store in a black neighborhood during racial trouble in Wilmington almost seven years ago. But the State's three key witnesses have recanted their testimony and the tenth defendant, a white woman, was convicted on a lesser charge and is free on parole.

The Soviet news agency Tass stated Tuesday that Hunt's decision not to pardon the Wilmington Ten is another example of a racist U.S. official repressing the people.

New Warning On The Pill

Women who buy birth control pills will be warned not to smoke under a new rule from the Food and Drug Administration. It takes effect in April. The FDA says women who do smoke while on the pill are increasing their chances of suffering a heart attack or stroke by ten times over those who neither smoke or take the pill.

The FDA will require doctors and pharmacists to hand out Leaflets, containing the warning when they dispense the pills.

COMMENTARY

Point:

"... Westmoreland is not an ordinary person. He is a war criminal."

Let me begin with a personal note. When the Cynic asked me to write on this subject, I/tried to decline, feeling I'd already said plenty. I suggested two other professors for the task, both of them wanted to but both declined. One said it might cost him a promotion; the other feared for his job. I have too much regard for this university to think that would happen. But precisely because I respect and value UVM, I am saddened that it stooped to honor a man like Westmoreland.

According to some professors, honor isn't involved. Since October, when Sociology passed a resolution asking the Faculty Senate to disinvite Gen. Westmoreland, several faculty members have confronted me with the issue of free speech. "I know his ideas are outrageous," they say, "but a university should tolerate even outrageous ideas."

UVM should tolerate outrageous ideas. If Westmoreland wanted to speak here, and if some class or group wanted to hear him, that should be allowed. Of course, others should have the right to interrupt him with questions or dispute his statements (verbally, not physically).

But that's not what UVM did. We solicited him. Moreover, we invited him to open a series on American Power and the Third World. We're paying his travel expenses and a large honorarium. Through UVM publications and press releases we publicized his visit widely and positively. Finally, we have provided him a setting devoid of debate, scholarly give-and-take, or panel response. In short, the occasion is honorific, not intellectual.

Now, for an ordinary famous person, such treatment would seem disappointing and unchallenging, but unobjectionable. But Westmoreland is not an ordinary famous person. He is a war criminal.

Too strong? Consider the evidence:

—He advocated and got the massive bombing of North Vietnam, including civilian targets and entire non-industrial towns. Do you remember Guernica?

—He permitted widespread use of defoliant and anti-personnel gases, in violation of the 1925 Geneva Protocol.

—Even after Tet, he wanted to use American soldiers to invade North Vietnam and Laos; we weren't even at war with Laos.

—Under Westmoreland, American forces used anti-personnel devices such as napalm and special metallic bombs designed to maim rather than kill; this was because a dead Viet Cong was seen to cut enemy strength by only one, while a maimed VC eliminated three — the victim and two persons needed to care for him. This is a crime, according to the standards of warfare.

—Westmoreland particularly stressed the bodycount method of reporting "progress" in the war, which tacitly encouraged the blurring of civilian and military targets. This is a violation of the standards of warfare.

—Under Westmoreland, U.S. and South Korean personnel engaged in bizarre anti-civilian actions throughout South Vietnam, "destroying cities to save them," culminating in the My Lai massacre a few months before he was relieved.

We cannot excuse all this by claiming the general was only following orders. Westmoreland gave the orders. LBJ provided only broad policy guidelines, and then usually at Westmoreland's behest. As UVM Prof. Douglas Kinnard puts it, "There is some evidence that the American commander in Vietnam was not particularly interested in getting more detailed or systematic guidance from Washington."

Why should we concern ourselves about all this now, years later? Because the United States has gone only the first mile toward becoming a peaceful nation. Throughout the world we still supply unpopular dictatorships with the hardware and training for repression. We still have more farflung bases, spend more on war, than any other country on earth. In this context, we should treat Westmoreland as a pariah.

It is not a matter of free speech. Westmoreland is not "balanced" by Chomsky. Chomsky never committed war crimes. Equating Westmoreland and Chomsky is therefore not "neutral," but amounts to a political statement, a claim that Westmoreland is an acceptable member of society, a man to be invited, honored, paid. UVM, in making this statement, makes it more likely that we will commit the same mistakes, even crimes, again.

Westmoreland is coming. What now should be our response? Hard to say. Go, if you must. But do not applaud. And before he comes, learn all you can about the war. Westmoreland's recent speeches indicate he has learned nothing from the tragedy of Vietnam. We, you, the "best and the brightest" of the '70's, must do better. Else as a nation we're lost.

Jim Loewen is an Associate Professor of Sociology.

Counterpoint: "Freedom of speech is ... an indispensible weapon."

The reasons for objecting strongly to the Sociology Department's resolution requesting the withdrawal of UVM's invitation to General Westmoreland to address the Vermont Seminars on "U.S. Power and the Third World" were, at least to me, clear and simple: Any free society ought to be committed to freedom of speech and, most of all, a university should respect this right within the privileges of academic freedom which implies also the toleration and even encouragement of "unpopular" views or "repulsive" personalities (subjective attributes anyway).

Having been born and reared in Europe during the times of Nazi and Communist ascendency I am perhaps double allergic to claims — as justified and honest as they might be perceived by their proponents — that a person or standpoint should not be allowed a rostrum because if would be controversial or offend the sensitivities of some or even of most. The inherent danger is that the precedent of a first refusal has the tendency to snowball and pave the way to loss of freedom, as the experience of Nazism and Communism amply demonstrates. The pain of listening to "unpopular" views or "repulsive" personalities is infinitesimally small compared to the risks of tyranny. (In fact, one does not have to "honor" such a speech with one's presence, if one so desires, and peaceful protests are another precious democratic right).

Let me add that the visit of so many guest speakers with different views and values should induce us not only to look backward and at ourselves (incidentally, the political and not the military leaders bear primary responsibility), but also to reflect upon the consequences of the Vietnam War on those we left behind now and in the future: The U.S. extricated itself from that misconceived tragedy with wounds and shame but still as a free society; but did the millions of Vietnamese, Cambodians and others, after our departure, gain peace, freedom and the respect of human dignity now that the Communist "liberators" have triumphed? While we can learn but cannot change the past, let us not forget the present fate of the victims and try to prevent future massacres of fellow humans by exposing tyranny wherever it may exist. And freedom of speech is again an indispensable weapon.

Survey Finds College Freshmen Basically Conservative

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

What are the political views of an incoming class of freshmen? What does an incoming freshman value the most? Freedom? Money?

A survey recently completed by the American Council on Education showed freshman are more apt to shun the liberal label today than ever before in the survey's 12-year history. The survey, which polled more than 1.79 million current college freshmen, found that 56.5 percent of those freshmen consider themselves to be in the middle of the political spectrum.

In addition, when considering the fact that views which were once left-of-center — marijuana legalization and women's rights — are now "middle of the road," one can surmise that on the whole, political philosophy is slowly shifting to the left.

The survey touched upon a number of issues running the entire gamut of thought on contemporary issues. (A more complete listing of the results of the survey can be found in last Sunday's New York Times, Sect. 1, p. 30)

In 1968, during the latter part of those rebellious 60's everyone seems to be writing about these days, only 19.4 percent of the nation's freshmen favored the legalization of marijuana. In 1976, that figure jumped to 48.4 percent and today it is hovering well above half at 52.9 percent.

While these figures might lead one to believe that the average freshman is somewhat of a liberal, only 25.1 percent would allow themselves to be labelled as such with a mere 1.9 percent identifying themselves as "far left."

Financially, the survey pointed out that people are entering college more and more for that elusive dollar. The figures tend to indicate that freshmen no longer identify with the "radical" 60's, but can relate more easily with the 50's. College students are no longer heading off to communes to protest this country's bureaucratic, capitalistic society where the rich get richer and the poor have babies (to borrow a phrase), but rather are quick to desire to become a part of that society.

The survey showed that in 1971, 49.9 percent went to college with "the ability to make more money" as the key reason. That figure only edged up slightly in five years to 53.8 percent in 1976, but soared up to 62.1 percent last year.

Survey director Alexander Astin, a professor at UCLA, was quoted as saying, "Evidence supports the notion that students are becoming increasingly more materialistic."

With this in mind, one might point out that 15.6 percent would allow themselves to be labelled "conservative," but it should be noted that the survey did show the number of liberals still outweighs the conservatives by about 10 percentage points.

While one might jump to conclude that students are becoming evil, money-minded creatures of the business world, only 18.1 percent said they were interested in a career in business.

A heartening fact amidst all of the fact-laden pages of the study was that more students than ever, 42.6 percent, said an important reason for attending college was to "improve their reading-study skills."

Taking this latter fact and four more statistics, you present the educator with a dilemma: In 1967, 48.8 percent knew the freedoms guaranteed in the Bill of Rights, and last year, only 29.7 percent did. In the same ten year time period, the percentage of people who knew the difference between a stock and a bond dropped from 40.8 percent to 22.2 percent.

OOM BALL!

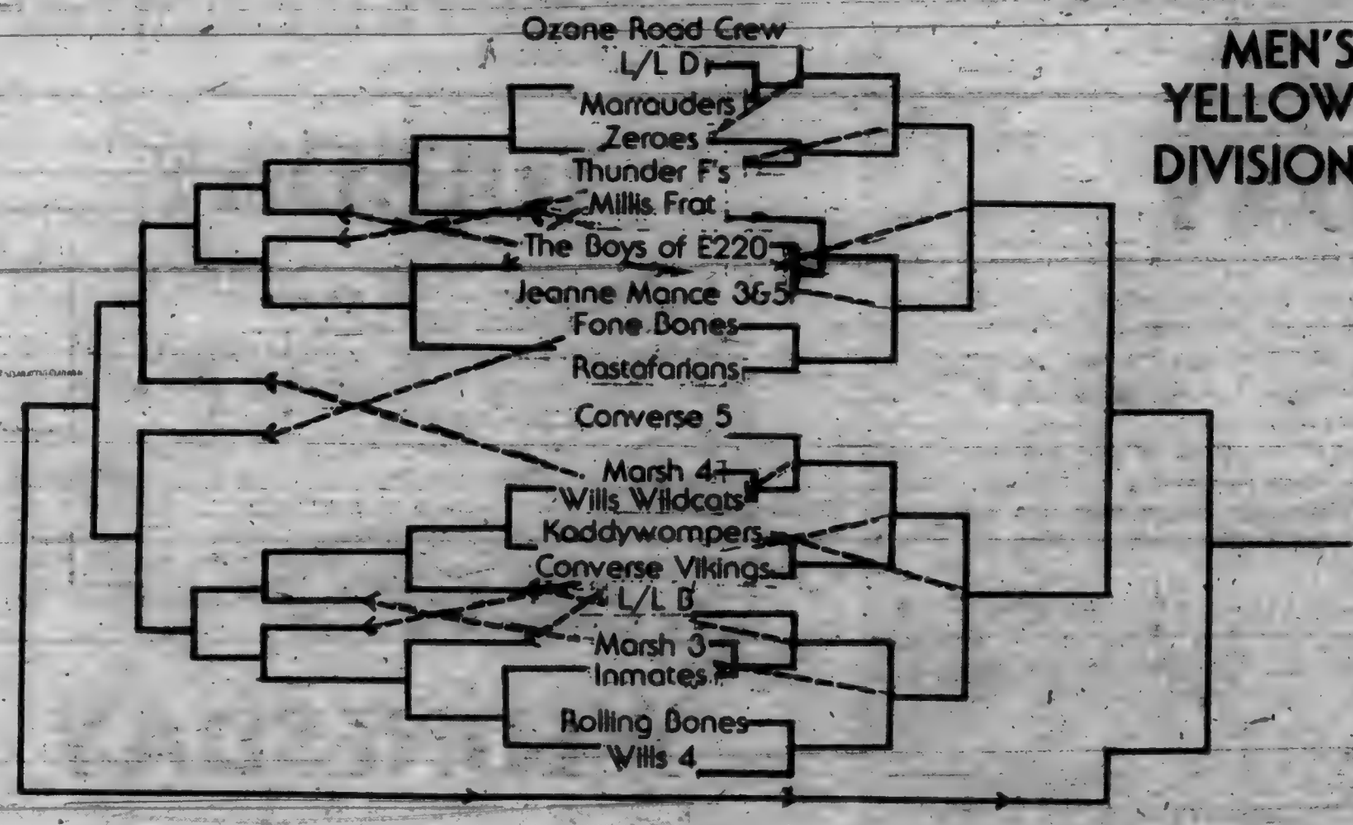
Broomball is similar to hockey in that you don't play on ice, use skates, hockey sticks or a hockey puck. The game is played on a court 150' by 50' on hard packed snow with nets at each end. There are six players on each team; they use brooms in place of hockey sticks and a small black ball in place of a puck. The object of the game is to put the ball into the net for which a team receives one point. The game time is made up of two 15 minute running halves with a five minute half time.

There are eighty-six teams playing this year, fifteen of which are in the Greek league, seventy-one of which are in the non-Greek leagues. It is because of the large number of teams that are in the non-Greek league that it was divided into both men's and women's green and yellow divisions.



This year's competition is double elimination which means that a team has to lose two games before they are eliminated from the competition. If you win, you follow the lines to the right of your team on the game flow chart. If you lose follow the line to the left of your team.

All game information is posted in Billings lobby. If you have any questions, call Student Activities, x2060 or John Martin or Peter Riegelman at Student Association x2053.

Two major snowfalls within three days transfomed all optimistic hopes into reality bringing most of New England to a halt but giving a big boost to Valley skiing.

Villagin' in the Valley

From the 'Fall Line', Camels Hump shines at a different angle than Burlington residents are able to see.

When both Farah Fawcett and portable music for skiers came into Mad River Valley last year, the locals thought they were being commercialized into another Stowe. But the small-time farming community has earned a certain mystique, attractive to outsiders, yet charmingly Vermontish. The area lying primarily in Waitsfield, fifteen miles below the Rt. 89 interchange, lands 'The Big Three,' as they are soon to be advertised, of Mad River Glen, Glen Ellen, and Sugarbush ski areas.

The aesthetic value of driving through this picturesque valley prescribes the fondest wishes with subtle moments of beautifying scenery. In the high season, with walled snow banks, the villages take on a Fairbanks geography with the ridge between Lincoln and Appalachian Gaps looming with windy trails.

The 'Dark Valley' of Mad River Glen, where the sun never shines, is commonly

Interview with T. Garry Buckley, Lieutenant Governor

Cynic: Most people are aware that the primary Constitutional duty of the Lieutenant Governor is to preside over the Senate when it's in session. What, if any, are the other responsibilities a Lieutenant Governor must assume?

Buckley: The Lieutenant Governor has two constitutional duties: one is to preside over the senate; the other is to become acting governor when the real governor is out of the state.

Over and above that, the Lieutenant Governor can do pretty much as he pleases. I have tried to be ombudsman to the general public. We get all kinds of crazy requests: anything from a woman who didn't receive two baby T-shirts from a New York concern which took her money, to a man who was involved in an accident while he was in Florida who is now a resident of Vermont. His transcript was taken here and sent to Florida but he couldn't afford to go and attend the hearing. As a result, we called his doctor in West Palm Beach and assured his attendance at the hearing. Eventually, we helped him receive a $2500 check in the mail.

This office is also very much involved in helping the handicapped find employment. We've sent out a newsletter attempting to make ourselves as available as possible for any problem the average citizen might have. Essentially, you can make whatever you want out of the job. Either you can become very active or you do next to nothing; it's up to the individual.

Cynic: You were once quoted as saying: "A landlord has the right to choose a tenant regardless of race or religion." Will you please elaborate on what exactly you meant by that statement?

Buckley: Yes. That's the Civil Rights Act which states Mom and Pop type landlords with up to five or six tenants can decide who they're going to have living in their house. They have worked hard all of their lives in a duplex situation and no one has a right to ring their doorbell and say: "I'm your next tenant." If a little bunch of Methodist old ladies decide they want to buy a house and live together and not let anybody else live there, that's legal; it's their house.

Cynic: Vermont skiers are seriously concerned over the recent and possible precedent setting court decision awarding James Sunday, a twenty-four year old novice skier, one and one half million dollars for an accident which occurred while skiing at Stratton. Presently, there's a bill in the legislature designed to limit the liability of ski areas. Will you tell us the present status of that bill and its prospects for passage?

Buckley: Well, they have a one liner bill which I'm sure will do the trick. What it says is that anybody who is engaged in any sport accepts the risks that go with it. You may sue, but the burden will be on you to demonstrate gross negligence on the part of the ski area, snowmobile park, or whatever. This brings us back to the Mount Mansfield case which set the law prior to the Sunday case. I'm sure the ski people, the insurance people, and the public can live with it because I don't think the public should be excluded from suit in all cases. If you're skiing downhill and you run into a snow-making pipe or something then there may be a question of gross negligence. I believe this one liner will effectively take care of the problem.

Cynic: How do you feel about the proposed Pyramid Mall in Williston?

Buckley: I think it's too bad. I would not want to see them municipally harrassed, but the only way to beat a developer is at his own game. Over the years what we should have been doing is purchasing development right outside of large communities, like Burlington from agricultural landowners so that we have some control over situations like this.

Pyramid Mall will have an adverse effect not only on Burlington but also on Barre and Montpelier. It really is not the type of development which makes Vermont as attractive as I think it ought to be.

Cynic: Presently, the University of Vermont has the highest out of state tuition of any state University in the United States. We only receive fifteen percent of our operating budget from the state, a considerably lower figure than most other similar institutions. Do you believe the University is getting a fair shake? If not, what can be done to improve the situation?

Buckley: You've done something already by choosing Lattie Coor as your President. He has an excellent rapport with the legislature. He has been able to get more funds than others might have.

One of our problems with higher education is that we have Lyndon, Johnson, Castleton and Randolph, in addition to the University of Vermont. How many colleges can you operate with a population that's only fifty or sixty thousand more than the entire city of Rochester. We have committed ourselves to these other schools and it's simply a matter of how far you can spread a buck.

Cynic: Last year the legislature failed to appropriate funds for a new gym at UVM. Why was this request denied?

Buckley: They went along with the library but not with the gym. At that time, they didn't want to approve the gym because nobody was sure about whether there would be a surplus or a deficit. One criticism was that the new facility would produce indoor tennis courts for the faculty.

I think when they gave up football a lot of sports enthusiasts backed away from the University. They since have produced outstanding hockey, basketball, and ski teams. I expect sooner or later they will get their gym.

Cynic: Now that the State has such a sizable surplus, one of the proposed ways for spending it is increased aid to higher education. How, if at all, might this affect UVM?

Buckley: The Governor has proposed to put a lot more money in the Vermont State Assistance Corporation. But UVM and the other schools have to compete for it. The funds are also spread to colleges outside the state. If a student goes to Dartmouth, there's no reason why he shouldn't be eligible for aid also. You should not be required to go to Lyndon, Castleton, or Johnson to get the aid. Vermont colleges have to compete to attract bright Vermonters to their schools if they want funds from the Vermont Assistance Corporation.

Cynic: You have been called "flamboyant" and "opportunistic," and it's been reported that the Governor is apparently upset by many of the statements you've made. What is the nature of your present relationship with the Governor?

Buckley: You have to remember there's only one governor and he's it. I've tried not to upstage him or interfere with what he's doing in any way. By the same token I've got to be myself. If I've got something on my mind, I like to express it because I think that people who live in this state have the right to know what their officials are thinking. If that makes me flamboyant, then I'll just have to live with it.

Cynic: Do you intent to run for reelection? And what does T. Garry Buckley's future look like?

Buckley: Well I try to live day to day. You're not supposed to announce this early in the game; if you do, the meter starts to run. I'll be very surprised if I don't decide to run. I like the job. I don't like to give the impression that I'm using this job to go somewhere else. As long as I hold it, I feel obligated to do everything I can to meet its responsibilities.

BONDAGE CORNER

by Rudolph Church & Zane Gruder

Arnold Shwanzbogger is a graduate of Princeton and a foremost researcher in the field of sheep husbandry. He is also chief assisant to doctor E.Z. White of Brooklyn College, whose notoriety in the field of sexology has made him a virtual folk hero among the sexually deviated in all parts of the globe.

A master of depravity, a bondage entrepeneur, a ligotteur extraordinaire; these are but a few of the eulogistic epithets employed by frenzied Bondos during E.Z.'s most recent lecture at the Institute of (Going A Bit Red In Helsinki). Only a year earlier, E.Z. had been bombarded with rude objects by an audience of mothers enraged by the fact that their freshman daughters had returned home demanding the immediate purchase of a catalogue from Fredricks of Hollywood, and that safety belts (rear and front) be installed in their bedrooms.

For this complete turn of events Shwanzbogger is to be held totally responsible. His tenacious promotional extravaganzas produced slogans like, "Uncle E.Z. wants Ewes" and of course, "Because you're mine, please pull the twine."

Yes, it was Shwanzbogger behind all of E.Z.'s success, but the majority of his following was ignorant of the fact. E.Z. never mentioned, never even alluded to the Pygmy in his discourses and this infuriated Arnold. He felt cheated, deprived of the glory which was rightfully his - stripped of his identity by this larcenous rabble rouser.

At last he could bear it no more. He determined to ruin E.Z., to topple him from the prominence he had attained, and indeed to assume that prominence himself. After all, the doctor had become ambitious. In his rush to power he had become a pedagogue. He no longer bore concern for his subjects but only for his overblown hugeness – Ecce E.Z.

It was at this time that I received a letter from the Pygmy supplicating my assistance. I hadn't seen E.Z. for months and was shocked to learn of his excesses. So much so, that I made the decision to fly to Brooklyn for a personal meeting with the Pygmy in hopes that it might contribute a bit of light to the situation.

I hunched over and walked through the doorway into Shwanzbogger's office not knowing really what to expect. Indeed, for all my imagination, I could never have dreamt of anticipating the sight I was met with upon entering.

On either side of a small bamboo desk were four metal folding chairs. Each chair contained a three piece suited gentleman tightly bound and gagged and looking thoroughly undignified. Atop the desk, behind him a portrait of Idi Amin, was the Pygmy Leonard Shwanzbogger.

"Sit down Rudi," said the Pygmy motioning to an empty chair.

At this time I was not certain that if I did, I would not experience the same fate that had befallen Arnold's earlier visitors. I was utterly stunned, however, and not knowing what else to do I accepted. Much to my relief nothing of the sort happened and I began to feel more comfortable.

Arnold strode to the bar and fumbled with a few glasses. It was most evident that he was deeply troubled about something.

"Care for a splash of Woolite, smashing for the nerves you know."

"No thanks."

"I keep it around in case I am entertaining sheep. It helps them get in the mood. And for the nerves of course."

"Of course."

"I suppose you might be curious as to the identity of these distinguished gentlemen," said the Pygmy. He gulped down a shot of Woolite and poured himself another.

"I thought about it."

"Look closely you fool. Don't you recognize them? You've dealt with them enough times."

I craned my neck and looked at each one's face. What did he mean by "I had dealt with them." My attention was swayed once more towards their particularly formal dress. Every article still in position right down to the matching tie clasps and sock graters. Where had I seen it before?

I turned to Arnold, and saw him down another shot of Woolite. As he swallowed he shut his eyes tight and his lips formed a taught line across his face in an expression much like the one produced by the imbibition of certain sugary wines. Suddenly a nausea began to overtake me as the realization of the Pygmy's heinous breach of legal dogma became all too real. I looked over at him. He was grinning - an awful grin. I was sick....

"Give me a Woolite would ya."

The Valley:

Green Mountain's, Gallagher's, and a Good Time.

known as the Chute under the single chair lift. It is not infrequent to have the sweat from skiing freeze while you're going up which necessitates the sheep by-products they offer for the riders. This lesser known ski area has been labeled as an advanced skier's mountain, because of the pitch and width of even their intermediate slopes.

Glen Ellen, or 'The Next Mountain,' whichever you please, has had as many owners as years for the past three. A consistent crowd seems to be their problem, possibly to be altered by recent heavy advertising. Mt. Ellen's trails are marked by plenty of ski school classes and recreational skiers, with a 'Lets learn how to Ski' mist in the air.

The financially sound mountain out of the three, Sugarbush, has gained prestige for its trails and apres ski atmosphere attractable to all walks of life. They are the one stalling party in jointly advertising the three areas in the Mad River Valley.

With the advent of ski-brakes and higher tags on day tickets one can see the development of skiing into a highly technical and rich man's sport. Buying a pair of skis and bindings becomes a cut throat business with varying opinions and marketing ideas to confuse the innocent consumer, unknowledgeable in the area, and consequently at the hands of the swindlers. (Inverness Sports will gladly take your money.) But if you realize everybody gets taken when buying equipment, it's not such a crush. Besides it's all to have a little fun anyways.

Skiing, with fireplaces, and a warm companion is the perfect atmosphere of winter recreation. With a Pendleton Plaid, racer's socks, and a CB jacket the people set out to embarrass themselves with their woddle finding it unnecessary in the fashion relaxed setting of Waitsfield.

The people are youthful towards skiing and having a good time — all the time. These are the characteristics that attract college students between semesters. A kind of go-for-it attitude that fulfills each hour 'to the max.' When young, they were the smart aleck kid that always snuck under the ropes to get in line. Later on, a snobby adolescent with a quick tongue. And now, their semi-neurotic minds conjure illusions, as if on a Molson television ad, gainers being executed off built-up molecules.

The night life in the Mad River Valley can only be compared to the ski conditions we've appreciated lately. And they have been outrageous! Two major snowfalls within three days transformed all optimistic hopes into reality bringing most of New England to a halt but giving a big boost to Vermont skiing. Highschool kids may have thought better if the storms had come during the week for they had petered out by Monday.

Returning to the social and apres-ski hours we find a host of choices. Over the holiday season Margaret McGlinn, with a Joni Mitchell voice and the moral suasion of Thoreau, entertained a willing and attentive crowd at the very popular Little John's Pub over one weekend.

Business boomed for shopkeepers in the area in January. A large number of out-of-staters swamped the area. In fact business was so good an anticipating "NYC lawyer type" entrepreneur's wishes came true — a bar-restaurant-disco named Downstreet.

The contemporary hangouts practice their cynicism and country yak in the Den, where a great steak dinner is available for $4.95. The new Great American Eagle which reaffirmed the defunct vacancy of the Azteca Sun beholds skiers conversing of tales of the Chute, Paradise, and Powder.

A range of rock and roll bands including the George T. McGregory Band kept Gallagher's high and mighty for a week. Their base player, Joe Lewis, called themselves a 'rock and blues' band playing for college age busloads. On the other end of the Gallaghers boat, rows of quarters line up to challenge the winner at a game of pool while Castro Crys exhaust from the foosball table in a tandem of pandemonia. The boys linger about searching for a dampening tickle only to be relieved by brewed malt and barley, and hideous laughs of men dropping their drawers and lighting their gaseous releases.

The spontaneity of the area and of the gangling gangsters who claim residence makes the Valley. It is them, along with oligopoling businessmen conspiring to take your money, the UVM weekdayers, krazy kids named Bratty Sweat, and infectious invaders that counter each other to round out the Valley show.

And beautiful round snowflakes fall... while little does everyone realize the way everything in the Valley, is an intimate part of the Valley.

SOPHOMORES! 3 WAYS TO GET STARTED FOR LIFE AFTER COLLEGE.

Reinforce your college degree and get a better start through Army ROTC. Get management training. Self-discipline. A sense of confidence. Earn the extra credentials that will set you apart as a responsible achiever. You'll also receive $2500 over your last two years in the Advanced ROTC Program. Whether your career plans are civilian or military, Army ROTC provides opportunities for both — active duty with a starting salary of over $11,300, or reserve service while employed in the civilian community. Get started for life after college. Get started in Army ROTC.

THE BASIC START.

Get started in Army ROTC through Basic Camp at Fort Knox, Kentucky, this summer. You'll get $500 for attending a challenging six-week camp. If your performance is exceptional, you just may qualify for a two-year scholarship as you enter the Advanced Program.

THE EARLY START.

If you are a veteran (or a Junior ROTC graduate), then you started early — probably without realizing it. That early start makes you automatically eligible to enter the Advanced Program. Why not add an extra $100.00 a month to your veterans benefits.

THE SUMMER START.

You may consider getting started in the Army ROTC summer program on campus. At the end of the summer you may find yourself eligible for the Advanced Program.

Basic Health:

Butter over Margarine

By Peter Millard

Although we are repeatedly told how healthy we Americans are, the fact is that we don't live longer than the English, French, Russians or the inhabitants of a host of other industrialized countries. Deaths from infectious diseases have declined greatly in the U.S. in the last decades, but an onslaught of deaths from heart disease has considerably lowered our life expectancy. Scientific evidence is mounting up to suggest that the all-American diet may have a great deal to do with this modern epidemic.

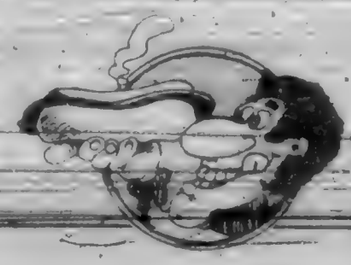
Coronary artery disease, otherwise known as "hardening of the arteries" (in technical jargon, atherosclerosis), is the leading killer of males from 35–55 years old in this country. A consequence of the deposit of fatty plaques on the inner walls of arteries supplying blood to the heart muscle, causes burning chest pains (angina), stroke, and heart attack (the lodging of a blood clot in one of the arteries within the heart).

Doctors have long recognized the relationship between heart disease and high levels of fats and cholesterol in the bloodstream. Authorities advised us to limit our dietary intake of cholesterol hoping that it would lower blood cholesterol and protect us from heart disease. However, because the body synthesizes and regulates the amount of cholesterol in the bloodstream, it now seems that dietary cholesterol has limited relevance to heart disease. Fats, though, are quite distinct from cholesterol and reducing the intake of saturated fats may be very important.

Since hardening of the arteries is an irreversible process, it is imperative to become concerned now if we don't want to become cardiac cripples at 40. Most authorities agree that several factors contributing to coronary heart disease are high blood pressure, smoking, poor diet, lack of exercise, and genetic makeup. Many studies have shown that by changing our diets we can reduce the risks of heart disease. The following are some practical suggestions, based on recent but by no means undisputed research (several of these topics to be expanded upon in coming weeks):

–A balanced diet without too much greasy meat (McDonald's beware!) and low in hardened (saturated) fats is beneficial. A carefully controlled study in Boston showed that those following a Far Eastern vegetarian diet had a 30% reduction in blood cholesterol levels.

–Whole wheat bread and bran cereal, besides protecting you from colon cancer (another big killer!), may also protect your heart. A recent report in the British Medical Journal (11/19/77) demonstrated a significant decline in heart disease among those who consumed more bran. The British found no correlation whatsoever between dietary cholesterol and heart disease.



–Eggs, once shunned because of their high cholesterol levels, are an excellent source of protein. It has also been shown that butter is preferable to margarine.

–Get plenty of B vitamins (in wheat germ, yeast and liver). The Journal of the American Medical Association reports that niacin (a B vitamin) lowers serum cholesterol levels by 10%.

–Take vitamin C supplements. Double blind studies have shown that it helps protect against colds, and the Oak Ridge National Laboratory last year found that there was 60% less hardening of the arteries in animals supplemented with vitamin C.

–Cut down on sugar and salt intake. Studies recently presented to the American Heart Association have shown that diets high in sugar and salt (i.e. the typical American diet) led to increases in blood pressure and cholesterol levels in primates.

In short, the all-American TV dinner/McDonald's/sugar-in-everything diet (Have you ever noticed that they put sugar in Morton Sterling salt these days?) may be harmful to your health. Be careful what you eat.

R-E-L-I-E-F

A Familiar Journey

By Mark LaRiviere

"I dunno, ya know – I done a lot of hitchin' and ya know, I mean, it's really great, it's the best way-ta travel, and ya know, I ain't had no problems, 'cept fo one guy dat tried ta run me ova-wid-'is-cah..." How many times had I let this identical conversation run in one ear and out the other with the inevitable nod of similar experience?

"Scotch man, are ya?" my bartender friend continued, "I been gettin' into brandy myself, owees drunk bourbon before, but brandy," he shifted his weight to the elbow nearest me and leaned into a twist of his head simultaneously rolling his eyes, culling his next comment with a shake of his curly locks, "...smoove it out wid a li'l creme-de-menthe and oo, stinga."

It was at this moment that the conversation left my conscious mind. The accumulating pressures of nature were more than I could tolerate after six bottles of light beer.

Without a further word, I made a not-too-graceful descent from my naugahyde barstool perch and aimed myself at the discrete little black and gold sign labeled "RESTROOMS."

That weaving procession, the anticipating path of relief (spelled R-E-L-I-E-F), suddenly acquired a timeless significance for me. Like satori, sudden enlightenment, I felt joined to the centuries, no, eons of drinkers partaking in the ritualistic pilgrimage of the bursting bladder.

My empathy was all-encompassing. Visions of distressed businessmen, the tips of their ears aflame, dashing through crowded airports in a painful beeline for the door marked "Gents," larrupped my squirming brain.

Images of screaming children, their eyes humming "Anchors Away," being mercilessly mother-dragged through infinite department stores searching frantically for the elusive "Ladies" room (invariably hidden in the braided rug department); a puddle of bowlegged silence occurs in Housewares & Gifts.

Relief.

When I had finally reached my own destination and sidled stealthily into position, my conjurings subsided and I became subtly aware of my environment. This restroom, a classic example of a necessary evil in interior architecture, distinguished itself from the multitude of men's rooms dotting the Burlington nightlife, exuded a pungent personality all its own, and literally reeked of individuality.

Preceeded by saloon-type swinging doors, it possessed the look of a refinished basement. Above the twin urinals hung a mantlepiece mirror confronting me, the pissing patron, with a nose-to-nose inspection of myself; aside from curbing more unimaginative graffitti, it posed the perfect pitstop opportunity to smoothe stray hairs.

Relief.

That moment of cosmic connection is as indelibly etched in my memory as Darlene's phone number is on the towel dispenser.

Prompted by the firm belief that lavatories have become icons of our culture, ridden with ritual behavior from which no one is exempt, I am obligated by divine appointment to torture this tasteless subject into the collective awareness.

Childhood nightmare notions of the dour and roily dampness of public places recur in my dreams as an adult.

Urinals, whose sweating stainless steel handle required a tip-toe reach, have leared in my midnight illusions. Horrible. Angry surges of sparkling water washing a handful of cigarette butts, over and over, is a sight an impressionable mind cannot shed.

Horseshoe shaped toilet seats, the ingenious brainchild of the public restroom, are the common experience of dignitaries and chambermaids alike. Head, john, can, privy. Some are resorts, some are last resorts.

A thin dime buys a poolside seat at the Burlington bus station and all the ecstasy you can eat. If that extravagance is beyond your financial means, it cost nothing to watch Otis train the last three hairs on his head to lie in the same direction. It's worth a dainty dribble, for the over-the-shoulder show; a man unparalleled in his ability to so delicately manipulate an unbreakable comb. For the perceptive observer, the visit is an education, practically a mini-course in the technique of keeping pointy patent leather shoes absolutely brilliant amid the pondscum of the tiled floor.

Inspired by the slice-of-life that characterized the bus terminal facilities, I took my newly discovered intuition into the labyrinth of lavatories servicing the most popular drinking establishments of this steaming metropolis. My conclusion... terminal nausea.

All my previous cognitions took a rumbleseat to my visceral reactions. If Marcel Duchamp had gotten one of the cornicopea-shaped urinals from Hannibul's, he'd have had it framed and called it "Mixed Chinese Vegetables Revisited – without redeeming social value." Enough. I left.

Relief.

Suppose that one day disaster befell Burlington. Mount Mansfield erupts in a fury of lava and pine needles and life as we know it is obliterated in beautiful Burlington, Pompei-like, from the face of the earth.

Meanwhile, mankind destroys itself. Almost.

A virtuous dairy farmer from north of the border has secretly built the ultimate fall out shelter beneath his bovine barn and manages to save himself, his herd, and his daughter who is imprisoned in the crysallus of her iron-lung. Divinely obligated to spearhead a new race, he dutifully begins to beget.

Several thousand years of evolution produce a civilization free from bodily functions, no longer in need of the odious water-closet; in fact, ignorant of its phenomenal popularity until the unearthing of Burlington.

The rich archeological find would fill museums of the future with epoxy-resin casts, mannequins of coxcomb customers peering into imaginary mirrors, pinching ancient pimples; seated co-eds in deflated down vests squatting mid-air in a bare-assed balancing act. Sections of Finbar's wall decoded like the Rosetta Stone. Scrawls of a Flair fine point perfectly preserved... "I'd rather have a bottle in front of me than a frontal lobotomy..." and dissected to reveal its cryptic significance.

A computor-generated voice describes the archaic scene as a ritualistic ablution and preening prior to courtship and mating.

The computor explains "...It is postulated that the population of Burlington had a nomadic tribe of natives whose existence was spent roaming the highways anticipating the opportunity to visit a small compartment at the rear of the coach, a sort of portable miniature version of the sacred places you have seen thus far..."

"Airborne facilities are suspected to have been traded from city to city, a sort of ritual of the heavens, carrying teams of the devout population in order that the facilities never be left unattended..."

Enough speculation.

Who cares, anyway? I dunno, ya know.

Vacation Excursion: SW to Tenn.

By Randy McMullen

It was, as with most excursions I have ever gone on, a disorganized experience.

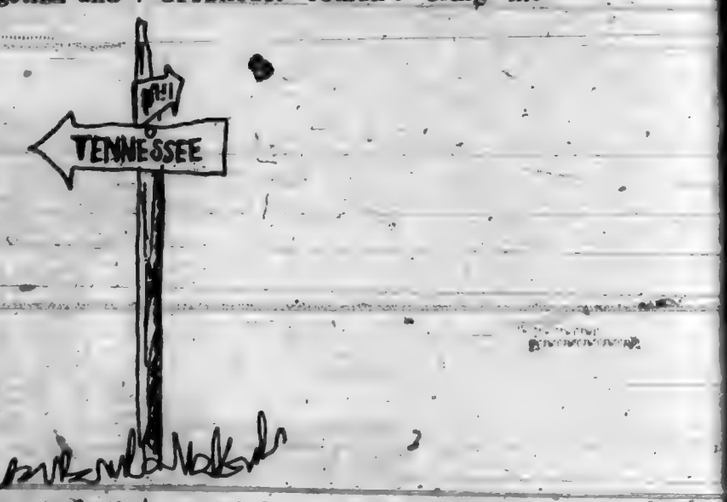
It didn't help that the night before was piddled away while we got stoned and drunk; leaving our doubts concerning packing and directions to hang while we consumed great quantities of mescal, gin and tonics, and Thai weed. We played table hockey and yapped ourselves into the early morning, finally going to bed after a last bottle of wine and a joint.

Three friends — Louie, Sliv, and Donna — and myself were planning a mad quest in search of the movement of the 1970's. A representation of hope for our lost generation. We had heard of this place called The Farm down in Tennessee, where a group of people were living pure and peaceful off the land. They had shunned the industrial society that winds us all up into neurotic machines and sends us scurrying out into the streets. This farm was in a valley where time stood still. There was no post-Watergate era, no nuclear power, no unemployment or grade inflation, and no loonies like our own dear space tripper named Timothy Leary, whose insane philosophies have at last become too restless for the planet earth; and when we start itching to leave the only planet we own, there is something to be afraid of.

What I was really looking for in this farm, was a group of people who see a definite purpose to their existence. The U.S. has evolved into a race of kinky, crazy beings and sometimes I have trouble assessing where I fit into it all. I'm not sure if I wanted to find my niche in life, or just any niche at all where my thoughts could catch up with me for a while.

Anyway, I was certain that our adventure would be well worth taking, and I awoke that day with the happy knowledge that I would be far away from Burlington by the time I went to bed again. It was a rowdy morning. More table hockey, mad packing, Frank Zappa, and strong Jamaican coffee. I went scurrying around in my car, while Donna, Sliv, and Louie packed and screamed at broken clothes dryers. We departed — hours behind schedule — with another passenger; a girl named Karen who we were taking to Philadelphia, and whose apartment we would crash in that night.

We headed down route 22-A, with the New York Adirondak Mountains nipping and tucking in the clouds across Lake Champlain. I will always love this road. The farmland full of snow made me want to leap out of the car and dive into the virgin powder. The trick is to make a colossal mess, and then split before the farmer comes. Then, when he sees the mess, he'll think he's had an encounter of the first kind.



("I think one of them tried to lay a hand on my missus, general."

"Did you actually see the creature, Mr. Johnson?"

"Naw, it was too fast. But they left a hub cap.")

Louie drove from Burlington until Albany, New York where I took the wheel. Albany is a horrid city that reeks of concrete conformity and state cops. One of them nabbed me later, doing 70, but he was a nice fellow and all I got was a summons for driving without an inspection sticker. I should have gotten worse. I deserve it. I am a mad driver on thruways: switching lanes sporadically and gunning the car at unsafe speeds while in a trance of hypertensity. It is rather hypocritical, I suppose, for me — a preacher of conservation — to waste gas like I do, and at the same time, drive like a dangerous nut. I think I really need more speeding tickets.

We made a stop in Suffern, New York to see my parents. They fed us a great meal, and got a kick out of meeting my companions. My father and Louie hit it off very well. They quaffed down beer together and marveled at their perfect polarity. My old man sat laughing robustly; a middle-aged capitalist thriving in his accomplishments and the securities of business deals to come. Louie murmured and grumbled quietly like the doubting and intellectual communist that he is. They are a fine pair for spirited conversation.

With a last cup of coffee, and more food for the road, we were off to Philadelphia. We drove through the slimey streets of Newark, an ugly town that snickers at the New Jersey Turnpike from across these small strips of swamp and milkweed. Hunters can sometimes be seen in these fields, shooting at some misdirected seagulls, various types of pigeons, and probably a few passenger cars. How paradoxical it must be! To escape from the rat race and hunt with the smell of Newark at your back.

We made a small pitstop in a town called Cambden, where Louie and I were so struck with an atmosphere of unfriendliness that we felt compelled to write some nasty grafitti on the walls. For instance:

What do Cambden, New Jersey and Marilyn Monroe have in common? They're both dead.

And:

What's the difference between Cambden, New Jersey and a used trojan? About 15 miles.

It kept Louie and me giggling all the way to Philadelphia, which we drove into after crossing the Ben Franklin Bridge. Karen gave us a brief tour: Lombard Street, The Liberty Bell, and a number of interesting looking bars, but we were all too tired to be very interested. We crashed in her pad soon after. She lived with a bunch of other artists, and it was nice to lay down with all sorts of sculptures and posters hanging above you. Donna and I sat up for most of the night talking about the world's problems, and especially her own. She had experienced difficulty finding herself and her direction while at a small college in Maine the previous semester, and she had finally lost all confidence in herself. She had come to Burlington to visit Sliv, and the next day she was trucking to Tennessee with three loonies on the prowl for kicks and knowledge.

I felt all of a sudden very close to her, because I could understand what she was doing. Her philosophy follows very closely my own. The best way to rid yourself of anxiety is to keep going, and going, and going. Then when you turn around, you find that those troubling thoughts are worlds behind you.

When I awoke the next morning — after about two hours of sleep — I was in a world of trouble. Even a good breakfast couldn't bring me around. I am never very sharp in the morning; my thoughts come in inconsistant rushes, and they are often rather incoherent.

Firstly, where was Tennessee? We had no map, and no concept as to the geographical setup of this great country of ours. Do we head south or west? Which comes first: Kentucky or North Carolina? Will we go through Washington, D.C.? Can we get out of Philadelphia?

None of the gas stations around had any maps. I drove the car down a maze of cratered roads, until I found myself on this paved-over wharf heading towards the dependable route 95, the only sensible thing this decrepid town had to offer. I was very down on Philadelphia at this time, and I happily steered my Pontiac out of its last remaining scenes: kids sitting around a lit fire can, barnicled boats rotting with time at the docks, and the scattered remnants of some animal that didn't make home for dinner the night before. It was ten in the morning, and we were phasing out of Philly at its finest hour; everything was going to the insects.

I continued the car down 95 into Maryland (a nice change, plenty of farmland and towns named North East and Rising Sun), past Baltimore and Washington, until I reached a route 66, which was going to take us west. Louie took over the driving chores then, while I snoozed in the front seat.

When I awoke, we were in Virginia, spearheading through fields of dark red clay. I wahooed and clapped my hands. We were finally in the real south.

We were looking for route 81, which would take us into Tennessee and eventually, Chattanooga. I had relatives to visit there, and Sliv knew some friends that were going to school. She warned us her friend's roommate, a humungous, fiery black girl named Georgetta who loved loud disco music and loudness overall. She became mad easily, and often found physical imparation the only possible source of vengeful satisfaction. Sliv told how her friend had one time pounded on Georgetta's wall to get her to turn the stereo. A picture on the wall fell upon the record, destroying it, and igniting Georgetta into a musketball of southern fury. "Georgetta threatened to 'kick her white ass,'" said Sliv, "and she nearly did."

...a short story

I began having paranoid visions of arriving at Sliv's friend's house at some ungodly hour, knocking at the door, and being beaten to a pulp by some 350 pound black girl screaming "I'll kick yo' Yankee ass!" I nervously told Louis to step on it. "If we get there before two in the morning," I said, "maybe she'll only blacken both our eyes."

Virginia rolled on and on through a thick, foggy evening. It was drizzling when we crossed into Tennessee, but we were joyous arrivers into the state that was our mission. Tennessee: the volunteer state, home of The Farm, and friends and relatives. We also wanted to check out Nashville and the Jack Daniels distillery in Lynchburg. It was going to be a challenge to get in all the kicks we wanted with the limited amount of time we had (about three days), but we sure were ready to try.

We decided to celebrate our arrival at Tennessee (Louie had been singing "Tennessee Jed," along with his usual collection of Grateful Dead tunes), and we pulled off into this truckstop called the Ponderosa. The parking lot was a maze of trucks, all grazing around the local diesal hole. We parked behind a fence where a chicken sat upon a stack of tires. She glared at us in the dark as we tried to coax her into laying an egg — Donna was making these cooing, chicken sounds. The poor bird began to moan and ripple, as we continued coaxing, but all she would deposit for us was about a quart of this steaming urine that dribble down along the tires. It was our first dose of southern hospitality, being told by a chicken where to go.

We weren't treated much better inside. This restaurant was made for a truck driver's social gathering, and we had no business being there. A sign read: "The Ponderosa is for truckers, and they will of course be served first." There were trojans and french ticklers for sale in the men's room, a woman of southern hospitality at the counter, and a lot of guys were strolling around in sparkled jeans and porkchop sideburns whistling Charlie Pride and Tammy Wynette.

Everyone in the place gave us long, reproachful looks. The waitress made heavenward glances as we ordered our grits, beans, and coffee. We were foolish hippies in a rednecked spot, and it was close to midnight. People there probably thought that we would turn into man-eating pumpkins soon; hopelessly drugged wolves that would froth at the mouth and throw knives into the wall, hexing them with a game of galactic mumbledepeg.

We got back into the car and headed for Chattanooga. It was a torturous ride. I was tired and cranky at the wheel, and I wanted to get there so I could just go to sleep. I sped through the night and the rain, while the others slept, and concentrated on my morbid thoughts. Driving on a thruway at night is an identity crisis. Imagine it: your car is just one set of dots (headlights) on a highway that is moonpainted with dots, and each highway is just one small line that is one of a million small lines. And of course there are more states and countries, each with a million more lines and dots and lonely hotel signs. Let's face it, life is a McDonald's hamburger, and of the billions served, yours isn't the only one that could be a little warmer.

When we got to Chattanooga, I followed a series of scattered directions that finally led us to the university there. When we banged on door no. 309 of the village apartments — where Sliv's friends lived — it was three in the morning, and we were the tired products of some 700 miles on the road. Oh Georgetta! Dear Georgetta! We come in peace!

To Ski at Your Own Risk

Currently the Senate Judiciary Com. is engaged in active debate attempting to formulate legislation designed to protect a ski area's downhill accident liability. Indeed, this bill demands the legislature's most immediate and discriminating attention, for failure to act might well cause all areas to cease operation due to the absence of affordable insurance coverage.

The issue arose when James Sunday, a 24-year-old Burlington resident, was awarded 1½ million dollars – $250,000 more than he asked – for damages resulting from a fall he took while skiing at the Stratton ski area. Sunday, who is paralyzed for life from the shoulders down, claims – the evidence is highly debatable – that he hit a twig inadvertently left on the terrain by an apparently negligent maintenance crew. The ruling by Federal District Judge WynnUnderwood (Chittenden County), which is currently being appealed to the Vermont state supreme court, reversed the case law precedent set down in Wright vs. Mansfield (1951). That ruling handed down by Federal Judge Gibson stated that a skier assumes "an inherent risk" when going down after he or she safely reaches the top.

We hope that the legislature will act with celerity and pass a fully comprehensive bill in the spirit of the original Gibson ruling. We do not, however, interpret this to mean that ski operators should be exempt from all responsibility in getting the skier down safely; but rather only from those natural elements beyond human control. We can foresee possible instances of injury caused directly by "gross negligence" on behalf of the area, which might justify legal recourse. Although "gross negligence" is a highly interpretive term subject to variation, we might include among such possibilities: unmarked snowmaking equipment obstructing the skier's path; overselling of tickets causing excessively crowded trails; or insufficiently marked obvious natural hazards. If worded carefully, the legislation can, we believe, cover most of the possibilities.

Skiing, like many other outdoor winter sports, carries with it certain dangers which must be assumed by the individual. Even if desirable – and most would agree that it is not – it would be literally impossible to groom all trails perfectly. What about the trails that are too steep to groom? Should all moguls be considered dangerous and therefore eliminated? Most would agree that if that happened, a large part of skiing attraction would disappear.

In his decision Judge Underwood maintained that because of improved technology, areas should assume more responsibility for general safety. This view deserves merit, but only to a point. What in essence the ruling actually implies is that the greater the effort an area undertakes to make their trails safer and more enjoyable, the greater chances are that they will be punished for those efforts. Hardly encouraging.

In the broad view, if an adequate bill fails to pass, skiing in Vermont will become defunct, and surely have not only disastrous economic consequences, but will deprive an athletically oriented people of one of its most beloved pastimes.

James Sunday, an unfortunate victim, surely deserves the heartfelt sympathy of skiers and non-skiers alike. However, his overdramatized plight should not help destroy one of the state's most valuable industries.

A Welcome Boost

To the Editor:

As one new to the area, and with a background in writing and editing for various publications, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the editors, writers and staff of the Vermont Cynic for putting out a quality publication, which, by and large, constantly provides the Burlington area with refreshing responsible coverage.

You can be proud of your publication. It ranks on a par, or is better than other student-run newspapers I have seen in New Haven, Boston-Cambridge, and Washington, D.C.. College newspapers have traditionally been fair game for bored amateur sharpshooters. I know the shit must hit the fan with every misspelled name and minor error that you as mortals make.

The Cynic adds fresh voices and spirit to a community that somehow must suffer with The Burlington Free Press, a "paper" that seems intent on serving the people pablum and/or Gerber's Baby Food as their standard fare to a community that deserves more. In short, you fill a void, and fill it well. Happy New Year!

Sincerely,
Robert Hawthorne Wylie
Burlington, Vt 05401

Bad Picks

To the Editor:

In reference to your recent publication of "The Cynic Music Awards," you awarded Boz Scaggs, "Down Two Turn Left," as the best disco album of the year. As avid followers of disco music, we find it impossible to believe that such a claim could be made. Considering the multitude of excellent disco albums on the market, we can't conceive that you have any knowledge of disco music.

Considering the popularity that disco music has acquired throughout the country, we feel that the Cynic staff should gain more insight into the 'world of disco.' If you wish to continue rating disco albums in the future, we recommend that you tune in to CKMF94 on your FM dial in Montreal. This station plays genuine disco music non-stop and uninterrupted from 5:30 p.m. to 7:00 p.m. on weeknights and from 11:00 p.m. to 5:00 a.m. on Saturdays.

In conclusion, if you are to continue rating disco albums, and you are without sufficient knowledge on the subject, you could refer to Billboard magazine which contains sections on every type of music. Billboard gives the top fifteen disco records of sixteen major cities, including New York and Montreal.

Subdued Controversy

To the Editor,

I recently overheard someone remark that the up-coming appearance of General William C. Westmoreland was causing a "controversy" at this campus. If this is true, it is subdued controversy because the general reaction of the student body, as I have observed it, has been almost non-existent.

About a month ago, roughly fifty students and citizens met, under the initial impetus of the local chapter of the Young Communist Organization (I can hear the boos and hisses already) to discuss the implications of the scheduled visit. An indication of the political stance of those who are behind the Portable Faculty Program which is sponsoring the visit under a series called U.S. and Third World Policy is seen in the ironic fact that there are no third world participants.

Among the speakers, Westmoreland is easily the most "rightist," but the CYO is not directing its opposition towards him in a personal, vindictive manner. There is a distinct consciousness that to make the man a scapegoat would be fruitless. But the appearance could be a much needed opportunity to remind people of the unresolved issues that came out of Vietnam. Amazing how quickly most of us have forgotten, how conveniently the topic has become passe, even taboo among many. We are witnessing now an extremely pragmatic "don't look now, it's all right" period; the lessons of the past years have been too painful to bear much reflection. We are escapists, seeking to avoid the truths of the economic and moral crises that we are in.

Westmoreland is a proud representative of the military machine that fought and lost the war in Vietnam and South East Asia. The military, however, did not create the "conflict"; it acted only as it was directed by US politicians, who are purportedly carrying out the will of a majority of Americans. All of us at least share the guilt that we preferred not to see, to raise our voices at the purposeless destruction until everybody else was raising theirs. The brutality of Vietnam - total destruction of civilian areas (one term was "free fire zone") under the premise that all South Vietnamese were collaborators, the ecological and, it follows, economic rape of the very nation we were supposed to be defending, the racist nature of the war and the simultaneous and inevitable psychological decay in those Americans who fought. All these are the consequences which we have yet to admit to ourselves, because none of it is very pretty.

If we do not face these questions - the "Why?" "Can it happen again or have we learned a lesson?" – we are doing ourselves a perhaps fatal disfavor. To ignore this is, in my opinion, sheer blindness. If you go to hear Westmoreland speak, will you know if you're being lied to?

Who Will Solve. . .
The Case of the Open Window

To the Editor:

I would here like to pay my compliments to our UVM Security Force. One night over vacation, in fact at 9:10 p.m., one especially eagle-eyed officer, popularly known as Serpico, spotted my window open approximately one and one half inches. This is no small feat at 9:10 at night, there being no light in the room and it being on the 3rd floor of Mason Hall. I must commend Serpico for this service, 'cause there's no telling what may have been stolen if someone had scaled the wall of the building and slipped in through the 1½" opening.

However, it seems that after entering my room, Serpico became distracted from his mission and spotted my pot plants. He must have been so excited, never having seen the two 30" plants on my window sill before, that he forgot about closing my window and grabbed the plants.

When I returned from vacation, I found the window still open and the room painfully bare, not to mention the dirt he spilled all over the place as he trotted off with his prize.

The irony of this officer's and his female side kick's vigilance is that of the two windows they spotted which were open, both happened to have nice healthy potplants on the window sill. And while these two rooms were on the third and fourth floors of Mason, these two officers missed an open window on the second floor, which resulted in a stolen stereo.

There is a more serious problem behind this which involves just when and why security can enter a student's room during vacations or otherwise. Additionally, there is the question of what they can confiscate. This incident could conceivably establish a precedent for room searches. Those plants and pots and soil were just as much my personal property as my bong or my ashtray. Are they going to steal my bong because there are seeds in it? Illegal or not, those plants were just as much a part of my room as someone else's spider plants, only I put the time and effort into raising them myself.

You did a good job, Serpico, but did you really think I was going to smoke that stuff??

Yours in pot growing,
U.V.P.G.A.

Students and Jobs: Hopeless Optimism

By Dan Adams

For students in college today, one need not look long to find pessimistic predictions about the job market for the coming decade. One such prediction — included in a sobering article by George C. Wilson appropriately entitled "A Surplus of Grads" (Washington Post — August 21, 1977) is the Bureau of Labor Statistics' finding that, between now and 1985, there will be some 950,000 more college graduates than jobs that have traditionally required college degrees. Consequence: thousands of college graduates must take jobs they do not want if they want to work at all. Consequence: frustration, depression, and a feeling of having been cheated, for many of us after graduation.

OPINION

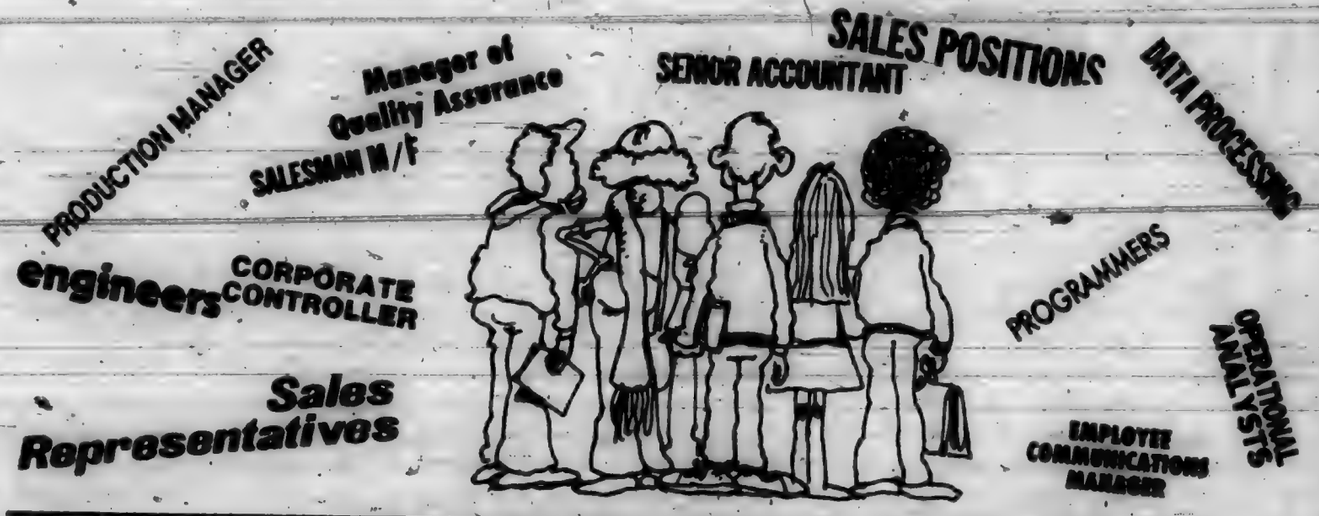
To this, some (this writer for one) respond that jobs aren't everything, that interpersonal, academic and creative development all are additional benefits one can gain from a college experience, all of which may be more important than specific preparation for a career. Yet in a survey in fall 1976 freshmen (The American Freshman: National Norms for Fall, 1976) — The Institutional Research Program at the University of California) the reason most noted as "very important in deciding to go to college" (71.7%) was to be "able to get a better job." Wilson, quoting Carlos Pheans (Maryland State Employment Service), noted "the average college graduate believes that society owes him a job because he earned his credentials." In short, the majority of students today want good jobs, and, after academic toil and financial investment, believe they deserve appropriate employment.

While this notion of being "owed" appropriate employment is nearly universal among college students today, it is also nonsense. One can't have a right to that which does not exist, regardless of the time and money invested towards that end. We can sound off all we want concerning what we believe we deserve or have earned. We can also appear rather silly speaking without regard to some inescapable realities. Here are two: First, at any given time there are only so many jobs available to the labor force. Second, at the present time our educational systems are developing a supply of college graduates far greater than the demand (in the job market) for them — thus the surplus.



No one has to go to college. Those who choose to, with strong career goals in mind, must recognize the realities above. Doing so, it is clear that society "owes" each student qualified for a specific job no more than a dealer owes the equally qualified participants in a round of Blackjack, that being an indiscriminate chance at one of a limited number of goods (one of a limited number of jobs with the former, a winning hand with the latter). Where a Blackjack player who loses out may be a bit poorer, or sad that he just gambled away his house, wife, and kids, he entered into the risk on his own accord, with a full understanding of the potential consequence, good and bad, of his investment. He has no right to feel cheated by the gambling house.

The frustration many college graduates will feel in the next decade could be avoided. It will stem from unrealistic expectations about the benefits and payoffs from going to college. Much of the blame falls in two areas. First, it falls upon colleges who, in their recruitment processes and general advertisements, neglect to stress the unavoidable impact of the realities above, "guaranteeing" — in so many words — specific employment or a set return on investment. These cannot be guaranteed, but are dependent upon demographic, political, economic and social trends which shape the job market.

Second, the blame falls on the families and high schools who irresponsibly drill the importance of college into students' minds. The result is a crowd of college applicants hyped up on income expectations and fearful of a lack of acceptance were they not to attend college. Students apply to college with unrealistic expectations which, when not met, leave them bitter towards their experience and the schools they attended.

Happiness is a funny cracker. One wonders whether a graduate forced to spend his days at work for which he is over-qualified would have been happier with less education. Clearly, there are many other benefits from the college experience other than employment, but how important are they in determining overall happiness for the college graduate, especially for the career oriented students of today?

One cannot generalize with the above. It is a question each student must consider for themselves. If students decide they wish to risk over-qualification — risk preparing for specific employment in a field with a surplus of applicants — that is fine, as long as the risk and the gamble are recognized and understood. If so, any resultant frustration will have been anticipated by the student, and will not be the cause of such unhappiness and misdirected blame. As usual, there is a need for more rational decision making based on accurate information and a clear understanding of the issue at hand.

> "the majority of students today want good jobs, and after academic toil and financial investment, believe they deserve appropriate employment."

Harping on a Dismal Memory

By Eric Pollard

On January 31, General W. C. Westmoreland will be speaking here at the University of Vermont on the "Lessons of Vietnam." There is another event scheduled to take place that night. The Communist Youth Organization and the Student Action Committee plan to protest the appearance of this man so closely linked with the war in Vietnam. What it is precisely they are protesting about Westmoreland is not readily discernable, but any active imagination can fill in any blanks left in the rhetoric. It is certainly an honorable task that these groups have undertaken and there is little evidence that would raise any question about their motives, but one can hardly help feeling puzzled about this sudden resurgence of moral and neo-patriotic fervor. What has provoked this sort of response when the activities in question took place beyond the reaches of contemporary memory?

Nearly two months ago another famous American came to speak to the student body about the accountability of government. This man is still under investigation for questionable financial dealings while he was director of a bank in Georgia. No organized protest met Bert Lance. Instead, he was welcomed rather cordially into the area. While he may be technically innocent, Lance's approach to government and finance is as much a moral offense as the actions of the hundreds of high level bureaucrats like Westmoreland who were involved in the planning and carrying out of military operations in Southeast Asia. What is neglected in much of the debate over the Vietnam issue is that the military is, in almost every instance, under the control of the civilian government. The independent strength, and, to some extent, responsibility of the armed forces of the United States is a mere reflection of the ability of the government to maintain control over the given situation. It is for a similar reason that Lance leaves such a foul taste in the mouth of most Americans. The idea of having a man of such notorious credentials in a position where he is highly visible as a representative of both the administration and the entire American people is embarrassing at best and revolting at worst. Westmoreland was simply a representative of the mindset of the period, one of blind pursuit of American interest, while it can only be hoped that Lance is not just another typical scoundrel pursuing no interests but his own.

INSIGHT

The attempt of the CYO and the Student Action Committee to strike a blow for moral justice, while honest and forthright in its own way, seems to miss the mark in terms of relevance to contemporary values in America. They are trying to keep alive a beast that should have been allowed to die years ago only to seek to hammer it into submission. While the memory of the war will not fade, there is no reason to chase after those involved like shadows in the night. The energy and money spent to voice displeasure at the appearance of a military man well past his prime could be much more profitably spent in an effort to strive toward the goal of integrity and honesty in government. When there is so much to do today, one wonders why these groups are turning to the time-weary causes of a fading generation to express their disaffection with the present state of the system. The social programs that the government administers are in desperate need of reform. There is a shortage of housing for lower and middle income families. There are still people starving and freezing to death in this country. These things threaten our country. Westmoreland's danger to America has come and gone, thankfully. A new host has arisen in his place, a host that must be met with strength and determination. These groups have the potential to do a great amount of good. The worth of their current efforts will be borne out in the fruits of their labors.

Once I used to join in,
Every boy and girl was my friend.
Now there's revolution
And they don't know what they're fighting.
Let us close our eyes.
Outside their lips go on much faster.
Oh, we won't give in,
We'll keep living in the past.

Ian Anderson

Pastoral Land or Pyramid Mall?

By Peter Hurdekoper

Don't it always seem to go
That you don't know what you've got
Till it's gone
They paved paradise
And put up a parking lot.

from
by Joni Mitchell

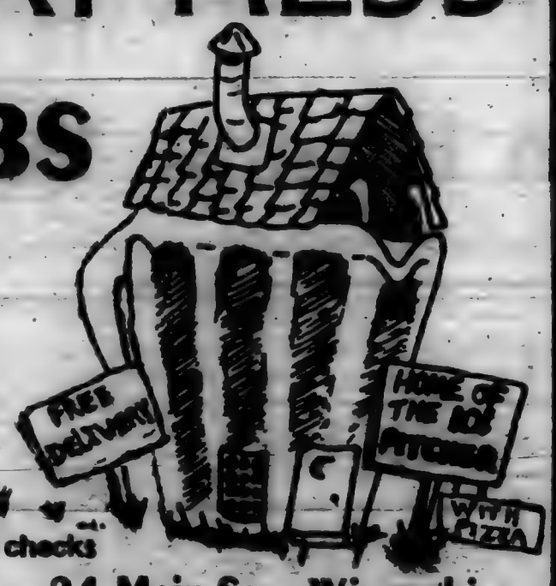
Some of man's changes seem less benevolent. In the small, largely rural town of Williston, Vermont (population 3,187) plans for the largest shopping mall in the state are underway. Eighty stores right near the highway. We hear about the convenience, the jobs, the value of competition. We hear about the "2,307 trees" that will be planted within the mall's little kingdom, trees that, along with the many shrubs to be planted there will make the area far greener than the present cheerless piece of land. The Pyramid Companies proposing the mall also speak of the innumerable benefits for both the consumers of the area and the citizens of the town. Those citizens, however, have argued about the wisdom of this proposal. Some are grateful for it, many are not a little bewildered about what it all means, and more than a few are fearful.

In September the town voted, by a margin of 439-374, not to oppose construction of the mall. Since then concerned citizens, environmental groups, and Burlington businessmen and politicians have tried in various ways to have their say on the matter. The most popular bumper sticker in the county at the present time shows a picture of a pyramid standing on its head, accompanied by the simple appeal, "Upset Pyramid." And yet the future of the mall is, at the moment, in the hands of the District Environmental Commission. The Commission is presently reviewing the proposals to be certain that they satisfy the state's land use standards set up in Act 250. Questions still remain as to whether the mall "fits in with Williston's town plan" (which is sort of like asking if a U.S. Navy nuclear warship belongs with the other boats in your three year old's bathtub fleet). Appeals, delays, and possible visits to court may lie ahead, and yet many people up here seem to feel resigned to the notion that sooner or later the Pyramid Mall will suddenly land on the pastoral world of Williston.

It occurred to me that at first a new mall or any new project that alters our environment might feel a little like the season's first snowfall. In our shortsighted way we think only of the immediate pleasure their changes bring. We feel excited about these gigantic concrete worlds that burst onto the landscape. How quickly they are laid out and mounted and presto! they stand before us all too temptingly, always invitingly, their cash registers ringing delightfully away! How quickly they bring a shine, a gaiety to what otherwise might be a rather drab spot! How pretty they are! How lovely! How new!

A new mall will be there, however, come spring and summer and fall, and next year and the year after and so on. A first snow, or even all the storms that follow, they at least have the good sense to sink into oblivion when we have had enough of them. Herein lies the difference between a pretty snowfall and a monstrous new mall. While nature moves on fulfilling its next promise, while it recreates out of winter's death, all too often man manipulates and exhausts the land. All too often in creating we destroy. In the end we leave behind us a landscape destined to grow ever more desolate. What we destroy by building, unfortunately, is almost always permanently lost. What is tarred and built on and erected creates a new environment that inevitably disfigures the former one for as long as most of us shall live. Lovely rural towns, once devastated by eighty store malls, will never be the same again.

The citizens of Williston do not have the promise and the hope that nature brings. They cannot trust Pyramid as they can Mother Nature who, come next May — however beaten and defeated and dead she may appear to be — will once again spring back to life. Those citizens have no such promise as they prepare for this other change, this more permanent disruption in their lives. One has to wonder if they are truly aware of the inevitable chain of events that will follow in their community and on the ten mile commercial band that will logically build up between their town and the nearest shopping area, South Burlington. We can only hope that they see far enough into the future to realize that once this mall goes throuth there will be no turning back to what they have now, that the mall will not always look like a neat little beehive buzzing sweetly away in innocent isolation, that Williston, as they know it, will have died.



One has to wonder, too, if it suggests something about our future as a state. Does it imply that a majority of Vermonters are tempted to join the rest of the nation's ungainly lurch into the future, "to go with the drift of things," to succumb to the trends that have already ravaged so much of the east coast? How forgetful will we be of today's blessings, of all that we have here that so much of our country will never have again? More specifically, are all the stores and jobs and markets and parking lots and sewage systems, all the pollution and all the commerce that will grow so much green — in dollars — are they really worth all the Vermont countryside that is gradually (and with a mall the size of Pyramid, plus the consequences of this mall, anything but gradually!) being chipped away?

It is hard not to wonder what our sad-eyed poet would have made of all this. For skeptical as he was Mr. Frost did claim to believe that "the heart of man" resisted change; he did not expect us "to go with the drift of things" quite this easily. It would have surprised him, I think, if he had lived to see us "yield with a grace" to the closing of a rural community and the opening of an eighty store mall in that quiet, lovely little town — to name just one of the absurdities of this thing called progress. It might have moved him to intone those familiar words from "The Road Not Taken," words about hearing into the unknown future, about making choices, about the infinite consequence of every choice; words about two roads diverging in a yellow wood — now diverging before Williston and many places like it every day; words that encourage us to take "the one less traveled by," the road that can make "all the difference," the choice that will prevent us from becoming just a colder, hillier version of that shopping mall of a world to the south.

The Beckoning Mountains: Vermont's Finest Skiing

By Rich Chalmers

The University of Vermont attracts a wide variety of people from all areas of the country and an ever increasing percentage of them have one thing in common; they love to ski. Whether it is alpine, cross country, snow shoeing, or just enjoying the outdoors during winter, the Burlington area has a great deal to offer.

For the downhill skier, UVM represents a nearly ideal opportunity to supplement a University life style with frequent skiing escapades.

The sport is a relatively easy one to learn after the original problems are overcome. Flip Mirsky, a UVM junior who is part timing as a ski instructor at Glen Ellen, commented, "As an instructor, one of the most important things I can do is cure the beginning skiers of their fear. They're either afraid of falling, the cold, getting hurt or being run into by other skiers. Once I get them relaxed and confident on their skis, they go out and have a great time. You can't ski and really be afraid of getting hurt, it just won't work."

"With today's teaching method," Mirshy added, "It's very easy to take up skiing. Witha little extra money, people who've never skied before can go out and have a great time skiing, in less than a week, sometimes a day."

Skiing is not very hard to pick up, once you get the feeling. The first few times are difficult but once the basics are grasped, most beginners learn quickly. Many advanced skiers remember their start with sentimental nostalgia and wish they could go through the whole thrill of learning and improving every time they skied. "Most importantly," Mirsky stressed, "the person really has to want to be out there. You have to be out there for yourself ready to learn and have fun at what you're doing. We get some wives out on the slopes who say 'Well, my husband and all the kids ski, so they thought I should learn.' It just can't work if you aren't really interested in learning to ski for yourself."

There's something inherent in the sport which attracts so many people. When asked why they ski, a number of sportsmen answered, "Because it's a great sport. It's a non-competitive (unless you race), fast speed, exciting sport in which you aren't confined. There's no one telling you where to go or what to do. It's just you out there having fun."

Mirsky described skiing after the last few storms as, " a fabulous sensation. It felt like I didn't have any skis on at all. I was just floating on a cloud of powder. There was no feeling of contact with the ground beneath me - it was excellent."

Glen Ellen, one of the leading ski areas in the Burlington area, has thirty-six trails equipped with four double chair lifts and one tee bar. Its ski school, headed by Rich Messer, uses the American Teaching Method (ATM) and they have expanded their snow making procedures during the past few years in an attempt to cover terrain for all abilities. The mountain itself, Mount Ellen, is 4,083 feet tall with a vertical drop on the trails of 2600 feet. The area is generally able to absorb skiers well and lift lines are usually quite reasonable. Currently, snow conditions are excellent with seventy-three inches of snow recorded at the peak. The ski area has a midstation which allows more advanced skiers to ski the more challenging upper-mountain without having to return all the way to the bottom. It is a well diversified place with a good variety of trails. A family type atmosphere is present with little of the feeling of big business or commercialization that can be found in other areas.

Mad River is another big competitor with twenty-five trails, one single and three double chairlifts, it constitutes a favorite meeting place for many of

UVM Falls To UNH, Routs Middlebury

By Paul Gardner

In a high energy first period UNH took a two goal lead and held it with a hot glove hand from Mark Evans (56 saves) to score a 7-5 victory over UVM at Gutterson Saturday night.

The game had many aspects to lure the capacity crowd on hand for the game. UNH and the Cats are old rivals dating back to the early days of Gutterson hockey. Since then, New Hampshire's Wildcats have dominated the series 28-5. UNH is also a division power making the game big in terms of the standings as well. The result is pandamonium. By the time the ref dropped the puck for the opening face off, the place was shaking from noise. Adrenalin was flowing both on the ice and in the stands. In fact it seemed that both teams were setting a pace they would regret in the third period.

Unfortunately, the excitement seemed to help UNH and hurt UVM. The Cats looked disorganized in their own end while UNH was charging in on Turcotte with cool abandon. UNH came into the game third in the ECAC in goals per game, and displayed their prowess almost immediately by scoring at one minute twelve seconds into the first period. Jon Fontas started the play taking a shot on goal from Turcotte's left. The Cat goalie went down to block the shot only to have the puck deflect off a UNH player to Bob Gould, who put it into the open side of the net. Seven minutes later Ralph Cox made it 2-0, as he skated from behind the UVM net, unmolested, to slip the puck past several skaters into the goal.

UVM worked hard for their only goal of the period. When Kinneal of UNH went off for the game's first penalty for cross checking, the Cats cashed in. Louis Cote brought the puck in from the right point and shot. Evans made the save, but the rebound came off the post to Dave Otness, who hit it again. Evans made a second save, but this time it came to Craig Homola, who shot the puck in past the goalie's right side.

UNH did not give the crowd long to savor the score, however. Again UNH was given the opportunity to take advantage of the goalie – once again out of position. Twelve seconds after Homola's goal, Cox came out from behind the net to Turcotte's left. Sylvain made the stop on Cox's weak shot but the rebound kicked out to Normand who had the right side of the goal wide open to shoot at.

In the second period UVM managed to stay even, trading 2 goals. UNH took a 4-1 lead as Gould made a nice play warding off two Cat defenders to skate straight in on Turcotte, the goalie and put the puck over him for a short handed goal. Duffy got a short hander, back as he got the puck at center from Randy Koch and skated in on Evans to beat him to the left side. This time it took the Wildcats seventeen seconds to answer. While on the powerplay, Burns broke in on the goaltender's left after a faceoff outside the blueline and to beat Turcotte with a hard low wrister to the far side.

Louis Cote helped even things up a bit when he took a hard shot from the left point on the powerplay, which bounced out to a waiting Randy Koch sliding the puck under Evans for the goal.

UNH did much to help UVM come back, with penalties of the hack variety. They were hit with a total of thirteen minors, about ten of which were cross checking, roughing, or high sticking, giving UVM a possible 26 minutes of powerplay. UNH was down five men to three twice for a total of a minute and thirty-one seconds without a goal by UVM. At 2:15 of the third period Louis Cote had a penalty shot for UVM which meant he got to take the puck in on Evans alone for the shot (much like a penlty kick in soccer). Cote faked to his left and put a weak backhander on goal which unfortunately stayed on the ice as Evans sprawling full-length just managed to get his stick in front if it. That prevented what would have been an easy score. That also prevented UVM from tieing the score when they got their fourth goal two minutes later. Andy Halford, from twenty-five feet straight out in front of the goalie, took the shot which Evans did well to stop with his

True Confessions Of A Snow Bunny

By Kimberly Honza

Ed. Note: Any similarities between the author and the main character of the story are strictly coincidental.

Saturday was a bit too cold even for a die-hard skiier like myself, so I took a short break to grab a cup of tea before I froze to death. I stopped in at the bar to see if there was anyone around that I knew, said a few hellos, and braced myself for the cold again.

"Wel-l, hello ther-e, Kimberely," a voice drawled from the far end of the bar. "Imagine findin' you in a place like this."

"Why Joan, Joan Ripps," my stomach cringed, "it's been a long time."

Not long enough, I reminded myself. A ghost from my high school days. After four years of skiing happily, I have to run into her here, in front of people I knew. I desperately plotted my escape.

But it was too late. I was already in the clutches of Joan's hands, and I noticed her long groomed nails were polished in a color that complimented her ski outfit. How many skiiers do you know with inch long nails?

"I want you to meet Mike," she said, placing me in front of good-looking bartender. "What are you drinkin', honey?" she asked. "Let me buy you a drink."

"Tea, please," I smiled weakly.

While Mike got the tea, Joan explained.

"Mike and I are goin' to a party tonight. It's for all the people who work here. Even this re-al gorgeous ski instructor, that I do believe I'm in love with. And, you know, I think he feels the same way. It was like love at first sight, you know what I mean?" she flashed her white teeth at me sympathetically.

Mike returned with the tea which I gulped down quickly in an effort to make my get-away.

"You want to take a run with me?" I asked.

"Why, hon, you know I can't stand to be outside if it's colder than 50 degrees," Joan giggled hysterically. The crowd was beginning to gather around, so I quietly slipped out, glancing once more over my shoulder at Joan balanced gracefully on her bar stool, a matching rust colored ski jacket and pants, with complimentary sweater and hat. No doubt her skis matched the sweater. I looked at my jeans and down vest.

Back on the slopes again, my concentration failing, I was haunted by memories of Joan Ripps on the ski slopes.

We met during my freshman year in high school; Joan had moved to our small town in northwestern Pennsylvania from Mobile, Alabama. She was a true Southern Belle, big eyes, a white smile of straight teeth, and a cute southern drawl that managed to say "Hi y'all" in the most seductive way.

Of course, we all took a liking to her, since she was such a novelty. Joan and I became allies, and shared our thoughts all during ninth grade.

Needless to say, Joan had a date her first weekend in town. Good old Jeff Bielby, a good-looking senior and captain of the ski team. In fact, I introduced them. Jeff and I had learned to ski together when we were kids.

"I really like him," Joan confided to me over the phone on Sunday. "But he keeps talkin' about skiing," she complained.

"It's a real big thing here," I explained, "Haven't you ever been skiing?"

"Hon, I haven't ever seen snow except in pictures. And he keeps talking about something being foam-filled. Doesn't he know I'm on the pill? Well, at least he kissed me goodnight," she sighed.

And so, I endured a September and October of Joan's complaints about Jeff's tales of skiing. Then came that fateful weekend at the end of November. "He's gone skiing!!" Joan wailed over the telephone. "He just packed up and left. He's gone for the whole weekend. What am I goin' to do?"

"Come skiing with me next weekend, and I'll teach you how, so that you can go along with Jeff sometime," I said gallantly.

"That'll be fun," Joan said cheering up some.

The following weekend arrived. Jeff went south to ski Camelback. Joan and I went to Elk Mountain, about six miles away.

"I didn't tell Jeff at all about this. I want him to be surprised on Monday," she beamed from the doorstep.

I stared. There she was in a navy blue parka, and maroon stretch pants, and a maroon sweater with navy stripes. Set up against the car were a pair of blue Nordicas — and blue Olin skis.

"You bought all this?" I asked astonished.

"Sho' enuf," drawled Joan, "I really want to learn how to ski."

So we went.

We started on the Bunny slope, and never got much farther. I spent around three hours with her, and finally managed to get Joan up the T-bar without accident. Getting down was another story.

"Hon, I'm gettin' cold," Joan complained. "Would ya mind skiin' a while without me, while I go inside?"

"Thank God!" I thought to myself. "No problem," I said to Joan.

I didn't see her on the slopes for the rest of the afternoon, and to tell you the truth, I never bothered to stop and check on her. After my last run, I found her at the bar.

"Oh, there she is," proclaimed Joan loudly to a group of guys around her. "This is Kimberely, she's been teaching me to ski today." The group turned to smile at me, then returned their attention back to Joan. When we finally left around two hours later, Joan had three weeks worth of free ski lessons lined up.

"That was so much fun," she exclaimed driving home. "Let's see, tomorrow I ski with Bill, and then on Monday afternoon I ski with Joe. Oh he's so cute, do you remember him? Then on Tuesday..." and on and on and on. "Thank you so much. That was great fun."

"What are you going to tell Jeff?" I asked.

"Who?" answered Joan, and that ended the subject.

That also ended Joan's and my friendship. She got all wrapped up in her skiing, and I was too. I went out for the ski team at school, and made varsity. Joan was on the slopes as much as I — always with some different and good-looking guy.

We exchanged pleasantries once in a while. She asked me if I was seeing Jeff, and I said no, he was just a good friend. Joan then confided in me that if I

We need certain college majors to become Air Force lieutenants.

Mechanical and civil engineering majors ... aerospace and aeronautical engineering majors ... electronics ... computer science ... mathematics majors.

The Air Force is looking for young men and women with academic majors such as these. If you're majoring in one of these areas, you may be eligible for either the two-year or the four-year Air Force ROTC program. And to help with the college bills, two, three, and four-year scholarships are available. These scholarships pay tuition, textbooks, lab fees, and $100 tax-free dollars a month. The Air Force ROTC program leads to an Air Force commission, an excellent starting salary, challenging work (with some of the finest equipment in the world), promotions, responsibility, graduate education and much more.

Find out today about an Air Force ROTC scholarship. It's a great way to serve your country and to help pay for your college education.

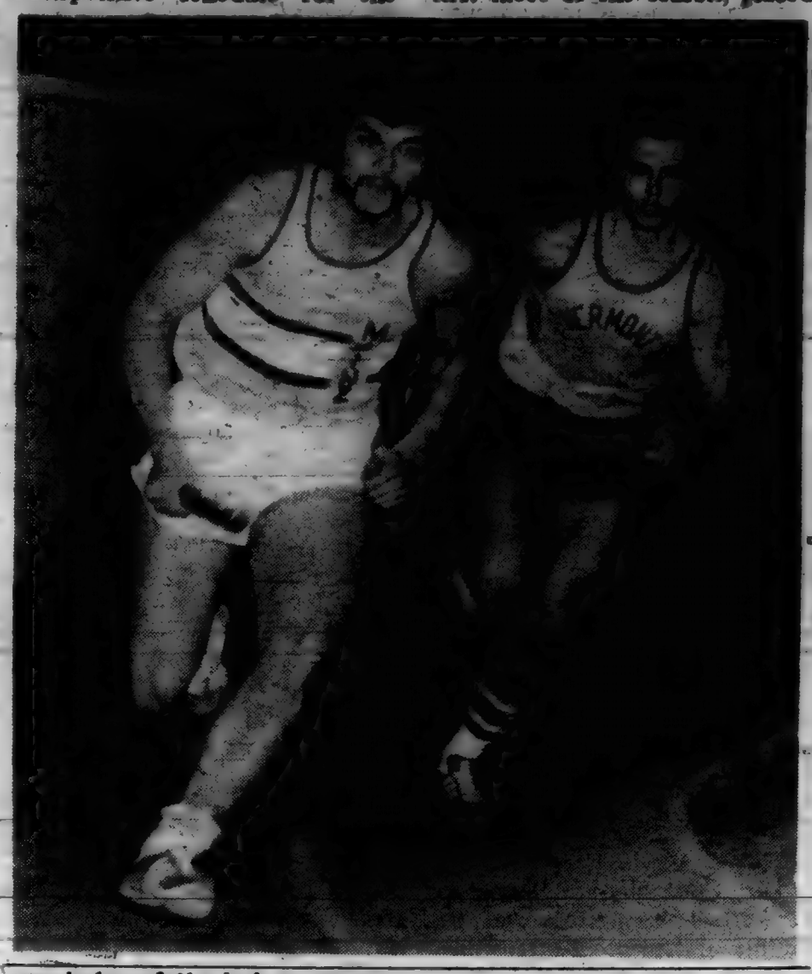
Track Team Features Accomplished Veterans

By Bernie Gagnon



After performing well in some pre-vacation meets, the Men's and Women's track teams are anxious to plunge headlong into their upcoming indoor schedule. Returning veterans will be the heart of the men's program, as all three captains hold major records. Dick Emberley is the current school record holder in the triple jump and 60 yard high hurdles. Craig Buscemi finished second in the Yankee Conference javelin throw last year, and also is a former record holder in the triple jump. Bernie Gagnon, the school record holder in the 60 and 220 yard dashes, finished second in the 440 yard run at Maine.

Also returning are Dwight Triblegorn, Ed Nemeth, Eric Benson and Jim Kauffman. Among the highlights of this group's individual performances are Triblehorn's second place finish in the 880 yard run at Maine, Kauffman placed second in the 50 yard high hurdles in the Christmas invitational, Nemeth came through with a third place finish in the 1000 yard run at Maine, and Benson pole vaulted his way to a second in the same meet.

Other veterans to watch as the season progresses are John Looney in the hurdles, Robby Mullin in the mile, and Tom Phillips in the two mile.

Leading a group of top notch freshmen, this year is Joe McClallen, Charlie Claudio and Bobby Frank. McClallen turned a meet record performance of 6.6 seconds in the 60 yard dash against Maine. He also placed third in the Pierre Charbonneau Memorial track meet in Montreal. Claudio established a new meet standard in the high jump at Maine with a leap of 6' 6½". In Montreal he jumped a superb 6' 7¾" to place third. In addition to the high jump, Charlie also threw the 35 pound weight well enough to place third against a very tough Maine squad. Bobby Frank set a new meet record in the 60 yard high hurdles at Maine with a 7.9 second clocking. Other talented freshmen to look for are Ryan Rickarby, a third finisher in the pole vault at Montreal with a vault of 13; and sprinter John Cushman.

The men's team faces a very competitive schedule for the remainder of the indoor season. This weekend the Cats will travel to Lewistown, Maine for a tri-meet with UNH and Bates. UVM lost this meet last year and they will have to be at their best if they hope to fare better this time. Later in the indoor season, the team travels to St. Lawrence to meet SLU and Colgate and then they host Plattsburgh and Albany in a triangular meet at Gutterson. The Cats cap their season with the Yankee Conference championships at URI and the New England at Tufts University in Boston.

The women's team has many fine athletes returning from last year, including Janet Lynch, Janet Terp, Marie Dowling and Carolyn Marinelli. Among last year's accomplishments, Terp and Lynch went on to the National Championships at UCLA. Lynch, fifth place finisher in the national pentathlon, was second in the 60 yard dash and 60 yard high hurdles and first in the long jump. Dowling, competing in her first meet of the season, placed second in the 440 yard run in the Maine contest. She was a member of last year's record setting 4 x 110 and 4 x 440 relays and has proven to be an excellent quarter miler here at Vermont. Marinelli, an outstanding all-around athlete, ran on UVM's winning 880 yard relay at Maine. She was also a member of the record setting 4 x 110 relay.

Freshmen have also proven themselves to be a great asset to the women's program. The mainstay of this new freshman squad appears to be in the running events. Led by distance stars Judy St. Helaire, a high school All-American, and Amy Bouchard, the girls have broken several records already this season. St. Helaire set meet and field house records in the 880 and mile runs against Maine. Lori Dane (Lyndon, Vt.), also a freshman, posted a new meet and house record in the 60 yard high hurdles with a time of 9.0 seconds.

Other freshmen to watch as the season progresses are Kaga Thornton and Barbara Luneau. These girls finished second and third, respectively, in the shot put at Maine.

The women's team will be running a new and highly competitive schedule this year. This weekend they compete in the UVM-GMAA relays held at UVM. Next, they tackle UMass and Albany. Later in their season they will travel to the Amherst Invitational and to the EIAW Championships at Tufts.

Basketball Report

Vermont Loses On The Road Again

By Steven Larose

A new twist was added to the saga of the fading University of Vermont Basketball team, as they were upended by Hofstra University, 75-72, Monday night in Hempstead, New York. It was the seventh loss without a victory on the road for the Cats, but unlike previous defeats, Vermont hung close all the way and was in contention until the final buzzer.

Vermont's narrowest margin of defeat up until the Hofstra contest was fifteen points, as a stagnant offense has not allowed Vermont to score over sixty points in seven defeats, while being routed by such giants as Oregon, New Mexico, and Mississippi State.

Vermont took command of the opening stanza, with some of the offensive patience of the Ohio State days returning. The Cats soon took a ten point first half lead. But Hofstra's pressing defense destroyed Vermont's rhythm and movement, causing a series of Cat turnovers and bad shots. Hofstra climbed back to a 45-43 lead at the half, and opened up the gap to nine points (65-56) with eight minutes left in the game.

The standout play of Jim Nocera, Mark Sobolewski and Dane Correll prevented another rout, as the trio paced the Cats in the closing minutes. With twenty-seven seconds remaining, Tyrone Johnson capitalized on a follow-up shot to cut Hofstra's lead to 74-72. On the next inbounds play, Vermont forced the Flying Dutchmen to turn the ball over to Sobolewski. He then went in for the breakaway lay-up that would have tied the game. But a Hofstra guard zoomed in from nowhere to steal the ball and was fouled on the play. He then made the first of two shots from the Charity Stripe and put the game on ice for Hofstra. It was a touch of irony for Sobolewski, who racked up a career high twenty-seven points, sinking eight of twelve from the field and hitting all eleven of his foul shots. In addition to Sobo's pointage, Jim Nocera continued to excel, with thirteen points. Mike Kern, coming off an injury, added twelve markers, all from the field. Dane Correll added eleven, and Tyrone Johnson pumped in four. Charlie Trapani had two along with Greg Davis and Corey Wielgus has one.

Vermont's mysterious road trip continues with a two-game set against the University of Maine in Orono this Friday and Saturday, as the Cats now support a 7-9 record. If the losing routine on the road continues, the Cats will be overjoyed to take on New Hampshire on February 8th, their next home contest at Patrick Gym.

St. Joseph's Blankets Vermont

By Steven Larose

The University of Vermont Basketball team followed its routine of faultering offensively early in the game and then getting trampled on, as St. Joseph's College handed Vermont a 85-59 loss Saturday afternoon in Philadelphia.

Vermont fell behind early in the game and could not come closer than twelve points in the final twenty minutes of play. St. Joseph's took advantage of a Vermont offensive lapse and ran up enough points before the half to put Vermont away 42-28 at the intermission. The Cats did have a glimmer of hope in the 1st half, as Jim Nocera and Dane Correll each tallied to pull Vermont within 2, 12-10 with 5:33 gone in the game. But then St. Joseph's ran off a streak of 8 points to leave Vermont in the dust. St. Joseph's opened up a 30-14 lead midway through the first half, and punctured a haphazard Vermont defense with a blistering 64% shooting clip in the 1st half.

Coach Peter Salzberg lamented that Vermont was still in a rut, blowing the game in the first half with an ineffective offense. "When we fall behind by so many points early in the game, we can't come back by matching the firepower of a team like St. Joseph's. Once we dig ourselves a hole, we can't climb out of it. We have to stay in touch to beat a quality team."

Top scorers for Vermont were Mark Sobolewski and Charlie Trapani, both with 11. Trapani continued to use muscle on the boards, pulling down 6 rebounds. Jim Nocera pumped in eight points, while Mike Kern and Dane Correll both hit four from the floor for eight points each. Tyrone Johnson continues to come on strong with six points, while defensive wizard Greg Davis had two points. Tom Perrin and Bruce Beynnon both rounded out the scorings with two each.

Coach Salzberg continued, "Even though we didn't have much of a chance at winning, I thought there were some things we could have done better. I was disappointed with our lack of offensive patience, our poor foul shooting, and our ineffective defense."

This loss drops Vermont's record to 7-8, with all eight losses occurring on the road. The loss to St. Joseph's only served to increase the Cats' frustration, and set the stage for Monday's dramatic loss to Hofstra.

Randy's Rebounds

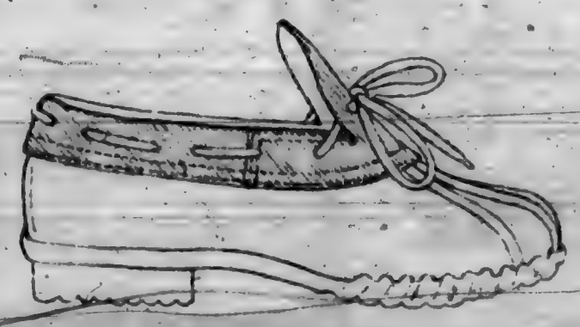
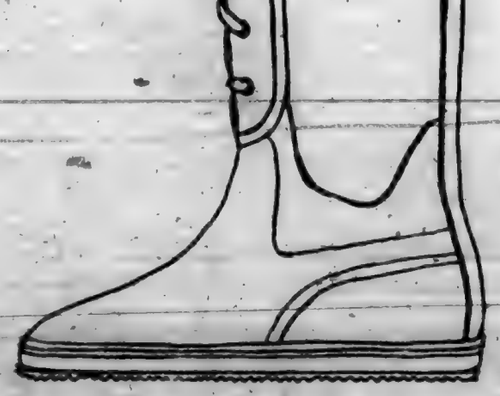
By Randy Briggs



After winning their first four games of the season, hopes were high in the University of Vermont basketball camp for continued success during the semester break. The Cats hoped that they had turned the corner with the great 77-76 victory over Ohio State. Many fans commented on how Vermont could never slump with the talent that they have. However, basketball is a game that can change very quickly; Vermont soon began to find that out.



Vermont's problems and inconsistencies quickly surfaced as the Cats hit the road to play Massachusetts and Fairfield. Vermont has never had too much success on the road; the victories have been few and far between. Vermont has not beaten UMass in Amherst since the pre-Julius Erving days.

Vermont's offensive headaches began during the first half of the UMass contest. The Cats failed to move the ball with the patience and crispness as they did in the first four games. Also, Vermont began to show signs of not moving when they don't have the ball. UVM played well in the second half but they had played themselves out of the contest in the opening half.

UVM's better skiers. The area is not as well suited for beginning skiers due to its steep, narrow trails, but it presents a challenge for those who want excitement. It's a very social place with all the trails meeting at the bottom, allowing the skiers to see their friends more frequently than in most areas. The apres-ski is attractive with a popular bar inside the hotel. The ski area began making snow three years ago but it is not extensive, limited only to the practice hill and base areas. The school uses the Austrian American ski method. Many of the people who come to Mad River are regulars from Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York and Vermont. Although lift lines are gradually increasing, by Sunday at noon the place clears out and it presents an excellent opportunity for an uncrowded afternoon of skiing. The area is becoming more popular around UVM as shown by the four-hundred season passes which were sold this year versus only one-hundred the year before. Mad River is characterised by beautifully groomed trails with the exception of "Paradise", a steep unmarked trail, reserved for only the highly experienced expert. The mogul filled chute becomes a favorite trail during the spring.

While Mad River is frequented by more experienced skiers, Smugglers Notch attracts many of the younger UVM students. The Notch area is equipped with thirty-two trails using three double chairlifts and one rope tow. The school there offers the A.T.M. Little or no snow making is used after the beginning weeks of the season. Nightly activities vary from folk singers to national rock bands, and include a disco lounge headed by a WQCR dj. Although the area is not overly crowded, Smugglers Notch officials report selling over 500 Pass Badges to students in the Burlington area. The area is equipped with thirty-five miles of cross country trails, including a cross country rental shop and school. Night tours with wine and cheese are offered regularly.

Sugarbush appears to be the most cosmopolitan ski resort in the area. It offers a great amount of apres-ski entertainment with Sugarbush village situated right at the base of the mountain. Its thirty-five trails and seven lifts can handle a great amount of people. The area has more of a reputation and tends to have a larger crowd of people using its well diversified trails. Its ski school teaches the Graduated Length Method and snow making and grooming is extensive. Although it was recently sold, the area should continue with few changes, offering the same diversified service to the local skiers.

Stowe has the reputation all over the United States of being well diversified for all levels of skiing. Its seven lifts, including a gondola, supplement a great number of trails in the tollhouse, mountain, and spruce areas. The ski school teaches with the accelerated ski method. Stowe's extensive nightlife throughout its sixty lodges offers the skier an almost unlimited supply of activities off the slopes. The only thing making most UVM students hesitate is the price, which is higher than many of the areas surrounding it. At the end of the day, however, the $15 lift ticket may well have been made up for through bargains in other areas of Stowe.

Cross country facilities in the Stowe, Sugarbush, Glen Ellen and Mad River area are good. One can choose from any of three touring centers: Tucker Hill, Sugarbush Inn, or Ole's (near the airport). There is a course linking each touring center for easy maneuvering between them.

As one can see, there is a wide variety of ski areas to choose from near UVM. The only problem now is to pick one. Each area has its regulars who swear it's the best and can give a new skier lots of advice on where to go. Much of it is personal opinion, but some of the facts have been included here.

Randy's Rebounds

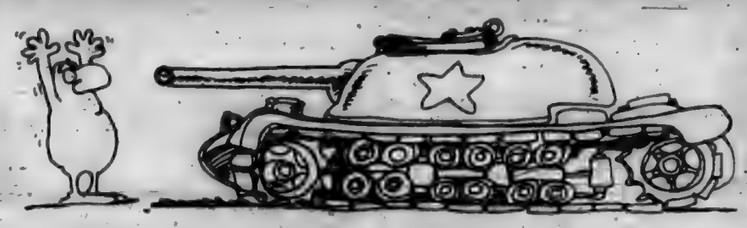
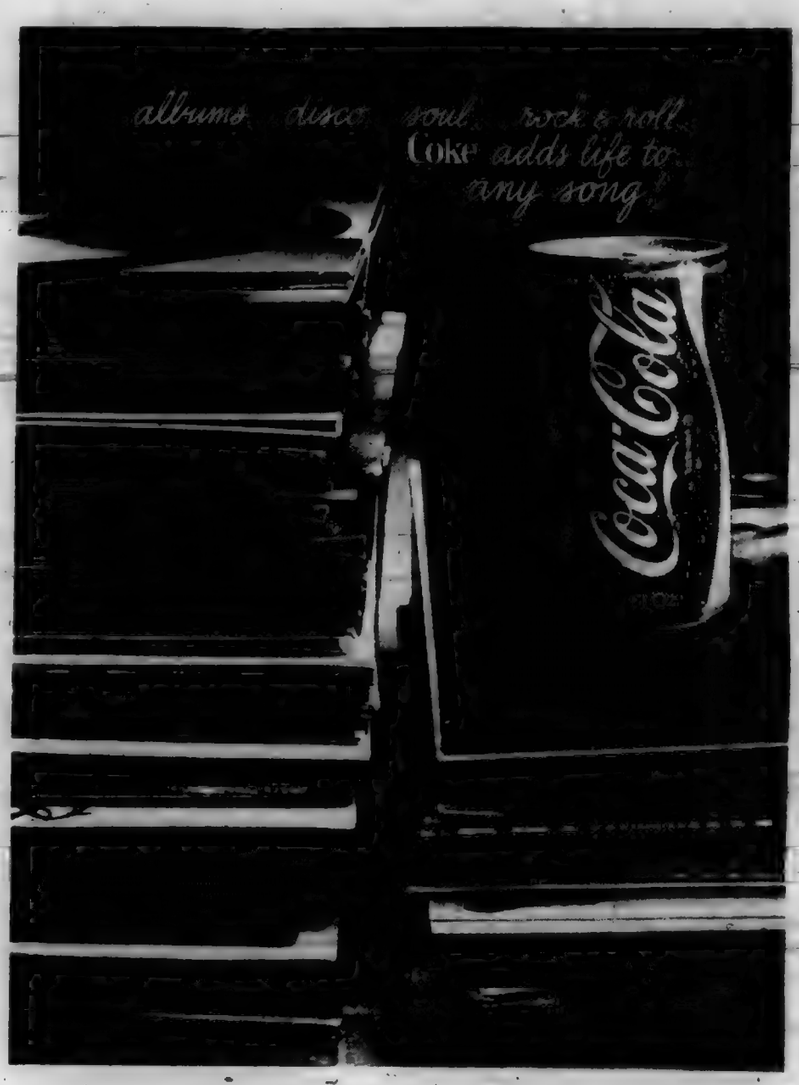
The UMass game proved to be a carbon copy of the Fairfield fiasco. Vermont displayed poor shooting, a lack of patience and fluidity at crucial periods. By half time Fairfield had the ball game wrapped up.



Poor offensive play continued to plague the Cats. The situation looked desperate in the Colgate game. Colgate tends to play a very slow game. Every mistake Vermont made against Colgate appeared larger than life, due to the slow pace. Vermont won 56-50, but Colgate gave Vermont a very tough battle.

UVM lost all three games by a large margin in New Mexico and Oregon, but everyone thought that the Cats would put everything together once they returned to the friendly confines of Patrick Gymnasium.



Of the three western contests, two of them were extremely weak offensively for the Cats, as they racked up only fifty and fifty-seven points totals against Mississippi and Oregon.

When Vermont returned home the Cats faced the Northeastern team which had beaten Vermont in four of their five last outings. This year the Huskies seemed much weaker than in the past. What unfurled that Saturday afternoon was enough to keep any Vermont fan away from Patrick for the rest of the season. In perhaps the worst game the Cats have played in two or three years Vermont was beaten by a team that played poorly itself. By scoring only fifty points the Cats' hopes

Charlie Catamount At Home

Charlie reads of the UNH disappointment.

By Whit Wagner

This year many of the seasoned UVM hockey fans have been asking themselves where team mascot Charlie Catamount is. Recently, I took it upon myself to find Charlie. First, I called UVM security to report Charlie as a missing person but they were of little help. After following some leads, an undisclosed source reported sighting Charlie at the UVM-Harvard game in Boston just before Thanksgiving.

As it turns out poor Charlie was snared outside of Watson rink after the game by a fur trapper. It took Charlie till the middle of January to escape, and I found him resting up in his apartment the Saturday of the UNH game.

Charlie was hesitant to discuss his recent experiences, but was kind enough to grant me the following interview, and our conversation turned to other matters.

Q. Charlie, this is quite a nice apartment you have here. How long have you been renting it.

A. Well, I found it just last week when I returned, but I was looking all fall – at least until I was trapped.

Q. What do you pay per month?

A. Two hundred and fifty, but I got a rake-off because I'm not a student.

Q. Are heat and hot water included?

A. Yeh, but I cover the utilities each month.

Q. Charlie, um, When I came in I saw a sand box in the kitchen and I was just wondering...?

A. Ugh! Ugh! Why don't we discuss UVM hockey, the fans, or something like that. O.K.

Q. Fine. Tell me, do you think the fans will be happy to see you again tonight?

A. Well, I hope so. But I can understand them being a little upset at my absence. But speaking of absences, I've heard the fellow in the yellow rainhat has been making appearances few and far between. I do hope he will return; he was always such a help in sparking the fans.

Q. Are you happy with the team this season?

A. After witnessing a shaky start at Harvard, I have been following the Cats very closely in the paper. It seems we're really flying now.

Q. Are you nervous about the UNH game tonight?

A. No, not really nervous; I'm rather excited. As you know, UNH is our big rival and the game is always great fun.

Q. Might I ask for a prediction?

A. It will be a close battle all the way, however, with the home advantage and a good effort by the fans the Cats should triumph.

Q. Do you enjoy being on regional ETV?

A. I'm a bit of a ham-bone at heart so I do love it. It also seems to spark the team to a good performance.

Q. Charlie, I think the readers would like to know more about you. We all see you cheering for the UVM sports teams, but what do you do with the rest of your time?

A. Well during the day I have a job as a stunt man for the remake of Born Free. I do all those things those fruity cats won't do. I don't get the exposure I'd like, but the pay is good.

Q. A movie actor! Have you been in any other films?

A. Well, I have been in a couple of others. You remember Frits the Cat... one of my earlier roles.

Q. No, I'm not familiar with that film. Was it another family f'lm, like Born Free?

A. Maybe for your family, but not mine!

Q. Well Charlie, it is drawing near game time and I am sure you have a number of things to do.

A. Yes, I was thinking of taking a short cat-nap before the game in fact.

Q. I should have realized. I'm terribly sorry. I want to thank you for chatting with me for a few minutes this afternoon and it's good to see you back. I hope to see you at all of the home games the rest of the season.

A. Well, you're welcome. The pleasure has been entirely yours.

glove, but unable to hold it he watched helplessly as it trickled behind him and Dave Otness nudged it in.

At this point UNH led only 5-4 and the Cats' chances looked good. Steady offensive pressure and careful defense could have produced a win for UVM. Instead, UNH got two quick goals that gave them the game on miscues in the Vermont zone and ill-timed penalties by the Cats. UVM did put enormous pressure on Evans during the final two periods, but gave him too many chances to make the easier glove saves with numerous belt high shots. Also UNH's defenders denied UVM the slot all night making it hard for UVM to get a man open in scoring position.

The loss dropped UVM from fifth to tied for tenth with UNH. The length of this single game drop indicates how close the middle of the division pack is. There are about ten teams currently in contention for five playoff spots. Of those ten, Cornell has reached championship form. They are probably too hot even for BU to handle. They have demolished four teams in a row, with ten goals a game or better. Though they are currently only 5-4, they have just gotten their act together after losing a number of early games by one goal margins. Among their victims are BC (13-3)/and Clarkson (10-2). That leaves nine teams fighting for four spots, knowing that five good teams are not going to make it.

The Wildcats, unlike Cornell, do not appear to be shooting through the standings on their way to greater things. Their win over UVM was not a flawless exhibition of hockey and although their offense is the third best in the ECAC, their defense is thirteenth. Chances are, at the end of the season, they'll be battling UVM, among many others, for the seventh or eighth playoff spot. Comparing UVM and UNH, the Cats have six of the last thirteen at home while UNH has four of eleven at home. Because UNH plays more games, UVM has a percentage advantage if they win the same number of games over .500. For example, if UVM winds up 13-10 and .565, UNH at 3 games over .500 would be at 14-11, .560. UVM however probably plays the most demanding schedule in the league down the stretch. Eight of the Cats' final games are against teams currently in the top eight; five against the top four. UNH, on the other hand, plays six with the top eight and four with the top four. They have played the BU twice already however and Cornell once, losing all three. Since UVM has played three games against those two, and meets UNH, which is not included in the top eight as Providence is not, there are really ten games left against the contenders and only three easy games. To look at the dark side of things, all of these are upset threats. Nonetheless, it is possible to imagine the Cats taking the easy three and splitting the other ten. That should give UVM a playoff spot somewhere and the hope for the upset role

Middlebury

But for any that doubt that UVM should have left the safety and comfort of Division II, there are always games like Middlebury. Vermont showed that it can still beat the strong men of Division II, winning 5-2 on an off night.

Louis Cote, who had 3 points in the game, is fast becoming UVM's most valuable player on offense as well as defense. Cross relies on him heavily and only the goalie spends more time on the ice than Louis Cote. Cote has 6 goals and 22 assists this season for a total of 28 points to lead the Cats in scoring. This puts him within 3 points of his freshman total that set a record for UVM rookie defensemen. Vermont relies heavily on Cote's ability to unselfishly move the puck and set up the offense.

As a testimony to Vermont's dominance of its Div. II foes, Tony Frost, playing the last two Div. II games against Middlebury, and Holy Cross, has had to make 34 saves while his counterparts had to make seventy-three. Middlebury's only previous loss was here in Middlebury against Holy Cross 7-6 in OT. HC came to Burlington the next night and lost 8-3. Meanwhile the Cats have Providence to worry about Wednesday night. The Friars are only 5-7, but have improved after a disastrous start and seem ready to start being serious contenders for the playoffs.

The Terrible Terriers Are Coming!

By Jim Fletcher

An unbeaten top ranked Boston University hockey team will try to extend their winning streak to 17 games when they take on the University of Vermont Catamounts this Saturday at Gutterson.

They are called Terriers and sometimes Terrors. But Terriers are supposed to bite and never let go. BU is more like a team of greyhounds that catch the rabbit just before the finish line. So let's compromise and call them Dogs. We'd call them puppies, but puppies don't "go" 16-0.

"Lucky dogs" is a phrase that aptly describes BU's squad. After losing 11 players, they had to be one of the luckiest teams of all time last season. BU finished the season at 16-7-1, including 5-0-1 in overtime games.

There were a lot of similarities between last year's BU team and the UVM squad of two years ago. That was the year that the Cats got off to a terrible start, playing 17 of their first 21 games on the road. Last year's BU team had 11 of their first 13 games on the road. Both teams opened their seasons by losing two games to the CCHA preseason favorite. Both teams lost their first league game in a 12 goal contest (UVM 8-4 to the Saints, BU 9-3 to the Friars). Both teams lost 13 goal games to Dartmouth on December 1st, giving up a hat trick and a goal in the last minute to Mark Culhane. It was the Cat's first home loss since losing to BU 7-6 and BU's first home loss since losing to UVM 7-6.

BU's luck hasn't let up this season. They've won six games by one goal, their last coming over Princeton 4-3, six games ago. They beat St. Lawrence 8-3 after leading by only 2-1 after two periods. They scored four goals in the third period to beat BC last Saturday 6-3.

Lucky or not, six items indicate a Catamount victory Saturday night:

(1) The Cats beat BU 4 years ago and again 2 years ago; Colgate beat them 3 years ago and again last year. Thus, it's our turn to win.

(2) The Cats are undefeated against undefeated teams this season. (We beat Clarkson 3-1).

(3) When Glynne, Lebeau, Koch and MacFarlane scored twice to beat the Dogs two years ago, BU was undefeated and number one in the country. The Cats also had serious injury problems. The situation is similar this year.

(4) The Cats have yet to be beaten by a come from behind effort in the third period.

(5) The Cats always win the last game I go to before my birthday.

(6) BU always loses at least one game in January.

Randy's Rebounds

for a good season really went down the drain that afternoon.

Vermont rebounded with a big win by beating BU 89-87 at Patrick. Vermont scored eighty-two points in a win over Brandeis also at home. That evened UVM's record off at 7-7 and the Cats had visions that they were getting their act together offensively.

The Cats traveled to Philadelphia last Saturday to take on St. Josephs. Another poor offensive showing led to a quick defeat. It marked the fifth time this year Vermont has scored sixty or less points in a game. As you may have guessed, the Cats lost four of those games. The problem has been on offense. Lack of movement and poor shooting has led to embarrassing defeats in games that could have gone either way.

UVM Skiers Glide To SLU Carnival Title

By Amanda Miller

Calvin Erdman put together two solid days of skiing to pace the University of Vermont Men's Ski Team past Williams, St. Lawrence and Middlebury at the St. Lawrence University Winter Carnival, held in Colton, New York last Friday and Saturday.

Vermont finished the two day event with a score of 123, easily outdistancing Williams, 82, SLU, 62, and Middlebury, 35. In the Women's events, Vermont placed second with a 148 total behind Middlebury's 162.5. Vermont has now won the SLU Carnival for three years in a row.

Erdman swept the Men's Slalom event with a 50.80 time. Brooks Dodge finished third in that event for UVM, with a 51.28 score. Richard Wright and Steve Clayton finished fourth and fifth, respectively, with time of 51.45 and 51.80.

Denny Lambert had the two longest jumps of the day, winning the men's jumping event with 202.2 points. Vermont's Dave Larson took second with a 195.8 total.

In the women's Slalom event, Muffy Arndt of Vermont placed third with a two run combined time of 57.35.

Coach Chip LaCasse will now have to wait until February 3-4th for Vermont's big test, as UVM hosts its own Carnival with all the top racers scheduled to compete. Vermont's ski team featured excellent depth, as LaCasse pointed out by stating "there isn't much difference between our "A" and "B" teams. We skied very well during both days of the St. Lawrence meet, and I hope our strength continues."

Claudio and Terp Win Track Honors

Two University of Vermont track and field athletes, Charles Claudio and Janet Terp were named the outstanding athletes of the Green Mountain Athletic Association Relays held Saturday morning.

Claudio threw the 35 pound weight 49' 2½", the shotput 38'1" and high jumped 6'2" to take the top male award.

Terp was voted top female honors by competing in all the pentathlon events, and winning both the long jump and the high jump. Terp long jumped 18'1½", just one half inch under the Gardner-Collins cage record. Terp also high jumped 5'2", threw the shot 30'7", ran the fifty meter hurdles in 7.8 seconds and ran the 800 meters in 2:41.0. Her point total came to 3325, and enabled her to qualify for the Eastern Woman's Championship.

Outstanding performances were also turned in by Judy St. Hilaire in the mile run (5:14) and in the 800 meters (2:21.8), Kaja Thornton hurled the shot for 36'1" and Amy Bouchard gave UVM another first by winning the two-mile in 11:42, while also running the mile in 5:27.

In the Men's events, freshman Joe McClallen won the 50 meter dash in :519 seconds, while Robert Frank placed first in the 50 meter hurdles, with a elapsed time of only 7.1 seconds. Bernard Gagnon took first in the 400 meters event with a 53.0 second run. Richard Emberly won both the long jump at 20'6" and the triple jump with a 42'5½" leap. Senior Robert Mullen captured first in the one mile run with a time of 4:24.9.

Aqua Cats Are Back

The University of Vermont men's swim team has spent semester break in Florida preparing for an important meet this weekend against the University of Connecticut at Connecticut. The Aqua Cats are coming off two early season losses to University of Maine and St. Lawrence University, but the team is determined to change the tide. The swim team has been working vigorously. The hard work was capped off with a special training program at the University of Miami.

The Florida program was made possible by the funds raised by the Swim-a-thon and Orange sale held earlier this year. During the Florida trip the swim team was not only able to swim during most of the vacation, but were able to get extra pool time. Two hours in the morning and another two in the evening, yardage totaling over 12,000 a day enabled the swim team to build up their endurance and stamina, which should be an important edge over future competition.

Snow Bunny

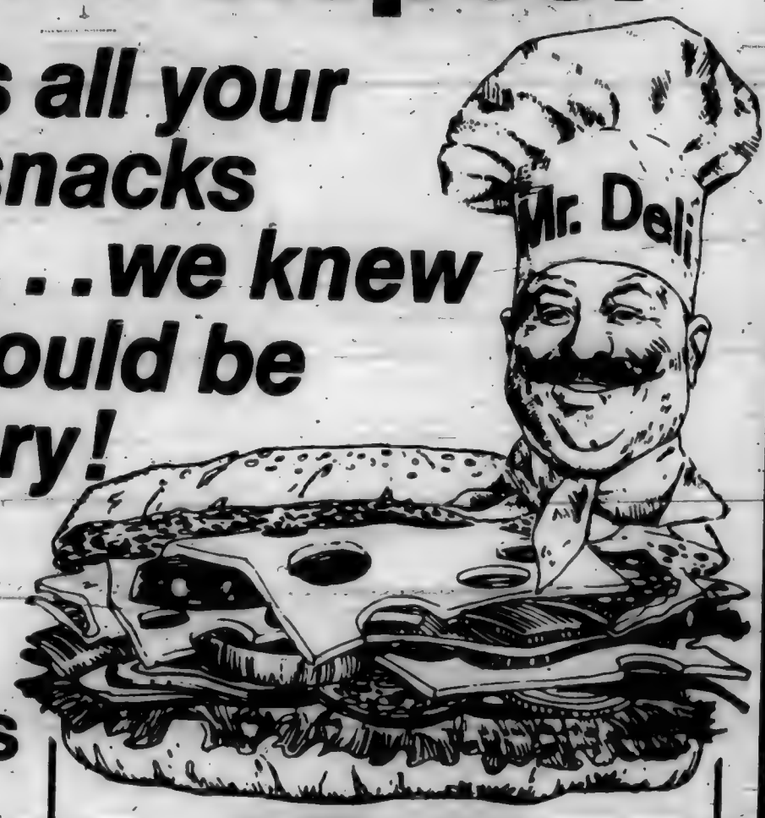
wanted to go out with him, that I shouldn't compete with him, but make him feel "masculine" by playing helpless.

"It's all a game," Joan said. "But it's fun and it works."

So, that's what I saw of Joan for the rest of high school. You could always pick her out on the slopes in a flashy new outfit, or in the bar, with a group of guys around. I don't think she ever even learned a stem christie, but I do think she mastered the T-bar.

Now you know why it was such a shock when I saw Joan on Saturday. It always horrified me when I think I turned a snow bunny loose on the slopes. There are enough of them around as it is without Joan Ripps.

I got off the lift for my last run right ahead of one of the guys on patrol. I wiped out on some ice trying to pull some fancy stuff, and he was right behind me, checking to see if I was okay. He was kind of cute. I do believe I'm in love with him. And, you know, I think he feels the same way. It was like love at first sight, you know what I mean?



I thought about all the stuff Joan always said when I skied down slowly ahead of him. Maybe she was right. I smiled sweetly up at him, sipping wine in front of the fire. He really was good looking.

I wonder how I'd look in a rust-colored ski outfit?

After an exciting day on the slopes!

TOM, DICK AND HARRY (1941)
Directed by Garson Kanin; Ginger Rogers, George Murphy.

Sincere Murphy, wealthy Alan Marshall, or nonconformist Burgess Meredith? Which suitor should Ginger choose? Phil Silvers has a good role in this spirited comedy as well.

INTERMEZZO (1939)
Directed by Gregory Ratoff; Leslie Howard, Ingrid Bergman.

Famous love story about violinist having an affair with his musical protogee. Famous cast, including Ingrid Bergman in her English film debut and an equally famous musical score.

WOMAN OF THE YEAR (1942)
Directed by George Stevens; Katherine Hepburn, Spencer Tracy.

This is the first time Tracy and Hepburn were teamed and the results are hilarious. Hepburn is a political commentator and Tracy is a sports writer who tones down her act.

THE BARKLEYS OF BROADWAY (1949)
Directed by Charles Walters; Fred Astaire, Ginger Rogers, Oscar Levant, Billie Burke.

MGM brought Astaire and Rogers back together for the final time in a tuneful story about a showbiz couple who have some marital difficulties. Fred dances with scores of shoes in one sequence. Good songs and good entertainment.

BORN YESTERDAY (1950)
Directed by George Cukor; Judy Holliday, William Holden, Broderick Crawford.

Oscar-winning performance by Judy Holliday as mobster Crawford's girlfriend. He wants her to be more cultured so he hires Holden to teach her some class. Sparkling film.

A PLACE IN THE SUN (1951)
Directed by George Stevens; Montgomery Clift, Elizabeth Taylor, Shelley Winters, Keefe Braselle, Raymond Burr

Adaptation of AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY with plain Winters losing Clift to stunning Taylor. Film won six Oscars and everyone in the production does well, especially Clift and Winters.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES (1953)
Directed by Howard Hawks; Marilyn Monroe, Jane Russell, Charles Coburn, Tommy Noonan

Anita Loos' famous story about two gals from Little Rock who make it big in Paris is updated and brought to the screen with a lot of zest, color, and fine tunes. Monroe, of course, is exciting as Lorelie Lee, and Jane Russell has a fascinating way with a line.

April 30
THE COUNTRY GIRL (1954)
Directed by George Seaton; Bing Crosby, Grace Kelly, William Holden, Anthony Ross

Grace Kelly shines in this Oscar-winning performance as the wife of alcoholic singer Crosby. William Holden plays a director who helps Crosby make a come-back. Bing in one of his finest performances ever.

NO MAN OF HER OWN (1932)
Directed by Wesley Ruggles; Carole Lombard, Clark Gable, Dorothy Mackaill

This is the one and only time these two famous stars ever appeared together in the same film. Gable is a shady guy who falls for librarian Lombard and she sets out to change his ways.

February 1
MANHATTAN MELODRAMA (1934)
Directed by W. S. VanDyke; Clark Gable, William Powell, Myrna Loy, Isabelle Jewell, Leo Carillo, Mickey Rooney

Boyhood pals grow up to become gangster and D.A. Their friendship is finally destroyed over the love of Myrna Loy. Interesting conflicts and solid cast make this a worthwhile film.

February 8
MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY (1935)
Directed by Frank Lloyd; Clark Gable, Charles Laughton, Franchot Tone, Donald Crisp, Movita

Best Picture of 1935 and still better than the Marlon Brando remake of 1962. Tale of worldwide ocean voyage with Fletcher Christian and crew against Captain Bligh. Excellent cast.

GONE WITH THE WIND (1939)
Directed by Victor Fleming; Clark Gable, Vivien Leigh, Olivia DeHavilland, Leslie Howard, Thomas Mitchell, Hattie McDaniel.

Fabulous picture with unforgettable performances and photography. One of the greatest examples of storytelling on film. Gable at his best as Rhett Butler, Leigh won Oscar for her role as Scarlett O'Hara.

February 22
MOGAMBO (1953)
Directed by John Ford; Clark Gable, Ava Gardner, Grace Kelly

Twenty-one years after making RED DUST with Jean Harlow, Gable starred in the remake. Ava plays the Harlow role, and Kelly has the old Mary Astor part. Set in Africa, this lusty story combines good acting with excellent scenery.

THE MISFITS (1961)
Directed by John Huston; Clark Gable, Marilyn Monroe, Montgomery Clift, Thelma Ritter, Eli Wallach, Estelle Winwood

Gable and Monroe's last film. Arthur Miller story about a divorcee who gets involved with her cowboy friends. Engrossing performances in an uneven film.

THE MALTESE FALCON (1941)
Directed by John Huston; Humphrey Bogart, Mary Astor, Peter Lorre, Sidney Greenstreet, Gladys George

Dashiell Hammett's Sam Spade character is involved with some of the most famous detective movie characters ever. Mary Astor as the two-faced client, Sidney Greenstreet as the Fat Man, and Peter Lorre as Joe Cairo. The film moves at a quick pace and the entire cast makes this one a thriller.

TO HAVE AND HAVE NOT (1944)
Directed by Howard Hawks; Humphrey Bogart, Lauren Bacall

Scenes between Bogie and Bacall are the highpoints of this well-made adaptation of Hemingway story about a skipper-for-hire. Lots of WWII intrigue."

DEAD RECKONING (1947)
Directed by John Cromwell; Humphrey Bogart, Lizabeth Scott

Bogart plays a WWII veteran who goes out to solve former soldier-buddy's murder. Good performances and solid supporting cast.

TREASURE OF THE SIERRA MADRE (1948)
Directed by John Huston; Humphrey Bogart, Walter Huston, Tim Holt, Bruce Bennett

Gold fever strikes again, this time in the form of greed and the sometimes vicious human nature. Bogart, Huston, and Holt are prospectors. Walter Huston won an Oscar for Best Supporting actor. Well directed and acted drama.

AFRICAN QUEEN (1952)
Directed by John Huston; Katherine Hepburn, Humphrey Bogart

Oscar winning performance of Bogart as a drinking sea-dog who travels up the Congo with spinster Hepburn. Together, they fight the "elements and the Germans."

April 26
IN A LONELY PLACE (1950)
Directed by Nicholas Ray; Humphrey Bogart, Gloria Graham

Screen writer Bogart falls for Grahame, who later helps him clear his name when he's accused of murder. Off-beat story and good performances.

Punk Rock: "Magnesium Flash— Burning Cities— Dead Fleshy Carcasses— DEATH, DEATH, DEATH!"

By Peter Relick

Show me someone with bright red and yellow hair, sequined eyes, and enough metal hanging off of them to put the hardware department at Sears Roebuck to shame, and I'll show you a Punk Rocker.

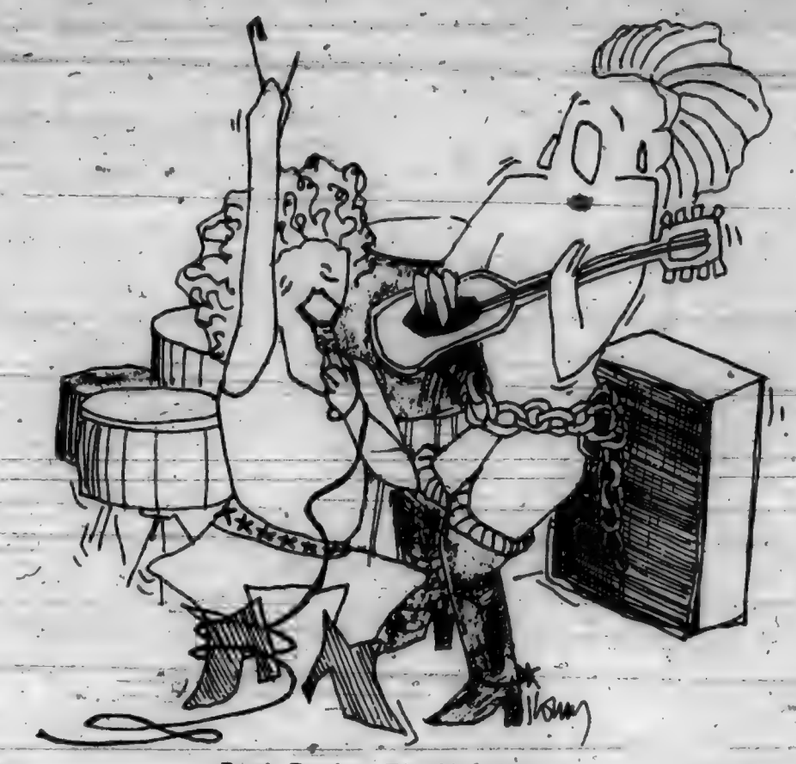
This however is not the image that every Punk Rock band wants to project. The Talking Heads, for example, are all Harvard graduates that wear Oxford shirts in concert. Aren't you glad you go to UVM?

Perhaps the most important part of any act is the music, and to support a common notion, Punk Rock is about as low as one can get musically. The melodies are simple, the chords elementary, and the beat is the real stable force on which the rest of the piece is built. The music is reminiscent of an early, hard-driving Rolling Stones number, and much of it can actually be enjoyable. Thus, punk has been called the "New Wave," although it is merely a rehash of what we heard fifteen to eighteen years ago. In fact, a melody probably could not be discerned as Punk unless the group was known to be a Punk band.

Unfortunately for the Punk Rockers, their music lacks variation. Patti Smith, a "former" Punk Rocker, justified her breakaway from the Punk clan by saying, "When you're going for God you don't stop at three chords." Whether Patti will reach the pearly gates with her music is another subject entirely, but she does sum up the structure of most Punk songs well.

I had the privilege of attending a performance of what is probably one of the least known Punk bands in existence, the Molls. I saw them at a notorious Punk Rock bar in Boston called The Rat. Along with approximately twenty other eccentrics who had paid the dollar cover charge, I listened to the Molls as they screamed, whined, and generally hacked through their selections.

It has been said many times that a gimic is needed to make it in music, and the Molls sure had one. It was an electric bassoon which the musicians playing it must have just bought that afternoon, because he obviously han little time to practice. The music was loud, pulsating, and full of energy. The lyrics were just as loud, both in content and volume, considering most of the songs were shouted.



I felt myself beginning to mellow out after a few drinks, but I was suddenly awakened by the lead singer – or should I say shouter – blasting out his impression of an atomic war. His voice echoed through the tiny bar –

"MAGNESIUM FLASH – DEAD FLESHY CARCASSES – BURNING CITIES – DEATH, DEATH, DEATH!"

I was mildly impressed, and I returned my attention to my drink.

A bit later on the audience was presented with a little ditty entitled "Chesty Morgan," and they followed that with a longer number with the title, "White Strains on Black Sheets."

Reflecting back, I don't think my dollar was actually wasted. I was entertained, and I felt good about helping the band buy a good square meal, because from the looks of some of the members it seems that they had missed quite a few dinners playing six o'clock gigs.

Punk Rock — The New Wave?

Is Punk Rock here to stay? It is hard to say outright whether it will be a lasting musical form. As with any type of music, there are good groups and bad ones. Some of the more well-known bands are the Talking Heads, the Ramones, Television, and of course, The Sex Pistols. It seems that Punk Rockers have outraged everyone from the British Parliament to concert audiences. And this one fact alone is reminiscent of "Elvis the Pelvis" and the reviews and controversy which centered around his gyrations. But if that guy made it to the big time and stayed, why can't a couple of blokes from England who have fun throwing up on people in airports?

One of the big differences between the King of Rock 'n Roll and today's "New Wave" is that the Punk Rockers are not as widely accepted by the public. This was evident by the empty seats which the Sex Pistols played for in many cities on their recent American tour.

Being a believer in strong convictions and an iron will, I will go ahead and stick out my neck and credibility by predicting that Punk Rock will become as obsolete as the Nehru jacket. (Remember them?)

Elvis had a few things going for him which helped him become a superstar. Musically, he had some substance, and he was accepted by the masses as their sex symbol. Musically, the Punk Rockers can only pray for divine assistance, and we already have Shawn Cassidy, so why do we need some undernourished screamers to oogle over? At least Cassidy can sing.

At this time, however, Punk does serve a purpose. It is the rebellious, untamed section of society crying for release from the structures imposed upon them. This is probably best witnessed in the Sex Pistols opening line of their hit song – "God Save the Queen, she ain't no human being."

Some of the better groups, such as the Ramones, have some great material, and they must be congratulated. But are their songs just a rehash of the same pieces we heard in the early sixties? Did the roots of Rock 'n Roll die, or are they being revived again by the Punk Rockers of today? Will the Dead Boys come back to life?

In spite of any plusses which Punk Rock has contributed to the music scene, this is one stage-side observer who feels their reign will be short lived. And a few years from now we won't be talking about Johnny Rotten and Sid Vicious at dinner parties, instead we'll be saying "The Sex Who?"

University Players To Present "State of Siege"

Thomas Dibble, director of State Of Seige

"Camus supports liberty in relationship to all governments. Granted, it was written in 1948, but it concerns the human condition and is applicable to any time or place."

After an intensive rehearsal period, the University Players are putting finishing touches on the United States premiere presentation of Albert Camus' State of Siege. The play will open on Tuesday, January 31, at the Royall Tyler Theatre and run through Saturday, February 4.

Thomas Dibble, the director and a UVM student, studied at the National Mime Theatre in Boston and originally picked up the play at the Salvation Army. "I read the book," he said, "and I immediately saw the entire show. We had auditions in November which is earlier than usual, but necessary for a show of this calibre. I needed to expose the actors to pantomime, mask work, and vocal work."

Dibble remained in Burlington after Christmas, and the cast joined him during the first week of January. In addition to the background research involved in producing the work, Director Dibble has offered workshops in movement and mask-making to cast members and interested persons. To help each person mold his character, Dibble has presented the acting techniques of six different masters – Artaud, Michael, Chekov, Barreault, Grotowski, and Stanislovski. A free-form spectacle of dramatic expression, State of Siege includes mime, masks, dance, and choral arrangements in addition to acting, costumes, lighting, etc. "We've created the city of Cadiz in the theatre by taking the scenery and action away from center stage," said Dibble, "at times involving the audience on all sides."

Camus wrote State of Siege in 1948 and he considers it to be the work "that most resembles me." Camus united many different dramatic expressions into this work, and the director has combined these with "a lot of very serious dialogue and dramatic tension." "The play deals with human goodness and it has a very positive ethical point of view," Dibble added. "Camus supports liberty in relationship to all governments. Granted, it was written in 1948, but it concerns the human condition and is applicable to any time or place."

The music for the performance was composed by Donald Swinchowski. Steven Cisco is the technical director, and Beth Feidner is the stage manager. Again, State of Siege will run through Saturday, February 4, and all performances are at 8:00 p.m. For additional information, call 656-2094.

Spielberg's Worst Encounters

By Vaune Davis

The sky is full of questions. And so was I after seeing Close Encounters of the Third Kind. I just could not understand why Director Steven Spielberg took such a long time telling a simple and potentially touching story.

Strange things happen in Close Encounters. Inanimate objects move around at night, people disappear mysteriously, cloud banks roll back with all the splendor of the Red Sea in The Ten Commandments, and UFO's come whizzing through, plaging entire midwestern towns with inexplainable phenomena and incandescent light. These incidents are all very curious but, unfortunately, they continue for an hour and a half to the point where the movie seems ludicrous.

But these are mere encounters of the first kind, sightings and hints of extraterrestrial life, and are interesting because of the technical wizardry of Doug Trumbull, who also created the special effects for 2001. It is in the second kind encounters, however, that the plot slows to an almost nonexistent pace.

Encounters of the second kind are encounters of the mind, involving extra-sensory communication with the unknown beings. In Muncie, Indiana, Roy Neary, played by Richard Dreyfuss, and a young mother, Marsha Dillon, whose child was taken by one of the UFOs, are possessed by the mystery of the arrival. They have visions and dreams and they subconsciously hum a simple tune that they have never heard before. In India, two thousand people have gathered to chant this same tune. Francois Truffaut, whose role in Close Encounters is an insult to his talent, is on hand as the french UFO expert Lacombe, and he astutely notes the connection between the Indians' mental encounter and other incidents.

Meanwhile, back in Muncie, Dreyfuss and Dillon are still obsessed with visions but have progressed to a more complicated task. Without knowing why they are compelled to do so, they sculpt a mountain they envision out of clay, dirt, shaving cream and mashed potatoes. These cosmic connections and feats of engineering persist until the meaning of the second kind encounters is lost in absurdity.

Eventually, the two have a direct encounter with the extra-terrestrial beings. And at last we see a close encounter of the third kind. But by that time I was too frustrated by the sluggish plot to enjoy the spectacle, much less relate to Spielberg's message about brotherhood and love.

The reason that Close Encounters of the Third Kind fails so miserably is not because of an overabundance of special effects – Trumbull is a master at this and there could never be enough – but in Spielberg's failure to pair them with an equally interesting plot.

I hope that Steven Spielberg uses more coordination in producing his next movie Growing Up, which will be about his suburban life in places like Scottsdale, Arizona and Haddonfield, New Jersey. But from the direction he is heading, Growing Up will probably include Sensurround sound.

The Turning Point - A Movie about the Art

By Vaune Davis

Some movies are propelled by the sheer force of the actors themselves. The Turning Point is not such a movie. It has even more.

Set against the background of the ballet world, The Turning Point involves the relationship between two aging ballerinas. Shirley MacLaine plays Edie, who finds herself discontent over her decision to give up her promising career for marriage and children. The other, played by Ann Bancroft, devoted her life to the art, but formed no permanent romantic relationship.

The two women are reunited in New York years after making their choices and find themselves caught between their intense friendship and their jealousy for each other's success. This conflict is so well developed that little else is needed for an excellent psychological drama.

Nevertheless, Edie's talented young daughter becomes caught between the women's clashing emotions as she too must choose between men and ballet. Although her acting ability seems minimal in comparison to the performances of Ann Bancroft and Shirley MacLaine, her position within the drama is important because it stirs the women's feelings, dormant for so many years, and brings them alive to the audience.

In addition to the excellent acting and character development, the artistic side of ballet is not neglected. Producer and director Herbert Ross succeeded in capturing the spirit of the dance without making it seem confined by the two dimensional screen. Neither did he film it with any spectacular lights or unusual angles to exaggerate excitement. The ballet is just there – pure and beautiful.

But this success does not lie in the filming alone. It is the outstanding Russian dancer Mikhail Baryshnikov that made The Turning Point into more than just a movie about ballet dancers. With Baryshnikov, it is a movie about the art.

Baryshnikov plays the egotistical star of the American Ballet Company who becomes the young girl's lover. His appearance is ordinary – about 5 foot 7 and heavy set with dirty blond hair and blue eyes – yet his style is a combination of elegance and daring that is truly unique. "An audience," Baryshnikov has said, "must be made to feel the stage isn't big enough to hold the dancer."

Unlike most films with artists, The Turning Point does not overly romanticize the lives of the two women. Perhaps this is its finest quality – a realistic portrayal of a very complicated personality.

NOVELS

By Scott C. Sartorius

Beggarman, Thief, by Irwin Shaw; Delacorte Press, 436 pp, $9.95.

The Jordache family has survived another round of toil and tribulation, only this time, fortunately for them, it wasn't some sort of TV drama.

Irwin Shaw's newest novel, Beggarman, Thief, is the sequel to his best-selling book, Rich Man, Poor Man, and involves the remaining members of the ill-fated Jordaches. The avid television viewer will no doubt recall that the original story was converted into a seven part "TV novel" and was quite high in the Nielson ratings.

Shaw has, however, prefaced Beggarman with the following:

Ordinarily, there is no need for a preface for a novel, but because of the television presentation of Rich Man, Poor Man (Part I and Part II), I believe the readers of Beggarman, Thief should know that the new book is a sequel to the printed version of Rich Man, Poor Man, not the televised one, and any similarities to the Part II television offering are purely coincidental.

The book flap says Beggarman is the sequel to Rich Man, Poor Man, but adds that as a novel, it can stand by itself. The trouble here lies in the fact that much of what occurs in Beggarman is based on the death and past personality of Thomas Jordache. Because Thomas is never described adequately in Beggarman, something that took an entire novel to do, the Beggarman reader who has been deprived of Rich Man, Poor Man will lose much of the book's impact. The reason is simply that in Beggarman, the "new generation" of Jordaches take center stage, perhaps the most important of this group being Wesley Jordache, Thomas' son. It is true that most members of the original Rich Man, Poor Man essence of this book revolves around the sons of two of the original characters — sons who were too young to play an important part in the first book, but who have now been molded by events past.

As in most of Shaw's novels, the scenes from Beggarman take place in varied locations in both Europe and the United States — from the classiest Paris hotels to the dismal Hudson River town of Port Philip, New York, the starting point of Rich Man, Poor Man. Shaw continues with the further adventures of the original Jordaches — Gretchen, now a movie director, and Rudolph, retired but still rich and as busy as ever bailing out fellow family members. He also delves with greater detail into the lives of many of the other original characters — Billy, Gretchen's son; Jean and Enid, Rudolph's wife and daughter; Kate and Dwyer, Tom's second wife and deckhand; and Wesley, Tom's son.

The theme throughout the book is one of revenge — Wesley's unconscious desire to revenge the murder of his father, but Shaw spices the events with frequent sub-plots which include a terrorist girlfriend and her not so desirable counterparts, Time magazine reporters and lovers, divorces, affairs and more affairs. Any Shaw reader is soon to realize that Shaw's women are characterized in great lengths, with special attention paid to their physical features and capabilities in the bedroom. Shaw recently complimented himself in Time on his understanding of women: "I'll tell you another writer who was ahead of his time on women. Shakespeare. Look at Rosalind, Portia."

At the same time, though, while Shaw's men do seemingly play the most important roles (Here, too, does Shaw pay particular attention to their physical make-up.), they are almost always driven by lust or the search for love in their day to day antics. Thus, women seem to undermine all that goes on in Shaw's main male characters, regardless of their real motivations.

Because there is always so much going on at any one point of the book, any capsulization of all of the various events would make the book sound like "Peyton Place." Still, Shaw is a master of maintaining four or more simultaneous plots moving along smoothly so that at the end of the book they can all be neatly wrapped up with a "surprise" finish.

The ending of Rich Man, Poor Man is a sad one — the death of one of the two main characters — the Poor Man, if you will. Tom Jordache's death came as a jolt to the reader and provided a moving finish to a wonderful, emotional novel. Beggarman, Thief has many of the same emotional elements but has two lackings. The first is that much of the story is the result of happenings from another book, and Shaw does not, and cannot for that matter, again define the character and personality of Tom Jordache. Thus, the recommendation here is that in order to appreciate Beggarman, Thief, to its fullest, the reader should first take a look at Rich Man, Poor Man.

The second lacking of Beggarman is its ending. It comes as a surprise but is by no means as moving or as powerful as that in Rich Man. In short, it is a disappointment for the Irwin Shaw fan.

Overall, however, Shaw's uncanny ability as a writer has put Beggarman on the bestselling book list. His descriptions, and moreover, the ways in which he lets the reader know what his characters are really thinking make it a book well worth the time spent reading it. Only one forewarning — read Rich Man, Poor Man first.

Green Mountain Volunteers

On Sunday evening, January 29, 1978, at 8:00 p.m. the Green Mountain Volunteers will give a public performance and dance at Southwick Hall, Redstone Campus, University of Vermont in Burlington.

Expanding on their last performance in the Burlington Mall in December, the 18 singers, dancers and musicians will present post-Revolutionary and late 19th century country music and dance from old New England.

Tickets are available at the door for this event, which is sponsored by the UVM Folk Dance Club.

RECENT CUTS

Sporadic George

George Benson; *Weekend in L.A.
By Tom Nuccio

After starting the record world with two monumental studio albums, Breezin' and In Flight, George Benson has done it again. Weekend in L.A., a two record set, exhibits the many talents of this master of jazz guitar. When one speaks of George Benson, he is referring to two persons. Contained within his six foot frame is not only Benson the guitarist, but also Benson the vocalist. This album brings out the best and worst of both.

Side one features an elongated version of "On Broadway." This funky rendition reveals the most technically unique aspect of Benson — the matching of his voice with his guitar during a solo. Harvey Mason and Ralph MacDonald are given the opportunity to display their percussive talents toward the end of the cut. "On Broadway" exemplifies how Benson can successfully employ funk into his jazz-oriented style. Unfortunately, his latter experiments with funk proved to be, at best, disastrous.

"California P.M." and "Wind Song" utilize repetitive funk rhythms with drummer Mason pounding out a disco beat and Benson endlessly vamping in the same pattern. These tunes don't go anywhere and actually become obnoxious to listen to.

Benson, however, is truly an incredible guitarist when he sticks to traditional jazz. The last cut on side three, "Ode to a Kudu," reveals his true stronghold. During an unaccompanied solo, he exhibits his technical genius by punching out and plucking chords while moving rapidly up and down the guitar's neck. The result is a creatively melodic phrasing of mellow jazz with a bright sound. The same can be said of "We All Remember Wes," a tune in which Benson pays tribute to the man who influenced his tremendous playing style, Wes Montgomery. Although it's an up-beat selection "Remember Wes" possesses the characteristic melodic phrasing and bright sound for which Benson is famous.

As I stated earlier, reviewing only Benson the guitarist is a task half completed. His vocal aspect, although under-publicized, should by no means be overlooked. He pours all the emotion he possesses into each individual word. The expressiveness involved with this mere act of singing is incredible. Benson sounds as if he is actually preaching to the audience during "The Greatest Love of All," the title track from the movie The Greatest. His expressive and colorful vocalizations are utilized in conveying the song's main theme —"loving thyself." These vocals, however, are not nearly as impressive on "It's All In the Game," a tune in which Benson's singing acts as an instant panacea for insomniacs.

Weekend In L.A. exhibits Benson at both his "jazzy" best and "funky" worst. The guitar playing, which at some points shimmers like the brightest star, is on other occasions as dull as an overused switchblade. Despite this contradicting fact, this album exposes a monumental force in the "persons" of George Benson. There are no doubts in my mind concerning his numerous talents, but I do question their use in some situations. Nevertheless, I strongly believe that if he utilizes his talents in the proper style of jazz (as he did on several selections from this album) he will one day earn the same distinction of his teacher Wes Montgomery — a living legend.

"Weekend In L.A" exhibits Benson at both his "jazzy" best and "funky" worst.

Sea Level Sells Out

Sea Level; *Cats on the Coast
By Russell Flannery

Unquestionably, America's "rock and roll" movement of the sixties is in the midst of institutionalization. While the Los Angeles studio musicians may be the most professional in the world, the excitement they've produced of late measures only with a strong segment of "The Guiding Light." In the Northeast, the musically knowledgable most frequently react to the mention of New York with a yawn. The established strongholds of American rock have simply become as boring as any Jimmy Carter speech. Fortunately, there still is a raw and endeavoring style to southern rock, right? Possibly, but new trends don't show much optimism.

1977 was even a dismal year for Southern music. Lynard Skynard, Sea Level, and the younger Dixie Dregs certainly performed at their best. Dicky Betts also may have passed for "enjoyable." However, assess the disappointments: Marshall Tucker were no better than "flat;" Lynard Skynard will never record together again; the Outlaws and the Atlanta Rhythm section failed to release any new material; and Gregg Allman lowered himself to recording with Cher. If 1977 could not be classified as dismal, not only are records triangular, but Jim Nabors sings lead for the Sex Pistols.

Sea Level was a brilliant moment in Southern rock in 1977. Three former members of the Allman Brothers joined with guitarist Jimmy Halls and produced a surprisingly good album. At that time, no critic would have imagined that Sea Level would attempt to sell out to the masses. Incredibly, the worst has come to pass.

Cats on the Coast can only exemplify a trend of a loss of direction and tradition in southern rock. Sea Level's addition of Randall Bramblett, a former member of the Greg Allman Band, has moved the band to a stylistic cross between the Average White Band and The Allmans. It's confusing, and a major disappointment.

Side one, the heavily disco side, will probably appall older Allman Brothers fans. On the other hand, it just may click on the pop charts. Side two offers a faint trace of the eerieness of Sea Level, but the fact remains; the band is commercialized.

The conclusion to be drawn here is actually a question: If the Southern bands, who until recently were the last generation representative of American rock, have broken down and turned commercial, what is in store for the next eleven months of 1978?

"Desire" Opens Dietrich Film Series

The Lane Series will open this semester's film series — the Marlene Dietrich Festival — with Desire. This polished comedy-drama features Marlene Dietrich as a bogus society woman racing across the Spanish border with stolen jewelry and setting up confidence games with her unwitting co-star, Gary Cooper.

Desire was produced in 1936 by Ernst Lubitsch, directed under his guidance by Frank Borzage. A product of the great German cinema of the twenties, Lubitsch came to this country and made the sophisticated battle of the sexes into comedy.

Lubitsch's films include Trouble in Paradise, Bluebeard's Eighth Wife, Design for Living, and his musicals Monte Carlo, and The Love Parade.

The Dietrich series continues through the semester with The Devil is a Woman on February 11, Dishonored on February 25, Blonde Venus on March 11, Morocco on March 18 and Shanghai Express on April 8. All films are presented twice on the evening scheduled, at 7:00 and at 9:00. Showings are in the Marsh Life Sciences Building Auditorium on the UVM campus.

Season tickets may be purchased for $5.00 at the Lane Series Office, 234 Waterman. Tickets are also available for each film at the door on the evening of the show for $1.00.

For further information please call the Lane office, 656-3418.

Tom Rush To Appear at Hunt's

By Shana Schwartzburg

Tom Rush will be appearing at Hunt's Mill and Mining Co. on Monday, January 30 for two shows. A well known folk singer and guitarist, Rush is an influential figure in the revival of acoustic folk music.

Rush, raised in Portsmouth, graduated from high school in 1959, after which he attended Harvard University. His stay was short-lived however, as he left to begin his musical career as a sort of traveling minstrel in the folk-blues tradition. His reputation grew as he played in clubs in and around Boston back in the days of the Jim Kweskin Jug Band.

Not only has Tom Rush been touring extensively, but he has also cut a sizable number of albums which have all received well deserved praise. Occasionally, he records with other musicians such as David Bromberg.

Rush's trademark, perhaps even more than his deep, sultry voice, is his lyrics. He places high value on his words and their meaning. His skill as a lyricist is undoubtedly due to the fact that he was once majoring in English Literature. On some of his earlier records he performed several songs by Jackson Browne and a few by Joni Mitchell.

Although Rush concentrates on simple melodies, he can be heard singing with anything from a semi-full band with strings and horns to his own solo guitar accompaniment. One message, however, is clear from Rush's music: he is a strong and independent individual. He is a performer who seems to find sanctuary on the road. Both are signs of having spent a great deal of time searching for truth amidst craziness.

The Fleming Museum-- Where a Lay Is is a Lay

By Peter Relick

Frank Hewitt's exhibit of "Recent Watercolors" is intriguing. To someone not accustomed to unusual art forms, however, it can be a shock. I was confronted by these three groupings of abstract watercolors in the Special Exhibitions room at the Fleming Museum and I immediately walked out.

After consoling myself in the American drawing room with pictures of people and other objects I could identify with, I entered the room again. Expecting the watercolors to be something like gentle images of swaying willows, I thought I must have gotten the wrong assignment, or that I hadn't heard the name of the artist clearly over the telephone. But two quotations hung on the side wall caught my eye. The first spoke of the diversity of art forms and how they could be represented. The second was something Mae West said after returning to the United States, "It's good to be back in America where a lay is a lay and not a wreath."

Yet diversity in art is what Hewitt's exhibition is all about. The product of a year's sabbatical leave, "Recent Watercolors" incorporates ideas developed through intense study of art history and perceptual psychology and through his own artistic experience. All the paintings in the exhibit utilize seven colors — the primary colors of red, yellow and blue, plus the secondary colors, orange, green, purple, and red-purple. The paintings are generally arranged in a series of seven, each incorporating the seven colors in a different order of application. A few add black and white tones.

Hewitt applied small patches of home-made paper at various stages of color layering, removing the patches in a process similar to batik, to reveal early color layers against later ones, showing the viewer how visual data are taken in by the human eye.

Particularly impressive are those pieces which have a multi-colored frame of paint and a white center containing nothing but your own image of what should be there. Another group of pictures done with a wet wash gives the work a certain dreamy and cloudy appearance which is offset by blocks of solid color which surround the picture from all sides.

Hewitt's exhibit is a place to sit and let your mind wander. If you are the type of person who thinks in terms of numbers and structured time and who believes the true meaning of joy is an A on a Physics exam, it may not be for you. But if you have an hour of time and an imaginative mind, "Recent Watercolors" is really exciting.

SCIENCE FICTION

By Jim Wright

So far as I can determine, only one writer ever managed to span the entire fifty-year history of SF. This was Edmond Hamilton, who died on February 1, 1977, at the age of 72. His first story appeared in 1926 and the last writing he did was in 1976.

His first stories appeared so long ago and the world has changed so much that few of today's readers can even conceive of the attitude with which the public read his stories. Imagine a life where books were still read by the light of kerosene lamps, where water was carried into the house in buckets and where you had to follow a sometimes icy path to the toilet. Now picture a fourteen-year-old boy opening the pages of the first SF magazine he has ever seen and coming upon a story by Hamilton.

You can't picture it – and I can't recapture it either. It was Edmond Hamilton who opened up the magic casements of SF to that young man, far more than any other writer.

He was a gentleman and an honor to his profession. And, through his stories, he was a friend whom I and a great many others will sadly miss.

Hail and farewell. Or fortunately, not quite farewell. The Best of Edmond Hamilton (DelRey Books, 381 pp., $1.95) contains twenty-one stories by Hamilton, running from his first story in 1926 – "The Monster-God of Mamurth" – to an afterword, which was written in 1976 and is probably his last professional writing. The book is edited and has an introduction by his wife and fellow science fiction writer Leigh Brackett.

Hamilton is at his best in his shorter fiction, and these selections bear little relation to what the readers of his pulp novels might expect. They are quieter stories, done with far more care than he could expend on most of his longer works. The writing here is sharp and economical, and the ideas shape the form of the story, rather than being shaped to fit commercial needs.

There is "In the World's Dusk" and "Child of the Winds" from 1936 – ten years after Ed began writing, showing how much a person can learn in only one decade. And from 1938, there is "He That Hath Wings," telling of a boy who must choose between adapting to society by losing his wings or remaining free to ride the winds alone and isolated.

Thank you, Leigh Brackett, for assembling this volume of works by one of science fiction's old masters!

Concord Quartet Returns January 31st

The Lane Series will present the Concord String Quartet in their second concert of the season. The Concord is now in its third year as Quartet-in-Residence at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire.

Soon after its formation in 1971, the Concord String Quartet won the Walter M. Naumburg Chamber Music Award and was also honored by the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University. They have without a doubt established themselves as an exciting major entry among today's younger quartet players.

The Concord is committed to the performance and commissioning of new works, a commitment which has resulted in new quartets from some of America's leading composers, among them George Rochberg, Lukas Foss, and Jacob Druckman. To that end they have given the world premiers of more than fifty works. The Concord also performs the complete sets of Beethoven, Schubert and Bartok along with most of the other standard literature.

The program on the 31st will include: Quartet in C Major Op. 20 No 2 by Haydn; Crossings (1966-74) by Ben Johnston and Schubert's Quartet in G Major Op. 161.

This Quartet is unique in that it feels a responsibility to the chamber music legacy – not just to preserve it, but to enlarge it.

The Concord has two performances left this season: Tuesday, January 31 and Tuesday, April 18. All performances will be in the UVM Recital Hall at 8:00 p.m. For reservations and information call the Lane Series office 656-3418, 234 Waterman Building.

Summer Programs on Modern Isreal

Modern Israel will be the focus of a special academic summer program sponsored by the State University of New York. The course in Israel will consist of an interdisciplinary study of Israel's economic, social, political, religious, educational and scientific institutions. College credit will be offered to participants that successfully complete the program.

1978 will be the twelfth summer the program has been conducted as a joint project of the State University of New York (College at Oneonta), in cooperation with Hebrew, Haifa and Bar Ilan Universities in Israel. The Israeli Department of Education and Culture also assists with the program. Dr. Yonah Alexander, Professor of International Studies at SUNY–Oneonta, serves as program director. He has directed the summer program since 1967 and was resident director of the full-year SUNY programs in Israel from 1968 to 1970.

The tentative list of courses for the 1978 program include: Introduction to the Archaeology of the Holy Land, Jewish Thought, Contemporary Middle East, Education in Israel and Biblical History. Also, students may select to study Introduction to Yiddish Literature, Israel Politics and Foreign Affairs, Israel Society and International Terrorism. Other offerings are being added. There are no language requirements as courses are taught in English. Field trips and excursions will be conducted for participants and time will be provided for independent study and travel.

Only a limited number of enrollees will be accepted, and early application is recommended. For specific details about the 1978 Academic Program in Israel, write SUNY Summer Program in Israel, State University College, Oneonta, New York 13820, or telephone Dr. Alexander, Director, 607-431-3369.

Vermont Lottery

Applications for licenses to sell Vermont Lottery Tickets are now being accepted by the Lottery Commission according to Lottery Director Henry Malkus. Malkus said ticket sales will begin in mid-February by Sales Agents throughout the State and that the Commission expects to license more than 500 Agents.

Generally, Vermont Law provides that any established business or any charitable, fraternal, religious or other non-profit organization may be licensed as a Lottery Sales Agent. Excluded from being licensed are persons under the age of 18 and businesses established solely to sell lottery tickets. Agents will receive a 5% sales commission and will receive a 1% bonus on any ticket they have sold that wins a prize of $1,000 or more.

Additional information and applications for licenses can be obtained by writing the Vermont Lottery Commission, State Office Building, Montpelier, Vermont 05602 or phoning 479-0586.

Scholarships

The Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst (DAAD) offers the following scholarship programs to US students for 1978:

(1) Eight week – German Language Courses at Goethe Institutes in the Federal Republic of Germany during the summer of 1978 (for non-German majors only). One year of college level German is required.

(2) Hochschulferienkurse, 3-week summer courses at German universities in the field of German studies. A good knowledge of German is mandatory.

(3) Short Term Study and Research (2-6 months) for advanced graduate students. This program is designed for dissertation or post-doctoral research in the Federal Republic of Germany.

(4) Information visits for groups of professors and students affiliated with an accredited American institution (no programs during July and August). Limited financial assistance and program arrangements for up to 21 days.

Application forms for all programs can be obtained from DAAD's New York office. Deadline for all programs is January 31, 1978.

For further information about programs, please contact German Academic Exchange Service, One Fifth Avenue, Apt. 11-D, New York, N.Y. 10003.

Rescue

UVM Rescue needs people to man their organization.

If you have American Red Cross Advanced First Aid and American Heart Association C.P.R. or their equivalents, and if you are a student with time to volunteer, the UVM Rescue is interested in you. Please call at 656-3350 ext. 32 for further information.

Assertive?

Research is being conducted this semester by Dorothy Kaplan, a graduate student in the Ph.D. program in clinical psychology, to evaluate the effectiveness of assertion training groups in helping college students who want to become more assertive. The groups will consist of 8 to 10 UVM students and meet weekly for eight weeks for two hour sessions. Male and female freshman, sophomores, and juniors are being recruited for the program. Participation in the groups are free although it does involve a commitment to attend sessions and help in the evaluation of the groups. A $15 deposit will be assessed all subjects which will be refunded contingent on attendance at group sessions and completion of all measures necessary to evaluate the study. If you are interested in participating in an assertion training group, you can contact Dorothy Kaplan by calling 656-2680 or by stopping by 304 John Dewey Hall, or by attending an information and sign up meeting on Tuesday, Jan. 31, or Friday, Feb. 3 at 4 p.m. in Room 306 John Dewey Hall. You are urged to act quickly as acceptance into an assertion training group is on a first come, first served basis.

Remember Earth Day back in 1970? Well, this May, the U.S. will be celebrating Sun Day. Sun Day will be a nationwide effort to focus attention on the sun and the potentials of solar energy. VPIRG is coordinating the effort on the UVM campus, which will include an energy fair, speakers, films, solar art and whatever other ideas flow this way. There will be a meeting for anyone interested in helping make Sun Day a success on Thursday, February 2, at 7:30 in AICI L/L. Bring a friend and come with plenty of ideas. For more information, contact Rob Wilke at 862-9497 or Judy Vanderryn at 656-4250.

Teaching

Any University of Vermont student who wishes to be accepted in a program in a teaching field in Art, Elementary, Home Economics, Music, Physical, Secondary, or Vocational-Technical Education, must pass a written communication test. Proficiency in the use and range of vocabulary, logical expression of ideas, paragraph arrangement, sentence structure and spelling will be judged on the basis of a few paragraphs written on a suggested subject.

The test will be given Monday evening, February 6, and Wednesday evening, February 8, in B-106 Cook (Angell) Building, from 7:00 to 8:00 p.m. Please sign up immediately in Room 306 Waterman for the evening of your choice.

Recycling

Robinson Hall is continuing its recycling program this spring semester. Students from Robinson will be collecting newspapers and metal & glass containers from Billings Center and each of the dormitories or complex common areas. Off-campus students, faculty, and staff can bring their materials to Robinson Hall.

A special thanks to all those who have participated in the past, and encouragement to everyone to join in with recycling. Any questions or suggestions, please call Jon Pace at Robinson Hall, (656)-3084.

Beer Slalom

The UVM Ski Club will sponsor a beer slalom race this Saturday at Smuggler's Notch. Course fee is free with UVM I.D., and the race is open to all levels of skiers.

A beer slalom consists of an easy race course on simple terrain. The contestants negotiate part of the course, drink two beers, continue, drink two more beers, and then finish. The best time wins, but competition is not a prime factor – it's just for fun. Anyone interested in helping with this event, or interested in the Ski Club in general is invited to attend a meeting tonight at 7:30 in 216 L/L Commons.

Students Trustees Become A Reality

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

The culmination of more than a year's work was realized last Sunday as two UVM students, Andi Pearl and Butch Crandall, were selected to sit as full voting members on the University's Board of Trustees.

The selections followed interviews by the selection committee of the ten top candidates, but only after having narrowed the field from eighteen, each of whom submitted an application and letters of recommendation. The appointments will take effect March 1, before the next scheduled trustee meeting.

Ms Pearl, 19, hails from White Plains, N.Y. and will serve on the board for a two year term. A sophomore, she is enrolled in the College of Arts and Sciences and is currently a resident assistant in Davis Hall on Redstone campus. Her extra-curricular activities include newsbroadcasting at WRUV, work on the Living/Learning Center interview and program selection committees, and she was co-chairperson for a Hunger Walk-A-Thon. In addition, she served on the Mayor's Youth Council in White Plains where she was treasurer.

"I think it's going to be hard at first," Ms. Pearl commented in reference to approaching the first March meeting. She also said, "I felt that I had come across the wrong way in the application. I wasn't specific enough, but I can't complain about the (selection) process."

When asked if she thought that being an out-of-stater would affect her performance on the board, Ms. Pearl explained, "I don't have as much background as a Vermonter, but I don't think I'm ignorant about the state. I'm basically a student."

Crandall, 23, is a Hinesburg junior who will serve on the board for a one year term. He is a business administration major and has been a student representative on the Investment and Audit Committees of the board in previous years. He was also Student Association treasurer under the founder of the student trustee bill, S.A. President Frank Cioffi, and served as an S.A. senator during the school year 1975-76.

"I'm looking forward to serving on the board and also looking forward to being able to contribute to the governance process," Crandall remarked. To the possibility of not being equally recognized by the other trustees, Crandall commented, "They (the trustees) pay as much attention to us (the student trustees) as they pay to the other trustees".

In regard to the issue of student funding of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group, which will be under scrutiny in the March meeting, he said optimistically, "The students have repeatedly voiced their support for VPIRG in the past," and predicted the amount of debate that will take place will be "no more than in the past."

Crandall did however say that Cioffi has not received enough

course of the conflict near collapse, were encouraged to fight on by the impact of the anti-war movement. On this point Westmoreland said "the burning of flags and draft cards, and lying and cheating of the anti-war movement constituted unconscionable conduct which encouraged enemies, prolonged war, and accordingly cost many American lives."

One of the main points critics of U.S. Policy in Vietnam customarily raise is the alleged American bombing of civilian non-military targets. Before being forced to respond to these inevitable charges in the question and answer period, General Westmoreland categorically stated: "The military did everything possible to avoid bombing of any non-military targets, often at risk to their own lives."

Westmoreland stated that the United States could have forced North Vietnamese to the negotiating table as early as 1968. However, the United States government adopted what he called "no win" policy which involved placing pragmatic and practical military considerations far below the fears of domestic discontent. He believes, that if President Johnson had opted for a more aggressive military policy at this juncture the North Vietnamese would have been compelled to retreat to negotiation from a considerably weaker vantage point than they did in 1973.

One interesting point regarding our general policy failure in the war was that U.S. policy makers failed to realize the limitations involved in imposing American ideals and values on a society with totally alien historical circumstances. He stated that "After we participated in overthrowing the Diem regime in 1963, we had a moral obligation to the country from that point on." He continued further by saying that the United States failed to meet this commitment and consequently "betrayed our chosen ally, not they us."

IRRESPONSIBLE MEDIA COVERAGE

Later in the talk Westmoreland clearly attacked what he considered to be irresponsible media coverage of the war. In his view, President Thieu of South Vietnam "was unfairly maligned while the autocratic rulers of the North were almost totally ignored." Vietnam was the first war that the civilian population could graphically experience in such detail by watching the television. This coverage, significant in both igniting and maintaining the resistance movement, contributed to what Westmoreland called the "adversary relationship which

Fitzgerald to Follow Westy in Speakers Program

Frances Fitgerald, author of Fire on the Lake.

"The American Effort in South Vietnam and South Vietnamese Society" will be discussed by a panel composed of Frances Fitzgerald, author of Fire in the Lake, and Lawrence Grinter, research consultant with the National Defense University. The discussion will take place at eight p.m. on February 6, in 115 Commons of the Living/Learning Center and the panel will be moderated by Professor Douglas Kinnard of the Political Science Department.

The panel discussion continues the Vermont Seminars Program theme "U.S. Power and the Third World." The program was first conceived in President Lattie Coor's inaugural address when he suggested a "portable faculty" program to bring noted scholars to campus as visiting lecturers. The program is funded through private donations and grants.

Ms. Fitzgerald won both the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award for Fire in the Lake, which describes the collision of eastern and western values which led to the Vietnam War. The book was based in part on her experience as a free-lance correspondent in Vietnam during the war, an experience which earned her the 1976 Overseas Press Club Award for best interpretation of foreign affairs.

Dr. Grinter worked in Saigon in 1966-67 for the Simulmatics Corp, and later was professor of foreign affairs and director of the East Asia and Western Pacific Studies program at the National War College. His publications include several papers on the outcome of the Vietnam War, official studies on the effectiveness of U.S. military operations there, and implications of the war's outcome for U.S. foreign policy.

The panel discussion will be free and open to the public. Ms. Fitzgerald, in addition to her evening lecture, will meet students and the public Tuesday at 9:30 a.m. in Memorial Lounge, Waterman Building, and again at 2 p.m. in the Fireplace Lounge at the Living Learning Center.

The next speaker for the "U.S. Power and Third World" section will be Noam Chomsky, a prominent anti-war spokesman during the Vietnam War and a leader in RESIST, a national movement founded to support draft resistance and radical social change.

S.A. Senators Speak Out

By Susan Heller

The thrill of victory came late for John Letteri and Kathy Konner, who were appointed to the SA Senate in November, several weeks after they both had lost the October election. Letteri replaced Don Saul who left for personal reasons and Konner replaced Bob Barker who declined comment on his reason for leaving. The roles and achievements of the two Senators differ greatly and the following profiles may provide insight into the workings of the Student Association.

Letteri is a member of the Communications Committee which he sees as "the press agent" for campus clubs and organizations. The committee is presently involved in promoting Winterfest, the Student Legal Service, and discussing the Rathskeller bill, now in the legislature. As a newer member of the committee, John had no trouble fitting in because of Committee Chairman Rob Smith who introduced him to the procedures involved. In answer to a rather trite hypothetical question, "If you were Geoff Liggett, what would you do?" John responded, "I would handle issues that pertain to the students... I imagine SA could do a lot but right now it has a bad rep with the students." John also noted that the election process for the Senate is arbitrary. He says, "Students will know one or two people who are running and go whipping down the list." John's initial reason for joining SA was his belief that you have to have "not only grades but general interest in school." SA seemed like a beneficial activity. Since last year, however, John has come to enjoy working on the Senate.

Kathy Konner is a member of the Special Affairs Committee but she hasn't attended any meetings yet. Like John she has been a Senator before this year, and she sees the Senate as a good way of "getting into school activities." Special Affairs Committee Chairman John Martin said that he doesn't plan on bringing Konner in until after Winterfest plans are finalized. This committee is also responsible for elections, meetings and special events, like Oktoberfest and Red Square Affair

Like John, Kathy has complaints about the Senate election process. "I could walk up to people and say, hey, why don't you vote for me, but they don't even know what I stood for. It's hard if you don't know a lot of people." Kathy says that she didn't know whether or not she was definitely on the committee at all. She says, "I figured I wasn't on it because I was dumb enough not to do anything about it." Kathy says she does want to help because, "People say stuff but they don't say it to the right people."

In Panama, A UVM Professor Assesses the Canal Pact with Leading U. S. Senators

Last weekend, UVM History Professor Robert V. Daniels accompanied ten US Senators on a fact finding tour of Panama. With the Canal Treaty yet to be ratified, the Senators studied Canal operations, met with Panama's ruler, Brigadier-General Omar Torrijos, and assessed American business interests. A vote on the treaty is expected soon, and the Carter Administration has favored turning over the Canal to Panama.

Professor Daniels, a Soviet history expert and a Vermont State Senator, served as a special staff assistant to Senator Patrick J. Leahy D-Vt. Daniels called the trip "fascinating", but found he was more undecided than ever about giving Panama control of the Canal.

Since May, the Senate has been considering two treaties; the first runs to 2,000, over which time, the Panamanians will gradually gain control of and operate the Canal; the other treaty defines the US role after 2,000, and it is this second treaty which is causing much debate. Many Senators believe America should maintain the right of armed intervention should the Canal ever be attacked or run by a hostile Panamanian government. Panama has long been dissatisfied with the original 1903 treaty yielding complete control of the Canal to the US. The Canal opened in 1914, but it was not until the riots of 1964 and a temporary breaking of diplomatic relations that a new treaty movement started.

Senators have been concerned about the leftist leanings of General Torrijos. Daniels described Torrijos as "wearing a field uniform with a gun-belt. And he smokes Castro's brand of cigars." Daniels explained, "There are a few communists in the government, along with several US-educated officials. But Torrijos runs the country through a 10,000 man national guard."

"They say the canal can last forever if properly cared for. But there is concern that the Panamanians would not spend the money to keep up the canal."

Daniels has been studying Panama since last fall when he attended a White House briefing for state Democratic leaders. In his opinion, "The Panamanians want the Canal mostly for the toll revenues; the Canal Company now pays the American government $20 million a year. But Americans have done a phenomenal job of maintenance on the Canal; they are constantly dredging and repairing the enormous locks."

"The Canal isn't obsolete," Daniels continued. "They say the Canal can last forever if properly cared for. But there is concern that the Panamanians would not spend the money to keep up the Canal."

Daniels said American businessmen seemed to favor the treaty. "The American presence is obvious. There are almost three times as many Americans living in Panama as in the Canal Zone. The treaty would quiet things down, and make it safer for business investment."

He characterized the country as "colorful, but poor. In fact, it's the greatest contrast of wealth and poverty I've ever seen."

The four day tour included a helicopter flight over the Canal, a visit to the Miraflores locks, and briefings by the U.S. Military and State Department, including Prof. Daniels' brother, Daniel H. Daniels, an economic advisor.

Financial Woes Hamper Bus

By Susan Heller

While other Universities run successful shuttle bus services UVM is having many problems with CCTA's new shuttle, according to Steve Angel, Mass Transportation Planner for the Regional Planning Commission. The service is running on a loss because less than 100 $15 passes have been sold. "We're frantically trying to find subsidy this week through federal and state grants," says Angel. He continues, "We're losing our shirts." For a mere $15 students and faculty can ride anywhere on the loop of the campus plus have limited use of other CCTA buses throughout Burlington. Angel continued by saying that unless subsidies are soon received, the bus service will be forced to shut down.

The shuttle bus coordinators say they are willing to do anything possible to improve the system. Angel suggests redesigning the route and painting the bus green and gold with the Catamount logo on the side.

Publicity for the service has been extensive including spots on all radio stations, promotions in the Cynic, This Week, The Burlington Free Press, as well as two TV spots. Angel explains, "Marketing was very, very heavy and concentrated for two weeks."

The shuttle bus idea was originally conceived four years ago and for the past three months Angel has been working diligently on it because "we're working for the students."

The irony of this dilemma is that Angel brought three proposals for bus routes to IRA and he also surveyed students to get their feelings on the route options. The students surveyed felt the fifteen cents a ride and fifteen dollars for a pass was reasonable and they felt the shuttle idea was a beneficial one. Unfortunately these findings conflict with the response of the University community now that the bus is in operation.

If the shuttle receives more use and if more passes are sold the system will continue into next semester. Angel pointed out that a bus pass could conceivably be incorporated into an optional fee on student tuition bills and then CCTA could provide unlimited use of all buses at all times. Says Angel, "Hell, we'll run it all year – even summer." They are still holding money to return to those who have purchased passes, should the system fold.

If schools like UNH can have a good shuttle service so can UVM, after all who has the better hockey team? Angel suggests that everyone go out, buy a pass, and take that bus!

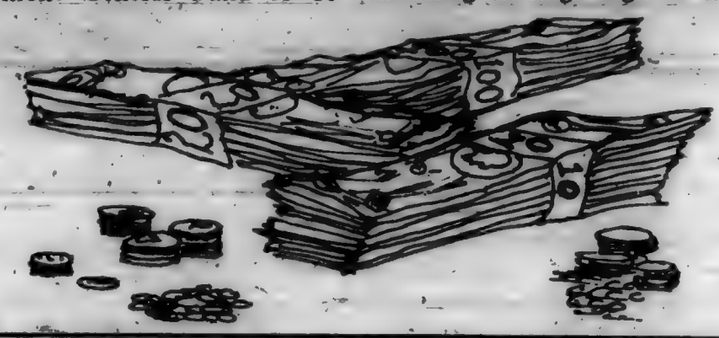
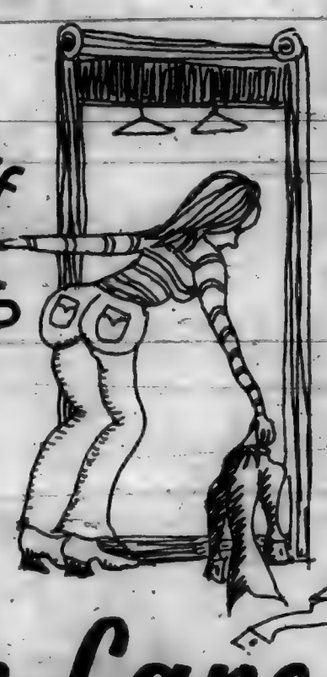
Vermont's New Lottery to Begin on Feb. 14



The Director of the Vermont Lottery Commission, J. Henry Malkus, unveiled details of the Commission's plans for the start of the Vermont Lottery. At a Montpelier press conference January 26, Malkus announced that the fifty cent weekly lottery will be named the Green Mountain Game and tickets will go on sale throughout Vermont on February 14, 1978.

In explaining the Game's operations, Malkus said that tickets will be available at licensed sales locations from Tuesday to Tuesday. Over five hundred sales agent applications have been received from restaurants, grocery stores, shops, state liquor stores, clubs and other establishments. Licensed sales agents will display the green Vermont Lottery symbol which Malkus exhibited at the press conference. Drawings will be held at noon on Thursday with the first drawing to be on February 23, 1978 in Montpelier. Malkus said that for the first fourteen weeks of the Green Mountain Game the location of the drawing will change each Thursday. Plans are being made for a weekly drawing open to the public to be held in each of the State's fourteen counties. Winning numbers also will be posted in all sales locations Thursday afternoon.

The slogan to be utilized by the Lottery Commission will be "Take a Chance on Vermont." Malkus explained that all ticket purchasers must realize that there is a chance involved.



While there will be 13,310 winners in each million tickets sold, a purchaser has one chance in seventy-five to win cash and one chance in ten to qualify for a Grand Drawing.

After prizes are distributed and administrative costs met, the remaining revenue generated by the Lottery will go into the Vermont General Fund to be used for debt retirement or capital expenditures.

The slogan to be utilized by the Lottery Commision will be "Take a Chance on Vermont"

Malkus reviewed how the Game will be played, the weekly prize structure and the winners' collection procedure. A free informational pamphlet explaining how to play the Green Mountain Game will soon be available at all sales locations. To be a winner, a ticket purchaser must match the numbers on his ticket with the weekly numbers drawn. A match of the 2-digit number yields a $5 prize. A match of the 3-digit number is worth $20. To qualify for the weekly top prize of $1,000, both the 2 and 3-digit numbers must be matched. A single digit number match allows the ticket holder to qualify for the Grand Drawing. After each 1 million weekly tickets are sold, there will be a Green Mountain Game Grand Drawing. Weekly ticket purchasers can qualify for the Grand Prize of $100,000 by matching the single digit on their weekly ticket. There will be ten qualifiers for the top prize and the nine other Grand Drawing prizes. Prizes of $5 and $20 are redeemed at any sales location. Winning tickets of $1,000 must be presented at Lottery Claim Centers. After verification of the correct number, a check will be mailed to the ticket holder. All prizes are exempt from local, county and State of Vermont taxes, but not Federal Income Tax. After a period of three or four months, the Lottery Commission anticipates the introduction of an instant lottery ticket in addition to the weekly game.

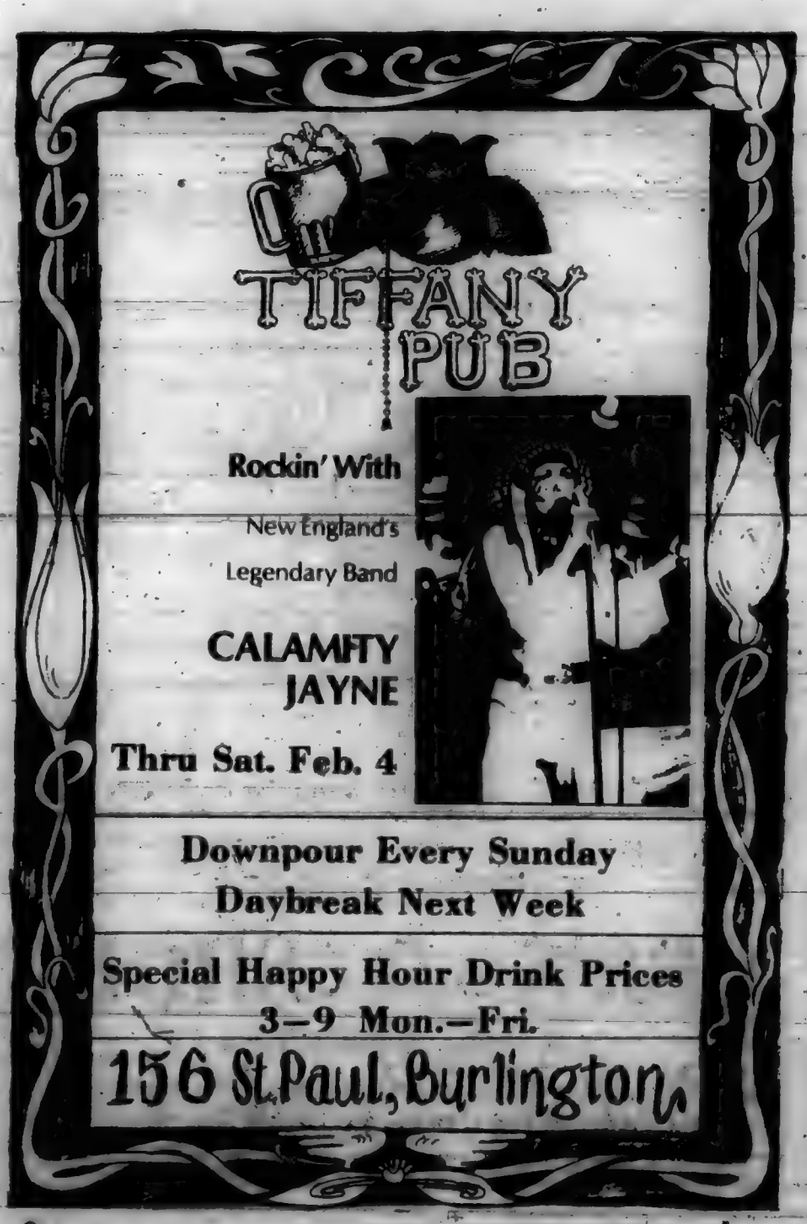
Bill Reducing Penalties for Pot Now in Legislature

By Curtis Haynes



Think of all the names you know for marijuana — grass, weed, pot, dope, reefer, boo, mary jane, hemp, gange, the Green Death, the evil weed with roots in hell – the list is endless, but fact remains: marijuana use is widespread. By a conservative estimate, over 40 million Americans have tried marijuana and over 15 million use it regularly.

In Vermont's House of Representatives, a group of four young legislators have introduced a bill to decriminalize the possession of less than an ounce of marijuana. Under the proposed law, you can still be busted, but the maximum penalty is a $100 fine. The biggest change is that getting busted for a small amount would no longer be deemed a criminal offense, and record of the bust would be erased after the fine is paid. The new bill would maintain stiff penalties for possession of more than one ounce, a $500 fine and up to six months in jail. Second offenders convicted of possessing more than an ounce could receive up to two years in prison. Right now, your sentence depends on where in Vermont you are busted; you might be treated as a felon — lose the right to vote; have trouble obtaining employment; never become a lawyer, or wind up in jail with mother stabbers and father rapers!

One purpose of the bill is to make Vermont's marijuana laws uniform. Rep. Dan Mahoney, D-Burlington, a sponsor, said the prosecution of marijuana users "needlessly scars thousands of lives and wastes millions of dollars in law enforcement resources, while detracting from the prosecution of serious crime." Rep. Mahoney and Rep. Randall Niquette, D-Winooski, attended the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) conference in Washington last fall. Mahoney said that marijuana was "not a big deal anymore" and the new law was designed to update the law to current practices. The last drug bust on campus was 1975. The Chittenden County District Attorney's Office has not gone after the little guy; the villain was always the dealer or pusherman.

The end of marijuana prohibition seems far-off; and the intricacies of government or private industry production and distribution have yet to be worked out. Did this article make you paranoid?

At Last, Student Trustees

recognition for his efforts in seeing that proposal turn into a bill and then become law, "I don't think that Frank has been given enough credit in the past."

In the future, all students named to the Board of Trustees will serve two-year terms, with one selected each year.

The students were chosen by a committee of student leaders from all facets of the university, with the Dean of Students, Dr. Keith Miser, and the Director of Student Activities, David Nestor, seated as non-voting members. The selection process began last fall when more than thirty prospective applicants attended seminars put on by the S.A. to enable them to learn more about governance aspects of the university. The deadline for receiving applications was January 15 when the selection committee began two weeks of intensive examination of each of the candidates.

A LONG STRANGE TRIP

The process which has enabled two students to be seated on the board began during the spring of 1976 when Frank Cioffi placed the idea on his platform as he ran for the position of S.A. president.

When he won the election, he hired a summer research staff and a lobbyist to prepare a well-founded proposal to eventually be presented to the Vermont General Assembly, the administration, and,the Board of Trustees itself.

Since UVM is in part a "state university," any change in the composition of the board requires a legislative bill to amend the school's charter, which defines its composition. Therefore, like any other organization seeking to enact legislation in a governmental body, it became necessary for the S.A. to gain support among the Montpelier legislators.

Previous to the legislature's January 1977 opening session, the student trustee bill, H.143, had been drafted in anticipation of its introduction into the state House of Representatives. The bill's eventual passage through the House was "anything but easy," one observer noted. The concern was that opening the university's charter on the House floor would be "like opening a can of worms" as it would make possible the alteration of the school's by-laws.

The administration also voiced concern over the bill previous to its passage. Certain members felt that the student trustees might represent a certain constituency and others felt it would create a "cascade effect" whereby other factions within the school might demand equal representation. The factions most notably in question were the faculty and the non-academic employees.

The bill was guided successfully through a number of House and Senate Committees, and then passed both bodies, but not before it had been revised and debated heavily upon.

Governor Snelling signed the bill last April.

A FOOTNOTE – ED.

Perhaps Mr. Crandall was correct in saying that Frank Cioffi did not gain the recognition he deserved in seeing through the passage of the bill, but Cioffi knows – as did everyone associated with the project – that it was an accomplishment the likes of which UVM students rarely see.

developed between the press and the military."

U.S. WITHDRAWAL

The General also harshly criticized the eventual departure of American support for South Vietnam set down in the Case Church amendment of 1975. He maintains that because the North knew they no longer had to fear American intervention, they were enticed into violating the 1973 Peace accords. Without the passage of the Case-Church amendment, Westmoreland feels that the agreement signed in Paris (1973) was "theoretically workable."

In his closing remarks Westmoreland said, "I'm not trying to defend the war, but only not to forget or ignore it. Our mission now is to study why and where we went wrong."

After finishing his formal speech, the former commander submitted himself to the floor for open question and answer session which lasted one hour. Most questions however were aimed to pin Westmoreland into conceding either criminal or immoral acts on his part. Moreover, he appeared well prepared for such scrutiny and handled most of the questions with confidence.

Westmoreland's speech was the first this semester in a series of lectures of the Third World sponsored by the Vermont Seminars Program. Other speakers will include Frances Fitzgerald and Noam Chomsky, notable critics of the U.S. policy in Indochina.

Canal Treaty Amendment Criticized

Panama Canal

Former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, retired Admiral Thomas Moorer, charged that a proposed amendment to the Panama Canal treaties is a sugar-coated political maneuver. The Admiral referred to the amendment guaranteeing U.S. passage and defense right at the canal when it is handed over to Panama. He told the Senate Armed Services Committee the amendment would neither assure this country of priority passage nor enable the U.S. to use military force to protect the waterway.

Admiral Moorer was joined in his criticism by former Deputy Defense Secretary William Clements, who is a candidate for governor of Texas. He said a strong, unambiguous security must be the keystone of any Panama Canal Treaties.

On Friday, at the urging of the State Department, the committee had voted to recommend that the Senate insert in the neutrality treaty a new article spelling out United States right to defend the canal after the year 2000.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee sent the treaties to the Senate floor yesterday with a recommendation of ratification. Floor debate is expected to begin next week.

Administration Pushes Economic Proposals

Economy

The Government issued its final significant economic report for 1977 today and predicted strong economic growth at least to the middle of this year. It reported a seven-tenths of one percent increase for December in the index designed to signal future economic trends.

The index of leading economic indicators rose for the sixth consecutive month. A big increase in orders and contracts for plant and equipment in December contributed most to the rise. The index looks at the economy during the previous month and attempts to predict what will happen in the future.

Despite the positive signal for the early part of the year, President Carter's economic proposals came under some criticism on Capitol Hill. A staff report for the Joint Economic Committee said Carter's proposed $25 billion tax cut won't do enough to sustain an economic recovery, but more pitches for the program were made by administration officials.

The Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, Charles Schultze, told Congress that growth could slow and unemployment could rise again next year unless steps are taken. Schultze was pushing for President Carter's proposed tax cuts and changes. Although the latest figures on the economy point to strong growth, Schultze warned it will last only until the middle of next year if unassisted.

Treasury Secretary Blumenthal, making his second appearance before the House Ways and Means Committee, heard sharp criticism from Republicans and Democrats alike.

Top Republican leaders in the House say President Carter's economic plan is a "fiscal time bomb" that would "clobber" middle class Americans.

Commissioner Kuhn Vetoes Vida Blue Deal

Vida Blue

Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn cancelled the $1.75 million sale of Oakland A's pitcher Vida Blue to the Cincinnatti Reds because it wasn't in "the best interests of baseball."

A's owner Charley Finley, who had sued the Commissioner over the first Blue deal (to the New York Yankees in 1976), said he would take this case to court also.

According to Kuhn the deal could affect the competitive balance in the National League West "materially and adversely" and would worsen the competitive position of the Oakland club making an already weak team weaker.

Two Indicted In Washington As Communist Spies

Communist Spies

Charges of spying have been brought against a U.S. State Department employee and a Vietnamese man who has applied for permanent U.S. residence. Ronald Louis Humphrey, an employee of the United States Information Agency, and Truong Dhnh Hung, a Vietnamese National, were arrested at their jobs within hours after they were indicted on seven counts by a Federal Grand Jury.

The indictment charges them with delivering documents, writings and notes to Vietnam relating to the national defense of the United States.

It charges that Humphrey used his position as an employee of USIA to gather material and deliver it to the Vietnamese at various places in the Washington area.

Five other Vietnamese were named as co-conspirators but were not indicted.

Alchohol And Pregncy Don't Mix

Alcohol Warning

Medical experts and Food and Drug Administration officials told a Senate panel that they support the idea of putting labels on alcohol to warn pregnant women against drinking. The experts told a Senate subcommittee that women who take five or six drinks a day during pregnancy run a clear risk of damaging their unborn children. One study concluded that forty percent of all babies born to heavy drinkers have some type of disability.

The reaction by the alcohol producers to the proposed warning was that it would be a too "simplistic and inefficient way to prevent alcohol abuse.'

Egyptian/Israeli Peace Talks Resume

jm154,Egyptian/Israeli Peace Talks Resume

Joint military talks between Israel and Egypt resumed in Cairo on Tuesday. The focus of the talks is presumably on an Israeli pullback from the occupied Sinai Peninsula.

Egyptian President Sadat said the issue of Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai is not a difficult problem saying the issue of Jewish settlements there can be resolved. According to Sadat the real issue to be resolved before peace can be reached in the Middle East is the future of the Palestinians.

"Self-determination" for the Palestinians must be written into any joint declaration according to the Egyptian President. Sadat went on to say that without resolving the self-determination issue "everything will collapse."

Park To Testify Before House

Tongsum Park

House Ethics Committee Chairman John Flynt said word has come from the South Korean Government that rice dealer Tongsun Park will be allowed to testify before the committee, hopefully in a matter of days. Flynt said he hopes Park will be in Washington within ten days.

Park is a key figure in the Congressional probe of Korean influence buying on Capitol Hill.

Webster Winds Up Senate Testimony

Webster

William Webster, President Carter's choice as new head of the FBI, wound up two days of testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday. He pledged he would give everything he has to the job if his nomination is confirmed.

Webster was questioned about FBI intelligence gathering. He promised that as FBI Director he would report to the Senate on what he has done to reduce the collecting of irrelevant information about people not charged with crimes. He was replying to a question regarding the FBI's past 'gathering of information about such matters as the drinking habits and the sex lives of members of dissident political groups.

It appears a foregone conclusion that the Webster nomination will be approved by the Senate. Not one Senator has said publicly that he would vote against the nomination.

Charez Calls Off Boycott

Cesar Chavez

United Farm Workers' leader Cesar Chavez called off the boycott against California grapes, wine and lettuce. He said the boycott was no longer needed due to the effectiveness of the 1975 California labor laws permitting workers to vote secretly on unionizing.

Debris Located From Soviet Satellite

Satellite

Canadian and American officials said they have located, electronically, two potentially hazardous pieces of the Soviet nuclear-powered satellite which crashed through the atmosphere over Canada last week. A Canadian official told a news conference the two pieces were located near Fort Reliance, a weather station in the Northwest Territories. A Canadian nuclear team is going to the area to pinpoint and recover the pieces which are said to be very small.

Roger Eaton of the Canadian Atomic Control Board said the fragments were giving off radiation which could be dangerous to living beings if they were exposed at close range for a number of hours.

Other sources of radiation from the fallen satellite have been confirmed or are under suspicion in the remote areas of Canada.

Vietnam: The Media's Mistakes

By Scott Sartorius

"Vietnam was both the most reported and least reported war in history if one considers both the coverage from Hanoi as well as Saigon. American families at home were able to see for the first time on the tube the bloodshed present on any battlefield. War was reported for the first time like crime on the streets or a no-holds-barred political campaign."

Such is the view of General William C. Westmoreland, former Commanding General of the U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam. In his address Tuesday night, he outlined his complaints with the ways in which the media covered the war and accordingly, the effect that this handling – or mishandling – of the news had on both morale and even the ultimate outcome.

Westmoreland feels that the media placed too much emphasis on South Vietnam and its leaders, thus allowing the South's government to look bad in comparison to the North's. "There were no TV cameras behind the enemy's lines. All the information and news from North Vietnam was blacked out except propaganda to serve their purpose," Westmoreland contends. "The conduct of the autocratic leaders in the North were not given equal time. They were ignored. Some of the news media suggested by its subjective reporting that the young country of South Vietnam with no experience in democracy or even self-government was expected to be as democratic and free of corruption as America. By comparison, the enemy leaders appeared to be the good guys."

Westmoreland may have a point, and in fact, a two volume work recently published entitled Big Story: How the American Press and Television Reported and Interpreted the Crisis of Tet 1968 in Vietnam and Washington does help to support the assumption that there was much misinformation flowing from Vietnam during its conflict years. Big Story is written by Peter Braestrup, a former Vietnam reporter for the New York Times and former Vietnam bureau chief for the Washington Post.

Braestrup writes: "One of the characteristics of American journalists is their tendency, on occasion, to vastly overrate their country's enemies. This has been particularly true in the case of wars fought with Asians."

On the media's handling of the Tet offensive, Braestrup concludes, "The overall impression in all media was that the initial round of Tet attacks left the allies with nothing but problems, and the foe looming larger than life – omniscent, shrewdly holding the 'initiative' and ready to outgeneral the allied commanders again."

"The attitude of the American press undoubtedly contributed to the psychological victory the enemy achieved in the United States . . ."
General Westmoreland

Westmoreland too found the reporting of the Tet offensive "misleading" to the extent where public opinion actually fell in the United States after the battle. General Douglas Kinnard quotes Westmoreland in his book The War Managers: "The attitude on the part of the American press undoubtedly contributed to the psychological victory the enemy achieved in the United States... In the race to drain every possible sensation... reporters made little apparent effort to check the facts while basking in the praise of their home offices for their speed in beating the opposition."

Anti-war opposition increased after Tet as did the awareness that we were actually in an ugly, bloody undeclared war. But this awareness came through the stories written and filmed by 600 to 700 correspondents, many of whom were confronted for the first time with war's random destructiveness and waste. The problems emanating from the misreporting in Vietnam are basically no different from misreporting done in other aspects covered by journalists, only in a situation such as Vietnam, the consequences of inaccurate or misinterpreted data had far-reaching (yet unrealized) negative effects. For the most part, no journalist ever wants to print a false account of anything, but because of the pressure to perform and the haste in which that reporting must be done, mistakes are sometimes made. In Vietnam, literally on the other side of the world, reporters no doubt passed up the crucial second source in substantiating a story because of a deadline to meet 12,000 miles away.

Braestrup writes in the last chapter of his book: "We saw at Tet the first show of the more volatile journalistic style – spurred by managerial exhortation or complaisance – that has become so popular in the late 1960s. With this style came often mindless readiness to seek out conflict, to believe the worst of the government or of authority in general, and on that basis to divide up the actors on any issue into the good and the bad."

A Rougher Road

By Henry Chamberlain

An extraordinary set of weather conditions greeted the students arriving for the second semester. The situation was such that Tim did not make an effort to go to classes until Friday of the first week. Here is the story of the trip to Lafayette that morning.

We left Harris-Millis at 9:30 a.m. in anticipation of a difficult journey to Lafayette; Tim's wheelchair was going to be a problem today. From the previous day's experience I knew that much of the distance we would have to cover would be through snow which could not have been removed. The path from Harris-Millis was narrow but easily passable. I hoped the way would be as clear for the entire journey, but I quickly realized that this was not to be the case.

The Concourse through the Living/Learning Complex was deep with snow. Students had created a problem with their footprints, but still the snow was not deep enough to cause us any monumental problems. However, the path from the Concourse to the elevator at the tunnel was another story.

Here the snow was deep, the path narrow, and my footing poor. After quite an effort, we got to the bridge of the tunnel elevator only to find that it was obstructed. A passerby helped to carry the chair over the obstacle and we reached the elevator. It wouldn't work, so we headed onto Route 2 and the security station.

While Jim got an elevator key for Lafayette and we reported the malfunctioning elevator, we were informed, to our chagrin, that it had not been operational from the top for several days, but that it could be operated from the base. We thanked them and headed for Lafayette with ten minutes to go. The path was clear as far as we could see. UVM maintenance had done an excellent job on Main Campus.

Presently, we rolled up to the side door of Lafayette. Unfortunately, Lafayette's elevator is accessible only from the rear. So I lowered Tim down the stairs to the first floor. The elevator ride to the second floor took just a few seconds – the journey was finished. I couldn't help noticing one bit of irony as I left the elevator, a little red and white sign which read – "In Case of Fire, Use Stairs."

Up until fairly recently, education for the physically handicapped did not readily involve public institutions. These institutions were for the most part inaccessible to the physically handicapped. In recent history, the prevailing opinion has been to bring these handicapped into the mainstream of the public involved.

". . . Despite all the efforts of those to make schools accessible to the handicapped, severe weather conditions in the North will dictate that many of its physically handicapped residents will seek their education in the south."

There are still several buildings on campus where Tim does not have complete freedom of movement because of physical barriers such as Pomeroy Hall. These deficiencies are being met through an excellent educational system. The Education for All Handicapped Act of 1975 (P.L. 94-142) is aimed at making it possible for the physically handicapped to utilize public institutions. Currently, there are four students at UVM who get around by wheelchair.

Much of the year Tim uses an electric wheelchair to get him to and from classes. It is only during the Winter months that he must rely on others to guide him over slippery paths. During these months, Tim figures that he misses five days of classes each semester. What are the realities involved in educating a physically handicapped person at the University of Vermont?

P.L. 94-142 calls for the inclusion of handicapped individuals in public educational facilities who are between the ages of three and 21 years of age. The bill makes it necessary for all public institutions to make their facilities completely accessible by the physically handicapped in a few years. The University is well along in its program to comply with this act.

Back in 1971, work was begun under the late Dr. Edward Schneider to adapt UVM facilities to handle the physically handicapped. Presently, under the guidance of Mrs. Bickford at the Office of Architectural Barrier Control, the remaining necessary alterations are being planned. However, what are Tim's feelings and plans for the future?

The first interesting comment Tim made was that all of his physically handicapped friends from home go to educational institutions in the South for their education. Above all, the most important consideration being the climate and consequent accessibility problems at UVM. Tim is pondering a move down south to continue his education. The reason being that he would have more freedom of movement all the time down south. This is not to say that for the most part Tim cannot get around campus, but the reality is that Tim must often rely on others for his mobility. Tim finds it to be a "bite" that he doesn't feel that he can go to school in his home state, but there are just certain limitations program, but Tim wants to go to an institution where he would have complete accessibility today. So, despite his priority snow clearance status, and the great help of the Dean of Students, Dr. Keith Miser, UVM may see one of its students depart for other surroundings.

Mobility for the physically handicapped will always present some problems even when P.L. 94-142 has been complied with. Inclimate conditions will always put a heavy strain on the system, and this has to be accepted. So, despite all the efforts of those to make schools accessible to the handicapped, severe weather conditions in the North will dictate that many of its physically handicapped residents will seek their education in the South.

SILENCE IS DEADLY.

When someone drinks too much and then drives, it's the silence that kills. Your silence.

It kills your friends, your relatives, and people you don't even know. But they're all people you could save.

If you knew what to say, maybe you'd be less quiet. Maybe fewer people would die.

What you should say is, "I'll drive you home." Or, "Let me call a cab." Or, "Sleep on my couch tonight."

Don't hesitate because your friend may have been drinking only beer. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't think that black coffee will make him sober. Black coffee never made anyone sober. Maybe it would keep him awake long enough to have an accident. But that's about all.

The best way to prevent a drunk from becoming a dead drunk is to stop him from driving.

Speak up. Don't let silence be the last sound he hears.

THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

This year's S.A. President, Geoff Liggett, was elected in March, 1977, with twenty-nine percent of the total vote of a field of four. As Chief Executive, Liggett's duties include the appointment of the Student Association treasurer and the chairmanship of both the full Senate and the General Assembly. Liggett also has the power to veto bills by the General Assembly and the Senate.

Linda Purdy, a former S.A. Senator, is this year's Vice President at the Association. Although the position of vice-president has traditionally been categorized as one for a "lacky," Purdy has been very active, especially in her work with the legislature. In addition to her Vice Presidential duties, Purdy bears the responsibility of Chairman of the Senate Action Committee.

The S.A. Treasurer, a position of appointment, not general election, was accepted by Larry Landry. Landry is responsible for all financial affairs of the S.A. including service as the Chairman of the Senate Financial Committee. Past treasurers have been the main authors of the fiscal year budget draft that appears before the General Assembly. Landry's budget is due in April, and he has indicated the Committee will play a more significant role in recommending specific allocations.

THE LEGISLATURE

The legislative power within the S.A. is separated between the elected body of the S.A. Senate and the General Assembly, which consists of every full-time UVM student.

The General Assembly is guaranteed by the Constitution to meet at least three times per semester. Every student has an equal vote in the General Assembly and he or she is strongly urged to attend the Assemblies and use it.

The S.A. Senate is composed of thirty-seven members who are elected in three catagories: representatives of on-campus students, off-campus students and the Greek system. The number of Senate members to be elected from each category is proportional to the percentage of total membership residing in that category. The Constitution stipulates that no less than five senators may represent one category. The breakdown of last September's election was eighteen on-campus senators; fourteen off-campus senators; and five Greek senators. Two full Senate meetings must be held each semester. The Senate may approve bills, rules, and resolutions relating to S.A. policy.

The Senate consists of six committees:

—The Finance Committee prepares and submits a budget to the General Assembly, in addition to considering other financial matters of the Student Association.

—The Special Affairs Committee considers proposed amendments to the constitution, the operation of elections and matters related to the internal affairs of S.A. John Martin is chairman of this year's Special Affairs Committee.

—The Communication Committee is responsible for publicizing all S.A. sponsored events, and for seeking student opinion in regards to the operation of S.A. Rob Smith is the Communications Committee Chairman.

—The Student Action Committee essentially leaves the individual Senator open to explore the area he deems a most pressing student concern. For example, a project currently being researched is an alternative dorm situation in which students, not lackeys, would assume responsibility for a certain degree of dorm maintenance. Additionally, Senator Alison Gardner is examining the possibilities of a small scale food co-op. Linda Purdy chairs this diverse, yet active committee.

—The Student Activities Committee has the power to approve or revoke all requests for S.A. recognition. Furthermore, their suggested financial appropriation for organizations bears measurable weight with the Finance Committee and the treasurer. Dana Del Gizzi is the chairman of the Student Activities Committee.

—The Executive Committee consists of President Liggett and the Chairmen of the other five committees. Essentially, this committee continually assesses the operation of the entire legislative branch of the Student Association.

FUNDING AND CLUB RECOGNITION

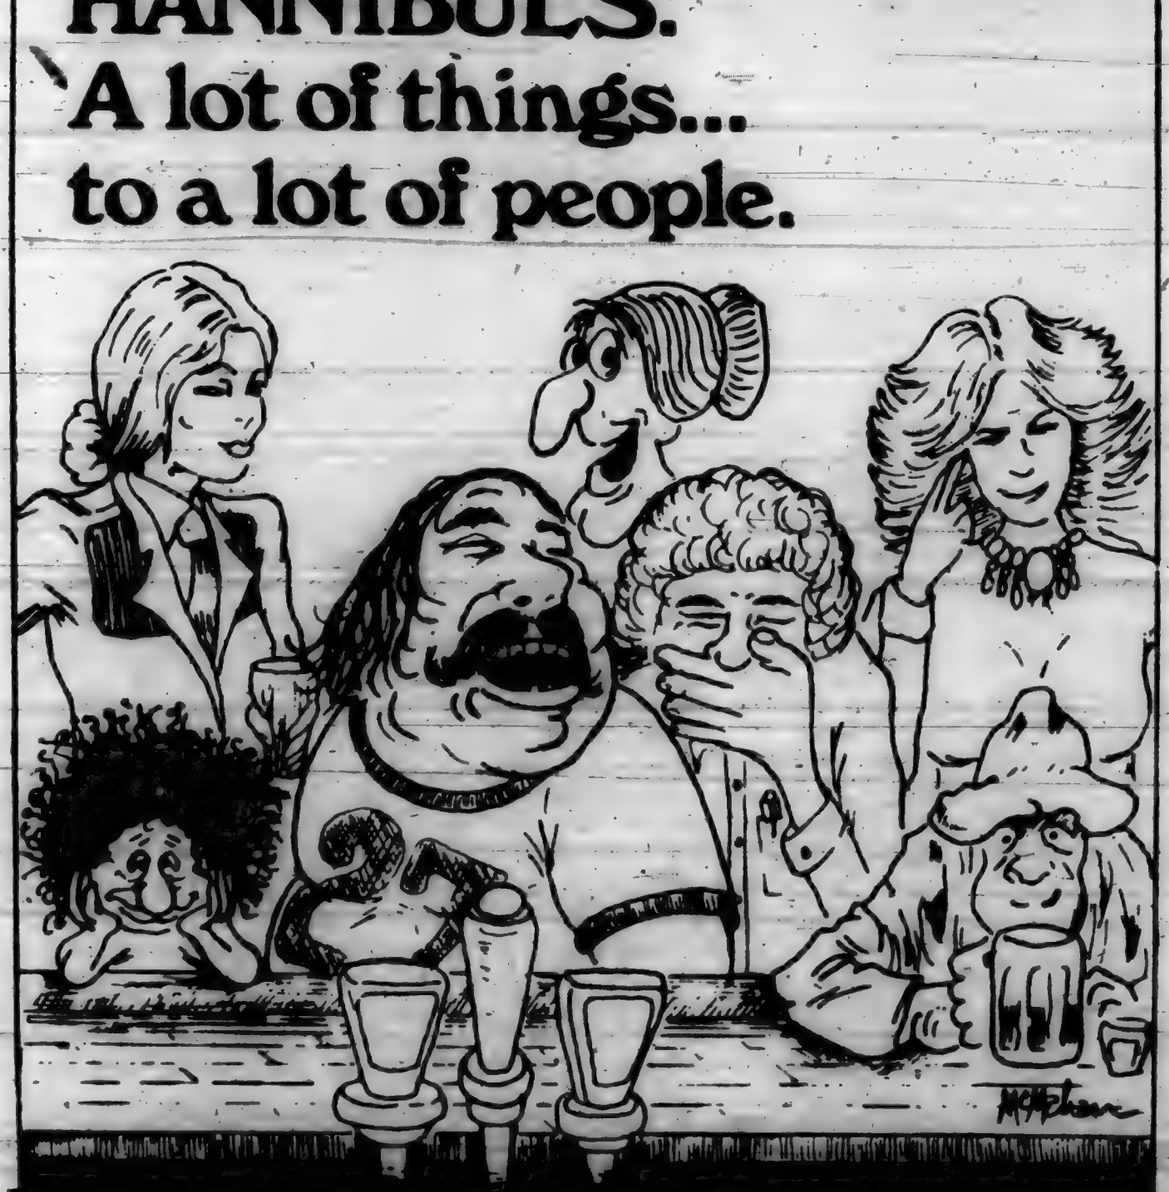
The Student Association is primarily funded through a yearly student activity fee assessed to every full-time UVM undergraduate student. This fee reaps roughly $175,000 into the S.A. Budget yearly. To gain maximum interest, Treasurer Larry Landry has engaged in shifting S.A. money from regular savings accounts into short-term, high interest accounts.



175,000 dollars is potentially available to all S.A. organizations. Next year's budget request forms are currently available at the S.A. office for those who wish to reapply for an allocation. If interested in becoming recognized by the S.A., the constitution (generally) demands two major requirements: a presentation stating why and how the allocation will be spent; and an explanation of how the proposed organization will serve as an educational experience as well as an asset to the student body at large.

Ascorbic Acid

By Peter Millard

The vitamin C controversy has continued unabated for a number of years and the one apparent generalization is that, as in most areas dealing with human nutrition and health, there are still no definitive answers.

Small amounts of vitamin C are needed in the diet to prevent scurvy, a deficiency disease in which teeth fall out and the soft tissues of the body disintegrate, leaving gruesome ulcers. Ever since the vitamin's chemical structure was first identified – in 1928 – and the name ascorbic acid assigned it, conventional nutritionists have felt that the vitamin's requirement should be defined solely on the basis of prevention from scurvy.

It was not until 1970 when Limus Pauling, winner of the Nobel Prize in chemistry (1954) and peace (1962) and without doubt one of the greatest chemists of this century, published the book Vitamin C and the Common Cold that people began to consider that larger doses of the vitamin might have beneficial effects. Pauling stated that large daily doses (250 mg to 5 gm) would offer protection from the common cold and that doses of greater than 5 gm taken at the first manifestations of a cold would cure it. Pauling's unproven assertion was that daily intakes of 1000 mg of vitamin C would lead to 45% fewer colds and 60% fewer days of sickness. Nutritionists immediately set out to disprove him.

Three large research studies conducted in the past six years in Toronto and Arizona did indeed disprove Pauling's assertions that vitamin C has such marked effects. But the surprising result from the studies was that, although the vitamin did not avert the disease process, it greatly reduced disability from colds by alleviating the general malaise that accompanied them. The volunteers in the Toronto study, for example, took 1000 mg of vitamin C (or an identical placebo) daily with instructions to increase the daily doses to four gm during the first three days of any illness. The vitamin group had slightly fewer colds (this was not "statistically significant"), but, more impressively, they had 30% fewer days confined to the home than the control group. The probability that this was due to chance is less than 1 in 1000. Other studies reached much the same conclusion.

The results of these studies were certainly not due to the psychological "placebo effect" (whereby people feel better because they believe they will) since all studies were double-blind – neither the volunteers nor the researchers themselves knew whether the pill taken was vitamin C or an inert placebo.

Biochemically, the above results did not initially seem logical because the maximum concentration of vitamin C in the bloodstream is reached at intakes of between 60 mg and 120 mg per day in healthy subjects. Once saturation of the vitamin occurs, the body excretes the excess in the urine. Why, then, the experimental results? Studies in animals and humans have shown that stress (including disease processes) greatly increases the body's need for vitamin C, perhaps by as much as tenfold. During illness the body's requirements for water soluble vitamins (such as vitamin C and the B vitamins) is much higher. The New Zealand Medical Journal, for example, reported recently (2/23/77) that one third of all children admitted to a typical hospital there had a marked deficiency in the blood levels of vitamin C.

Little attempt has been made to test more recent assertions by Pauling and others that vitamin C may be useful in the prevention of heart disease and cancer but those studies which exist indicate that the vitamin may help prevent those dreaded diseases as well.

Animals studies are encouraging and have shown that hardening of the arteries can be greatly reduced by vitamin C supplementation (American J. of Clinical Nutrition, Aug. 1974). More recent studies in humans have shown marked reductions in hardening of the arteries. Several studies have shown that blood cholesterol levels can be lowered by vitamin C, but other studies have shown that there is no effect.

The effects of large doses of vitamin C, then, still remain unproven. Given the probable benefits, though, it is advisable to get plenty of the vitamin in fresh fruits and vegetables. (This author personally takes 500 mg supplements each day "just in case.") No harmful effects of this dose are known or suspected, although very large doses of several grams daily may not be a good idea. If a person has been on high doses for more than 1 or 2 weeks, the body will have become accustomed to the high dose and will have to be gradually "weaned" off the vitamin slowly to avoid a sudden fall in blood level if the regimen is to be discontinued.

The Inner Problems of the Outing Club

An Organizer and Promoter of Trips and Talks or A Mere Equipment Lender?

By Alan Marshall

Imagine a school where all but a minority of students have strong interests in outdoor activities. A school that is in the midst of a growing lucrative community endowed with a mountain range adjacent to it. A college thats Outing Club fulfills the needs of its students, an organiser and promoter of trips, lender of needed equipment, and coordinator of on-campus events.

This campus would be populated with students that aren't apathetic nor so selective about joining organizations.

That school is UVM except that the Outing Club has fallen into its lowest level of activity and highest state of disorganization since before Nininger's reconstruction period.

The Outing Club has problems, ones that are inter-related and compound each other's damage. "The meetings are why we're doing little more than lending equipment," stated John Henrikson. "We lost the fun atmosphere of someone like Crazy John standing up to announce leadership for a trip to Mt. Kahtadin if someone provided transportation." Meetings on Wednesday nights have become tedious evenings of speedy announcements and a slide show of occasional merit (with the exception of Galen Rowell of course.)

The downridden atmosphere that prevails at these meetings, however, is a direct product of deeper objects. The organization of the Outing Club lies somewhere on the line between surviving and incoherent. Presently, an executive board has full responsibility for the OC where the positions have been molded to fit the input of certain individuals rather than the people fitting specific posts. This lack of structure carries over in both executive board and general meetings.

"The problem of the Outing Club is diffuse because there is no central figure," said Jim Gilchrest, the co-ordinator of the Wilderness Sports Suite at Living Learning Center. "Students get shuffled around when they try to inquire or involve themselves. There's nobody to talk to. Consequently, people are turning to things that are more organized like Wilderness Experience (W.E.) or the suite here in L/LC."

There were very few organized trips last semester, and students are apparently disappointed with this and see no immediate reverse in the OC's role in attaining coordinated trips. Accordingly, they have sought private means of taking to the fields and mountains. If this trend continues, the disappointing speculation that the OC may merely be lending equipment might become a reality.

Leadership seems to be the main factor lacking to rescue the club out of the dark corners of

Wilderness Experience: A Special Weekend

By Leslie Dunn

Just two and a half years old W.E. has become one of the most rewarding non-traditional learning opportunities based on experience available here at the University.

Wilderness Experience (W.E.) is soon beginning its fifth semester of operation here at UVM. The program has grown appreciably since its inception in the spring of 1976, when it was primarily a "one man show". Bob Weiler, Director of W.E., was then the sole promoter, administrator, logistician, and instructor for the small scale organization.

Since then, Wilderness Experience has evolved into an outdoor education program which includes twenty instructors, a salaried coordinator, leadership development seminars, and regularly scheduled trips which run throughout the fall and spring semesters. In addition, Wilderness Experience has maintained the flexibility to accomodate special interest groups such as Living-Learning suites, dormitory floors, and Residence Hall Advisors.

Under the auspices of the Outing Club and Student Activities, the growth of Wilderness Experience has been enhanced. The Outing Club has been able to provide much needed support, equipment, and leadership, while Student Activities have facilitated the organizational and financial aspects of the program.

W.E. provides a unique function at UVM. Not only does it introduce students to living and travelling outdoors, but it provides a non-traditional learning opportunity based on experience. The purpose of the program is to provide a positive educational experience through wilderness recreation. In its design, education and recreation are inextricably bound. The success of this program is dependent upon the thoughtful synthesis of the components.

One goal of the program is to provide students with the basic understanding and skills necessary for enjoyment, appreciation, and preservation of wilderness environments. Special considerations of wilderness living and travel become the means to propel students into a learning situation. Our hope is that students will be better prepared to pursue their own outdoor recreation, and will have an increased appreciation of the preservation of wilderness environments in respect to future environmental concerns.

A typical W.E. weekend begins well before the Saturday morning departure. The Wednesday evening prior to the trek is reserved for a short meeting among group members and instructors. At this time, introductions are made, the route is discussed, and the clothing list is examined and explained. The group meets again on Friday afternoon. This meeting is at the Outing Club house, and is necessary for issuing group equipment (tents, pots and pans, stoves, etc.). At

The Home of J.D.

By Randy McMullen

Although the Jack Daniels plant is in Lynchburg, Tennessee, it might be more accurately phrased that the Jack Daniels plant is Lynchburg Tennessee. It's nice to note, though, that this distillery is laid out sparingly and creatively amongst the hills and forests, so that there isn't the appearance of a small village being gobbled up by the metal jaws of corporate development.

We entered this white, two-story cottage where there were "tour starts here" signs; and walked through this dark corridor of whiskey barrels until we found ourselves in a reception room, where we were greeted by a stout woman with a thick southern accent and hospitality that astounded us all.

"Well howdy," she cried, "Where y'all from?" She was tickled pink when we told her Vermont, and she informed us that we were just in time to be guests at a luncheon, courtesy of a Mrs. Mary Bobo, a 96 year old boarding house lady who has probably been with the Jack Daniels establishment for most of her life. She wandered from table to table as we piled helpings of kale, cornbread, black-eyed peas, and fried chicken onto our plates, and asked everybody where they were from. She was too old to talk very well, but her eyes went on for years and years. They said that life is beautiful when people are together and friendly. I cried and laughed for her. She was so beautiful at the head of our table that I wanted to crawl inside of her heart and kiss the womb of her soul. When she looked at me I smiled, and I could feel our respective generations shake hands.

After lunch, we were given a tour of the Jack Daniels distillery. JD whiskey is made by filtering ground corn kernals through partially oxidized coal and clear, natural cave water. Then it is fermented in these huge vats that have the most powerful aroma I believe I have ever encountered. The tour guide told us all to take a long whiff, and he laughed when we reared back our heads at the pins-and-needles rush that shot down our noses and tinged our stomachs.

"Yup, she's strong stuff all right." He said, still chuckling, and then he took a deep breath for himself and sighed with content at the ritualistic stench that goes into the rot-gut buzz of whiskey addicts everywhere.

What was particularly interesting was the fact that Lynchburg is a dry town. No liquor can be sold anywhere. Apparently, the village was dangerously obsessed with its drinking privileges (a local magazine stated that Jack Daniels whiskey was "...one of the most acceptable items of barter in times when cash was scarce.") until the sale of liquor became illegal in 1909. And since Lynchburg is part of the smallest county in Tennessee, the prohibition cannot be repealed.

Besides the absence of its whiskey, the Jack Daniels trademark is still quite pervasive throughout all of Lynchburg. Donna and I marveled over all the souvenir stores that sold shot glasses, stirring rods, tee shirts, and a million other novelties all bearing the Jack Daniels name. The economic omnipotence of the JD syndrome amazed me so much that I had to make an issue of it.

"Do you sell any Jack Daniels' panties in here?" I asked a sales clerk.

"No suh, we sure don't," she replied, giving me a nervous glance.

"How about a JD electron microscope? I've got a girl at home who is just nuts about cellular byproducts."

"A what, suh?"

"A Jack Daniels electric blanket, perhaps."

"Nosuh, and I don't really appreciate..."

"Aw, come on lady! How about a Jack Daniels hookah? Everyone knows that whiskey and marijuana are as inseparable as Anita Bryant and the American Dream."

The lady at the counter was becoming furious, and Louie, one of my companions, was getting tired of my increasingly dangerous jargon. "STOP!" He shouted, and he started shuffling me out of the store while I feigned despair and anxiety. Donna and Sliv exited with embarrassment behind.

********

My quota of insanity now satisfied, I began driving towards Summertown, and The Farm. With Donna meditating, and Louie and Sliv asleep in the back seat, I had some time to think on my own. I speculated on what this place would be like, and how the people there would react to us: four know-nothings who were just out for fancy, sniffing around for a few days and then splitting like shy school girls. I tried to base my expectations on what little knowledge I already had.

The Farm, I had read somewhere, seemed to thrive on a spiritual nucleus that was centered around the teachings and philosophies of a man named Stephen Gaskin. Gaskin's following had evolved from a number of so-called "flower children" who, like many young people in the late 1960's, had journeyed to San Francisco to see what this "counterculture" stuff was all about. And there was a lot to see in San Francisco in those days: mad poets, buddhists, assorted gurus, and the gang at Haight Ashbury who were tying it all together with god's gift to the hip generation: LSD.

Gaskin, for his part, saw all of these things, but he was busy establishing his own small movement. He started this thing called "Monday Night Class" at an experimental college, in which he rapped with people about peace, religion, and spiritual reawakening through other than chemical means. It was like a small breeze of utopia in the eye storm of psychedelia.

As Gaskin's enrollment grew, he began to receive some attention. Eventually, churches from around the country asked him to talk to their kids, so Gaskin and about 250 of his disciples made a tour. They traveled in a caravan of between 20 and 30 colorful buses, which were hassled at every state border by cops who were basically looking for hippies with abnormally large pupils.

By 1971, Gaskin's following was so large that he decided it should evolve into a self-sufficient community. And that's what I was driving towards: a self-sufficient farming community that had developed from a counterculture movement of the 60's, into an alternative living situation of the 70's. And the difference between the two was more than just semantics.

I drove through a series of progressively smaller roads, until a sign pointed out Summertown. I woke up the others and stopped at a gas station where the guy, smiling and nodding when I told him of our destination, directed us onto a dirt road. I followed it until we came upon a sign that read simply, "The Farm." Shortly after, we pulled into this gatehouse, a small, dimly lit cottage that stood out convincingly in the thick, black night. The darkness extended so far that I wondered where the rest of the community was.

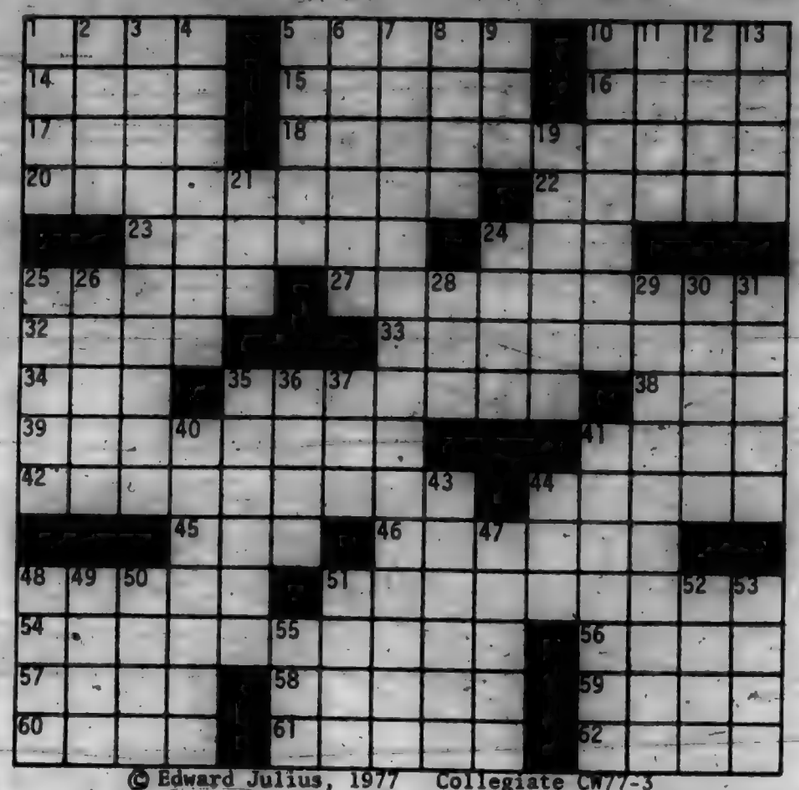
The night was bitter cold, and as we entered the gatehouse, we saw a few lean guys with very long hair standing around a wood-burning stove. They were talking about Gaskin, who at the time was in Australia with the hopes of starting a Farm there (Gaskin's farms are scattered all across the U.S. as well as Mexico, Guatamala, and Bangladesh, I was to find out later.)

I started talking to this fellow named Robert, who was from Toronto. He had come to The Farm for good. He was tired of getting fat, chasing meaningless women, and the hassles of appointments and deadlines.

"My old man got me into this school that was way above my head," he said, "and I was under an obligation to bust my ass, just so I could stay. I spent all of my spare time in this dive bar, trying to pick up this waitress who was teasing me and laughing at me." He laughed and said that it took about a year and 50 pounds for him to realize that he couldn't stand it. I asked him if he missed going to school and the whole "education trip," and he laughed again saying that life here was so "fresh and new" that he never thought about school.

"But don't you think you'll get tired of working at this place everyday?"

"No way, there's too many different jobs to do and people to meet." He said smiling, and I don't think I've ever seen a more convincing smile anywhere.



Don advised everyone to turn in, then, warning us of the long, cold day ahead. My friends slept in a bunk room, while I used a picnic table that was luxuriously close to the stove. I snuggled up in my down sleeping bag and let my mind wander off to the fields I would be working in tomorrow. I had to find out more about this place. How did the people live? Who makes the rules? Was there "a movement" going on here, or was this a simple farming community that wanted nothing to do with the outside world? With the fire crackling, and a choir of snores cutting their way through the night, the forest, and the stars, I felt myself filter through the duck down and into a solid sleep. Last night I had slept in my relatives mansion with ivory toilet seats and plush carpeting, and now I was crashing on a picnic table. What a strange world we live in!

BONDAGE CORNER

by Rudolph Church & Zane Gruder

"The star-crossed hour's hand begets the prick of noon and I a troubled bondo in my grief endure. Foul treachery hath that wretched Pygmy wrought most unkind repayal, O thankless Pygmy squat; prepare to answer zealous imp for treacherous acts the likes of none have been before.

What lousy gall, what vile ambition, has opaqued thy reason and hidden it thus. For lesser sins have many a wretch been made to endure eternal anguish. O vengeful Pygmy though thou wert once my friend I scorn your vile contempt.

To topple me, who by the almight Binder was ordained to lead? To rebel? The rath of E.Z. White is loosed. The constrictive force of three score iron maidens be upon you and squelch your insolence.

You will me this day Shwanzbogger, Mutinous pig that you are, defend yourself and do not cower so."

Arnold could not speak. Perhaps it is best he did not because in the state the professor was in anything he might have said would inevitably have been detrimental. I stared from across the room at the Pygmy's quivering form, cringing beneath the figure of E.Z. who stood as if in judgment, heedless of his subject's fearful whimpers.

The entire scene had occurred so suddenly that it choked on my Woolite and was still coughing up soap bubbles when E.Z. finally addressed me.

"What's the matter Rudi boy? It can't be any worse than a Ball and Chain."

A Ball and Chain is a concoction devised by Zane, during one of his most creative moments, which consisted of equal parts Hiram Walker Imperial and grape juice. Most assuredly a foul drink, but the recall of its fetid aroma at this time, in light of the dyspeptic afterburn of the Woolite, was curiously enough a comfort.

"What is all this talk of treachery professor? Against whom, and of what nature is it that stirs you to such a frenzied state?"

"Conspiracy Rudi, a sordid plot, a fool's ambition to fame. And against whom you ask? It is my very self that has been challenged, and were this not enough, the very doctrines that we hold so dear."

"You mean, The Book of Bondage?"

"Exactly. Rudi, Shwanzbogger has knowingly and purposefully breached the most fundamental commandment of our scriptures, 'Thou shall constrict.'"

"NO."

"By the tightest strap I know it to be so. He did, with malice aforethought, refuse to bind. But a few weeks ago, I approached the trustees of a certain university with a proposition. It was to constrict a massive amount of people and it provided benefits for both myself and my allies in the matter. It would have worked had it not been for the Pygmy's interference.

I had studied the past records of this university and found that raises in tuition had become as much a matter of course as the wearing of sock garters by all professors who attained tenure. My suggestion to the trustees was that they dutifully repeat their previous performances and raise the rate once more by a mere $20,000. They were at first shocked by my idea even threatened to have me prosecuted. Then, however, I divulged the rest of my plan.

"Gentlemen, Gentlemen, please, calm yourselves. This proposal bears good for all involved. These surplus funds will not be used in vain. I mean to use them to build a noble institution complex in which techniques of bondage can be further researched and refined. Think of it sirs; what little we know about strangulation of funds, or blind decision-making. These things could become a reality. Picture it: E.Z. White's Institute of Fine Binding."

"You see Rudi, everyone would have been happy. The trustees would have bound their students and I would have had the research center I had always dreamed of. Before they had a chance to consider it, however, that Pygmy abducted the entire lot out of some deranged compassion for the students. I cannot allow it. Ten thousand students to be bound and Arnold prevented it. No, he cannot be absolved. He must meet his end as an example to future nonconformists."

"Rise, Pygmy, for thy time has come!"

I watched the Pygmy rise to his feet still trembling pitifully. He spoke these words which I shall long remember: "Bondage be no proud, though some call ye mighty and dreadful."

The Constructive Critic

By Doctor Harley Walter Kidder

The author of this particular professional column, which will be a regular weekly feature of The Cynic, will address himself to six major concerns. Those will be: (1) the Cynic itself, (2) education — elementary, secondary, collegiate and graduate, (3) the future of the University of Vermont, (4) The Commonwealth of Vermont, the very first Commonwealth added to the thirteen original States, (5) our republic, the United States of America, the leading republic on our planet today, and (6) popular, representative, responsible constitutional government.

Each installment in this column, which will be free from slang, will be planned, designed and intended to be an outstanding example of creative writing at its very finest, capable of surpassing the most exacting demands of the most avid reader or discriminating scholar.

Statements in this column will be of two kinds — (a) statements of facts and (b) statements of opinions. The former will be either proved or capable of proof while the latter will be based upon all the evidence available.

The subjects to be presented in this column will be timely, accurate, important, challenging and significant. Many of them will include the fruits of my extensive, intensive, original, independent, comprehensive, scientific, therapeutic and professional research, never before published. The interesting and far-reaching revelations of documentary evidence will be offered effectively and dramatically.

The author ardently hopes that this column will be frequently quoted, in both popular conversation and in other newspapers and periodicals.

The rest of this particular column involves a certain aspect of the future of the University of Vermont.

The largest single unit of the University of Vermont is the College of Arts and Sciences while the most prestigious unit is the College of Medicine. As a dedicated alumnus of both these colleges, I am constantly studying the educational, scientific and professional needs and problems of both these units. The College of Arts and Sciences will receive my professional attention in subsequent editions of the Cynic.

The College of Medicine of the University of Vermont is slipping! The evidence in full support of my specific criticism is not only substantial but also profoundly impressive.

Today, the College of Medicine of the University of Vermont offers NO formal instruction whatsoever in medical jurisprudence. This situation is of comparatively recent origin. When I was a junior in the College of Medicine, the stated curriculum of medical and surgical studies included medical jurisprudence, taught by an able, capable, competent, qualified and responsible member of the faculty. With alacrity I devoted myself to this challenging discipline. From that day to this, I have always regarded my formal instruction in this important field as an outstanding example of timely, proper and professional training for the contemporary practice of medicine or surgery or both.

At this point let us consider some helpful and practical definitions. Jurisprudence is the science or philosophy of the law. Medical jurisprudence is that division of jurisprudence which deals with the legal and constitutional aspects of the three practices of nursing, surgery and medicine, and includes the detailed study, analysis, investigation and explanation of actual cases or allegations of (1) malpractice affecting practitioners of these three professions, and (2) maladministration affecting hospitals, sanitaria, sanatoria, nursing homes, convalescent centers and related institutions concerned with the admission, care, treatment, management and professional procedures devised to aid or assist patients so admitted.

The passage of time has given rise to the rapid and elaborate expansion of the three professions above named while the unprecedented growth of the population has intensified the problems and responsibilities of practitioners and institutions alike. In the light of those conditions, bills of complaint alleging malpractice by practitioners and maladministration by hospitals are being filed in both State and Federal courts; furthermore, the number of such bills of complaint is steadily increasing in both State and Federal courts, the situation being truly continental and even world-wide. Juries hearing the evidence in such cases are rendering verdicts which frequently involve fantastic sums of six and even seven digits to the left of the decimal point.

This vast volume of litigation has been accompanied by a marked increase in the annual premiums assessed against surgeons and physicians by insurance companies, which increase has forced certain practitioners to terminate their professional activities.

Reinforce your college degree and get a better start through Army ROTC. Get management training. Self-discipline. A sense of confidence. Earn the extra credentials that will set you apart as a responsible achiever. You'll also receive $2500 over your last two years in the Advanced ROTC Program. Whether your career plans are civilian or military, Army ROTC provides opportunities for both — active duty with a starting salary of over $11,300, or reserve service while employed in the civilian community. Get started for life after college. Get started in Army ROTC.

THE BASIC START.

Get started in Army ROTC through Basic Camp at Fort Knox, Kentucky, this summer. You'll get $500 for attending a challenging six-week camp. If your performance is exceptional, you just may qualify for a two-year scholarship as you enter the Advanced Program.

THE EARLY START.

If you are a veteran (or a Junior ROTC graduate), then you started early — probably without realizing it. That early start makes you automatically eligible to enter the Advanced Program. Why not add an extra $100.00 a month to your veterans benefits.

THE SUMMER START.

You may consider getting started in the Army ROTC summer program on campus. At the end of the summer you may find yourself eligible for the Advanced Program.

Vietnam And Profit

The events and the debates surrounding the recent visit of General Westmoreland indeed raised many enlightening questions concerning free speech, UVM's policy in hiring speakers to visit the campus, Westmoreland's comments themselves, and retrospective analysis of the Vietnam war on the tenth anniversary of the Tet Offensive.

Should Westmoreland have been allowed to speak at all? Surely one cannot rationally argue that he didn't or doesn't have the right to speak here or anywhere else he so chooses. The issue is whether the school should pay $1500 fee and honor as it would any other distinguished person, a man whom large bodies of evidence would readily convict as a war criminal. His administration of or ordering of deliberate bombings and maimings of helpless civilian populations in an attempt to relocate the population from rural to urban areas were inhuman and deplorable acts which have indeed inflicted irreparable damage. An argument in his defense often promulgated is that he was simply following orders and should therefore not be held responsible for his actions. Historically, this concept was tacitly declared invalid as such excuses failed to exonerate Nazi war criminals in the Nuremberg trials after World War II.

In this regard, it is necessary to conclude whether the University has a responsibility to consider the above realities on spending available funds for Westmoreland to speak. The Cynic believes that they do. Justifying his presence on the basis that his talk will be an educational experience – and without question it was – is copping out from what might be considered moral committment. It should not be University policy to offer financial gain to someone earning it for illegal acts and participation in a tragedy which, in retrospect we as a nation realize was a heinous error.

Probably the most disturbing statements made by Westmoreland were in opposition to the war resistance movement. He said, "Civil disobedience, burning of flags, lying and cheating, and burning of draft cards, constituted unconscionable conduct, which encouraged the enemies, prolonged the war, and resulting cost many American lives. Here, he is in effect blaming profoundly disillusioned citizens for dissenting in the only effective way which was open to them. Attributing honest dissenters with prolonging the war is both outrageous and inaccurate. Most observers know that the protest activities in reality hastened the end to our involvement by pressuring political leaders and making them cognizant of unfavorable public opinion.

In retrospect, few scholars of American foreign policy would deny the debacle in Vietnam was a tragic culmination of a fundamentally misdirected ideology originating at the close of World War II. Policy makers elevated every issue to a high moral level which was based in blindly dogmatic opposition to every conceivable manifestation of Communism, and which, within this framework, could be dealt with if placed in the bi-polar context. Unfortunately, this myopic and naive outlook on how various elements were competing for global influence permeated a growing intolerance among our allies and adversaries, which has caused our once indominable world leadership to be successfully challenged. Certainly Vietnam was not the only area of failure, but it was certainly the one that carried with it the gravest consequences both internationally and domestically. Notwithstanding our loss of influence and prestige abroad, the allegations surrounding our presence in Indochina critically divided the population at home – possibly the worst such division since the Civil War.

Toward The Future

To the Editor:

In reference to Eric Pollard's editorial of January 26, I would like to raise several points of contention. The first is his historical inaccuracy in referring to the Vietnam War as being "in almost every instance, under the control of the civilian government." In truth, many aspects of the war, such as the presence of "military advisors" in the early sixties and the bombing and secret invasion of Cambodia were not voted on by Congress, or brought to the attention of the American people, until after the fact. The Vietnam War itself was never declared by Congress, and was referred to for years in the somewhat diminutive term of "conflict."

Mr. Pollard's references to the war as "a beast that should have been allowed to die years ago" and as one of "the time weary causes of a fading generation," strike me as myopic at best, and bring to mind George Santayana's admonition that "those who have not learned the lessons of history are doomed to repeat it." Anyone who maintains that the U.S. could never get involved in another Vietnam might be advised to read up on the present day U.S. presence in the Phillipines, Indonesia, and South Africa, contrasting that information with what existed in Vietnam in the 1950's. Historical commentaries written during or after World War I, eulogizing it as the "war to end all wars," are also sadly amusing.

The activities surrounding General Westmoreland's visit are largely oriented toward the present and future, and are not dredgings of the past, as Mr. Pollard implies. The causes of Vietnam, and the inequality of present day life in the U.S. and the world are issues that are definitely related. In my view, one of the purposes of this Monday's teaching has been to demonstrate this relationship. It is important to educate ourselves about events, both current and preceeding, in order that we can ably move toward the future without "living in the past."

Eric C. Kilburn

Freedom of Speech

To the Editor:

I find myself forced to address Dr. Dellin's defense of Westmoreland's visit, as a symbol of an American freedom. I am appalled at his blatant misuse of ideological rhetoric. If the grounds of his argument lie in the University's moral obligation to present opposing viewpoints, then how would he argue the university's consistent firings of radical professors? Are these professors to be denied freedom of speech within their chosen professions for lack of publication, or some other paltry excuse, while Westmoreland is allowed this freedom, even though his professional actions have been judged as criminal?

This cock-eyed view of freedom is further revealed as paranoia when Dr. Dellin refers to the "snowball" effect of denial of these unexamined rights. He lists Nazism and Communism as having this insidious aspect to their natures and doesn't once mention capitalism. Again, an unreasoned analysis. How would Dr. Dellin argue the evidence of decreased buying power, or the pollution of our privately owned lands and waters? It is my understanding that these are specific freedoms of a so-called democracy. What can be said about the erosions of these basic freedoms?

Finally, I feel entitled to ask these questions, if Dr. Dellin is allowed to ask a question like: "...but did the millions of Vietnamese, Cambodians and others, after our departure, gain peace, freedom and the respect of human dignity now that the Communist "liberators" have triumphed?" Conveniently, he leaves the question unanswered. If I were to reason and answer, I would say yes, they have peace, now that some thirty-odd years of conflict are over. And yes, they have freedom from our imposed governmental system. They have the human dignity of self-government; the cessation from humiliation of being subject to our military's whims.

As far as Dellin's aside: "the political and not the military leaders bear primary responsibility," I shake my head, because Dellin is in effect saying he, himself, is ineffectual. This invalidates his effort to explain, because I can only assume, by his pass the buck attitude, that he doesn't really care.

Sincerely,
E. S.,Small

Ups and Downs

To the Editor:

Thursday night last I anxiously grabbed this semester's first Cynic. By habit I glanced at the cover story and picture, and oh yes... I must not forget the weekly proverb beneath the Cynic logo, for you see, they are usually amusing. Last week's was not. I was offended by someone's vain attempt to inject humor through the use of infantile sexual innuendo. Please refrain from the bathroom graffitti.

Sincerely,
Casey McCann

Cheap Laughs

To the Editor:

I am writing to express my extreme displeasure at the one line quote, "May all your ups and downs be between the sheets," that appeared on the front page of the January 26 edition of the Cynic. It is my opinion, and I believe the opinion of many others, that your "humor" was of the poorest taste. It is upsetting that a college publication such as the Cynic, which is generally very good, could not show a little more class and professionalism than you exhibited. I would hope this is not the beginning of a new trend the new staff plans to bring to the Cynic. I would suggest that the next time you have such a "clever" and "humorous" quote, you keep it to yourself. Not every student at UVM has to depend on such cheap laughs.

Un– informative

To the Editor:

As a habitual, cover-to-cover reader of the Vermont Cynic, I feel compelled to comment on portions of last week's issue. As a general rule, the stories and features published in this newspaper are in some way informative or at least entertaining; this is not so in last week's issue, particularly in the instances of Mark LaReviere's "A Familiar Journey" and "True Confessions of a Snow Bunny," by Kimberly Honza. Both seem to be examples of the bottom 10 percent of journalism.

"A Familiar Journey" has no plot, no story line, nor any apparent reason for having been written. It succeeds in filling a page with a hodge-podge of mixed metaphors and overuse (and abuse) of a Thesaurus with little or no literary value. If that story was a good example of LaRiviere's writing skill, it is very easy to surmise the reason for his present unemployment.

Honza's story, on the other hand, is a believable, if slightly exaggerated, portrayal of a breed of skier who is hopefully on her way to extinction. However, any point Kimberly may have succeeded in making with this account was irreparably damaged, if not completely lost, by her conclusion. The character reduces herself to the same activities for which she admonishes another. In doing so, Honza perpetuates the sexist myth of the may-hungry woman in the world of sports in search of the "perfect jock." In my opinion, to do so is to do a great disservice to both men and women, especially in the area of sports competition. I am in hopes that we have moved past this point in the struggle for human rights.

The Price Dissenters Pay

Whistleblowers are a unique lot. One wonders what it is that leads some disgruntled employees to risk family, security, and career and speak out against corruption, waste, or regulatory abuse while the rest – the vast majority – remain silent and tolerant. No doubt the blood boils hot in many more souls than the small number willing to take the risk. Numerous case histories tend to place a damper on the American ideal of free speech and the right to dissent.

The story of A. Ernest Fitzgerald is a good example. In 1968 this "famous whistleblower" (St. Louis Globe – July 4, 1977) struck a well-intended blow to the Pentagon by exposing the staggering $2 billion in overrun costs for the Air Force C5-A. Apparently he was soon after switched from reviewing major weapons programs in the Pentagon to reviewing costs for a bowling alley in Thailand. Not a passive sort – The National Taxpayers Union is one of his current hobbies – he protested and was fired. Being a hero is nice, Fitzgerald discovered, but so was being employed. After nine years and one half million dollars in legal support by the ACLU, as of last July he had yet to get his job back.

The government does not look highly upon whistleblowers. Especially in the higher levels, where recruitment, selection, and employment processes are based largely on the "buddy system" – you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours – the "to get along, go along" pressure is severe. One can only ponder as to how many frustrated, disillusioned, yet silent employees there are for each of the few who risk dissent.

Though a minority, numerous whistleblowers like Fitzgerald have struck – and have paid dearly. The painful record is shown in a detailed report issued by Senator Leahy (D–Vt.) last December. The basic pattern is the same over and over. An employee – distraught by waste or corruption – goes public. Shortly thereafter – often blatantly, sometimes subtly – the employee is demoted, fired, reassigned, isolated, or simply ignored. Ironically, those to whom he might have turned for help – his allies – will refuse any assistance, silenced by their own career concerns.

What the cost of all this is – the absence of a viable mechanism for dissent – is to the government and the nation is a big unknown. The universal effort to surpress or undermine the validity of dissenters is a product of those who have been in power over the years. It is a mechanism of self-defense inherent in the power structure. Whereas whistleblowers are often working to rid a department or business of waste or corruption – an effort often advantageous to the organization and society at large – they represent a direct threat to their superiors. Survival of the fittest rests for no species – rests for no civil servant.

An example of widespread suppression of dissent is evident in Professor Douglas Kinnard's book The War Managers. The book itself is essentially a mechanism of dissent as it is based upon the results of an anonymous questionnaire sent to the 173 US Army Generals serving in Viet Nam. The responses by the generals concerning such touchy issues as the lack of a clear understanding of US military objectives in Viet Nam, the techniques for measuring progress, and various warfare tactics, show clearly that throughout the US intervention in Viet Nam even the high positioned officers felt compelled to go along rather than express their complaints, frustrations, and concerns and risk damaging the careers they had struggled hard for. Again, one can only speculate as to the cost of such suppression.

It is difficult to sell a product based on unknown yet potentially positive effects upon society – especially when the project is legislation. Leahy and others are trying. The senator's solution lies in the passage of laws allowing federal workers to take complaints to an independent review board, with resultant steps taken to resolve those found to be valid.

Leahy's proposition is an attractive one, although its value may be difficult for us college students to relate to. Unlike professionals well into a career and with families to care for, most students have little to risk in speaking out in the hopes of improving the system. From most reports, this freedom is shortlived after graduation for those interested in climbing hierarchical ladders. The prospects of moving into a job market which has viable mechanisms for dissent are cause for optimism. We can only hope that Leahy and others can avoid becoming victims of the disease they are trying to cure.

INSIGHT

The Sinai Connection

By Eric Pollard

Once again talks of peace in the Middle East are an idealistic dream. The much-discussed negotiations between Israel and Egypt collapsed last week as the result of Prime Minister Begin's faux pas in toasting the Egyptian representative to the talks in Jerusalem. His somewhat ungracious remarks about the ultimate impossibility of return to pre-1967 borders may have jeopardized the positive action that has taken place recently to calm tensions between the two countries. The withdrawal of the Egyptian negotiators was not as much a reaction to Begin's undiplomatic bluntness but a response to the apparent unwillingness of the Israeli government to facilitate the speedy settlement of a "permanent" peace. There is no question that these events are welcomed with much laughter in some capitals of world. The smirks and wry smiles in Moscow and Benghazi would most certainly be something to behold.

Egypt's President Anwar Sadat had hoped to impress the Arab world into following Egypt's leadership by committing a brazen act of unorthodox diplomacy in which he hoped to settle the "Palestinian question." He made the grave mistake of assuming that Begin would do the same in his own country. While Begin was very willing to negotiate when the idea was first mentioned, his enthusiasm seems to have found a new outlet in the scholarly disposition of Hebraic history. The Sadat initiative depended on fast results to achieve the goal for which it was designed, that being to prove that two civilized peoples can come together and settle their differences without outside assistance or interference. It was further an effort to prove to the Western world that the Arabs, at least some of them, were qualified to be considered full-fledged members of modern diplomatic society. Begin was successful in destroying any chance that Sadat had of pulling the other Arab countries into a more moderate line, a move that will eventually cost him dearly. He could not, however, take away from Sadat's new-found prestige as an international diplomat and gentleman.

It is clear that there is little hope for a settlement of the Middle East's problems in the forseeable future. It must be said that Sadat has struck a solid blow for the Arab cause, indirect as it may have been. By holding to a hard line in the negotiations, Begin has established Israel as the warrior of the two nations, an image, when considered alongside Israel's continued ties of South Africa, which brings the desire for a Jewish national homeland into serious question in the United States. By taking away the popular image of the fight for justice in Palestine, Begin has weakened what has been his strongest source of support, the United States Congress. If Begin wishes to avoid establishing Israel as the "Fortress of the Middle East," as South Africa has become the fortress of its respective continent, he must act to counter the opinion that his hasty words have fostered. The direction of peace rests with him; Sadat has gone his mile. Begin can no longer use the excuse that his people have been persecuted since their first sojourn in Egypt to disguise his policy decisions. It is now obvious where the responsibility for peace lies and Begin must act upon that responsibility.

people's priority lists. But as with all student activities, it's up to the students to plan, work and organize together. Only the OC's House Manager is paid for the determined hours they put in, while other jobs including top spots are volunteer. It's not only organizational leaders that the club needs however; trip leaders — many of whom have been attracted to WE — are also a scarce commodity in high demand. People who have the time and skill to put together a trip have either been inundated with requests for their assistance or haven't been willing to show any enthusiasm. (The repetitive trademark of UVM apathy strikes again.) It seems against the nature of the liberal UVMer that they have become passive observers towards this subject.

"Different people coming in and out of the Outing Club spur and change it in different directions," remarked Henrikson. This is especially true for this semester because the main OC VIP's, have just assumed their positions. Any student willing to shun off past impressions (good or bad) of the OC realizes that the apathy of the student body that would attempt to re-excite the meetings, could be a great asset to the club. But the fact remains, as Henrikson states, "There aren't people in there presently that can make it happen. Everything gets done, but we need a strong and large number of leaders with an increased attendence."

The largest contributing factor to the OC's state of confusion according to Jeff Kuller is the "mushrooming effect" of a much appreciated decision by the SA to substantially increase the budget for the Club in order to help purchase equipment for the more general user. The OC grew so fast that people couldn't keep track of it. Nancy Babcock and John Henrikson played a significant role in this temporarily. But the general feeling is that they and others who got the OC off its feet are now into new things. Jeff Kuller, the coordinator between the Outing Club and Wilderness Experience (WE), sees a hole in the system because a process for new people to come in and eventually take over wasn't established or developed.

During the great surge of the Outing Club, John Henrikson slid into the position of running the house — the crux of the club — under the auspices of elected officials. Soon conflicts within the club arose, which led to the step down of the President leaving John as the main authority.

Since then, Henrikson has introduced much of the accountability forms and records that were needed to keep track of the large amount of equipment they now possess. His presence was felt and needed at all OC events. John, however, disappointed over the paucity of other students willing to assume other positions of responsibility, decided it was "time to move on," besides his losing interest.

All of the aforementioned factors led to a sharp downfall in the Outing Club's prestige. Yet the Outing Club lives on and is striving to come from under the shadows. They have established a work requirement for the equipment they lend out. Its weekly meetings are beginning, and it is presently sponsoring the Cross Country Cruise, a Winterfest campus cross-country race this Saturday. The job of House Manager has traded hands from John Henrikson to Joan Todd and Amy Kahn. The executive board has a fairly definite list of board members headed by Chairman Sam Worthington. The turnout for the first meeting is always expected to be high, but the fate of the Outing Club will be unclear until the semester progresses.

Jeff Kuller thinks the OC fluctuates with up and down cyclical movements, the implication being that he hopes the Outing Club will rise to a prominent and active organization again, much like the economy going from low periods to ones of prosperity.

"Yet," Jeff continued, "there are two restrictions. We need some strong personality, but the Executive Board is presently serving that purpose. What we need the most is students to gain interest and participate."

Most people agree that the Outing Club needs time to reorganize. The leadership of the Outing Community believes they have to build stronger ties with its constituents. The Cynic is supportive and confident that the Outing Club will soon thrive again, with new leaders who return the club to its former position of high esteem.

the end of the Friday meeting, students are prepared for their start early the next day.

On Saturday morning, instructors and students alike arrive bleary eyed and yawning in an aura of excitement and anticipation about the eventful days to come. The vans are loaded, and everyone settles down for their last bit of civilized comfort before reaching the mountains.

From then on, the trip is dependent upon many variables. The weather, the terrain, the interests and strengths of the group, all have bearing on which topics will be covered. A few basics are integral to any Wilderness Experience trip, however. A student may expect to become familiar with trip preparation, outdoor clothing, map and compass, hiking, snowshoeing, mountain safety, hypothermia, camp cookery, shelter construction, and equipment use.

As the day moves on, frequent stops are usually made to adjust boots and snowshoes, to remove or add layers of clothing, to have lunch, and to exchange Burlington water for that from a nearby mountain stream! Travel usually stops when the group has arrived at the planned destination, or when daylight begins to wane. At this time, preparations for dinner and for shelter begin. We have used many combinations of tents, tarps, lodges, snow shelters, and igloos according to season, available time, and energy of the group. Dinner consists of high protein, high caloric cuisine which, without exception, always tastes good. Everybody is ready for sleep after a last handful of popcorn or cup of hot chocolate.

The second day of the trip begins with a hearty breakfast and a discussion of the activities of the day. We usually cover at least one peak, be it Mt. Abraham, Mt. Mansfield, or others in our vicinity. Although reaching the summit is a climax of sorts, usually group cohesiveness, person-to-person interaction, knowledge, and outdoor skills far outweigh reaching any summit.

The trip ends with the descent from the mountains to the awaiting vans. The ride home is sometimes quite quiet, with many people dozing off to sleep or thinking back to what they have just experienced. At other times, the van is alive with "remember when's" or requests for cheese and crackers or left over granola.

When the van finally arrives at the Outing Club house, students are busy drying out sleeping bags and tents, washing pots and pans, and returning equipment. Often at this time, telephone numbers and addresses are exchanged, with plans in mind for other trips at later dates. Goodbyes and thank-yous are customary, and everyone goes home looking forward to a long shower or a nice hot bath.

Hockey Playoff Hopes Dwindle As Cats Falter

Terriers Nip Cats 6-4

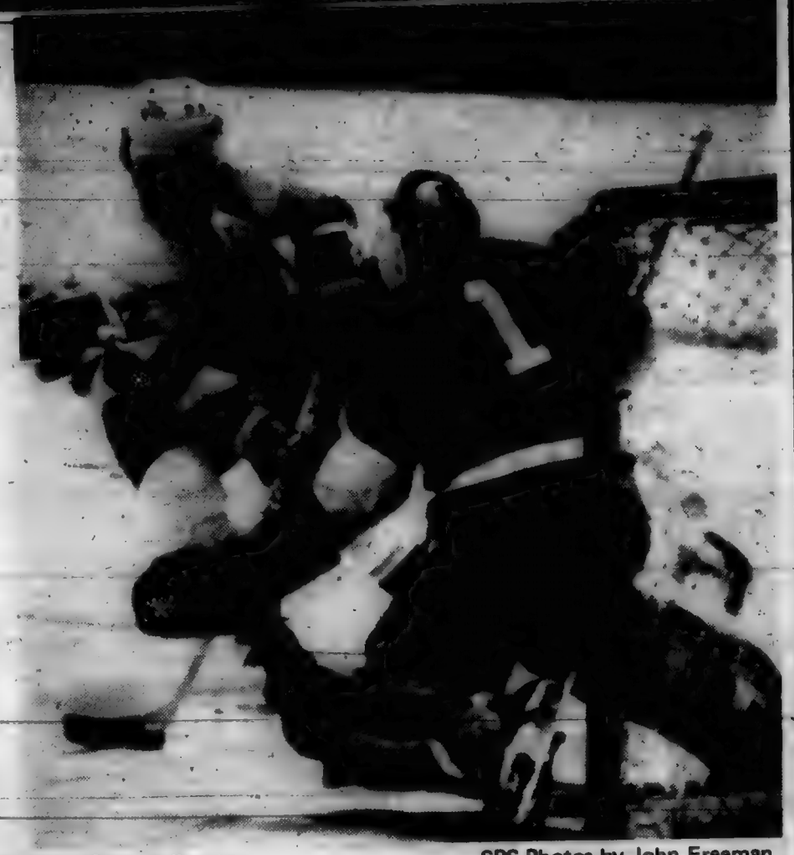
by Jamie Leopold

The Boston University Terriers invaded Gutterson Field House on Saturday, and bested the UVM Ice Cats by a score of 6-4, before a full house of cheering Vermont Fans.

The contest was a rough, physical game, resulting in numerous penalties, 9 minors and 2 misconducts for Boston and 12 minors for Vermont. Among them were a few controversial calls. One key penalty was called at 6:15 of the third period, as Chuck Ross went off for charging. The resulting power play and goal gave BU a 5-3 lead.

The Ice Cats were the 17th victim to fall prey to the Terriers this season. BU is ranked number one in the country and Saturday night they showed why. Making few mistakes, playing fast, crisp hockey, pouncing on every opportunity is the mark of an excellent hockey team. The first period was not great hockey. Both teams were sluggish and were having difficulty clearing the puck out of their defensive zones. The Terriers drew first blood when UVM's Greg Wilkie drew two minutes for charging. Twenty-seven seconds later, BU's John Bethel scored a power play goal. Bethel scored again in the first stanza, en route to a hat trick for the evening. Louis Cote scored the lone goal of the period for UVM, with assists from Andy Halford and Jim Duffy.



The first period also saw a goal scored by Terrier Dave Silk that was disallowed due to an illegal stick. This cost Silk two misconduct penalties and BU Coach Parker a two minute minor for delay of game.

The second period began with UVM trailing the Terriers 2-1. Goals by Gordie MacFarlane (assisted by Koch) and Craig Homola (assisted by Reber and Otness) were answered by one BU goal. It was scored by Jack O'Callahan on a powerplay with McAlduff in the box for tripping. The score at the end of two periods was 3-3.

In the second period Vermont accumulated six minor penalties, accounting for 12 minutes of penalty time while BU had only one penalty for two minutes. This meant that the Cats played for ten minutes without one man, but gave up only one goal, not a bad average.

As the Cats came out on the ice to start the third period, a thunderous round of applause greeted them, lasting for several minutes and then the inevitable "Go Cats Go." The crowd was wild, with the score tied at 3-3 and the chances of a major upset

Penalty Recalls BU Goal

By Paul Gardner

Having pursued the Cats through the wilds of New Hampshire into Boston Garden for their third place-first-year-in-division one-finish, and through hell and gone since then, I consider myself a dedicated fan. So, when I overheard a couple of self-professed Michigan grads say there was nothing like a Michigan hockey game, I perked my ears to hear about this great thing. The guy who made the comment went on to talk about the wild fights one of the Michigan-Ohio St. Hockey games had engendered – between fans of the opposing teams that is. Take BU and Vermont. Yes, we lost, but according to BU coach Jackie Parker, BU played a good game and Vermont still managed to stay tough. The fans were also appreciative, which goes to show that the Vermont fan is still among the most knowledgable in the league. Knowledgable because ignorant people seldom recognize talent or real effort when they see it.

In the interest of further informing the fan I'd like to point out interesting plays of the game; it came in the first period and cost BU a goal. UVM was trying desparately to skate off a BU two man advantage with aggressive forechecking, but trouble was inevitable because Dave Silk was parked all alone in front of Turcotte. Three seconds before Andy Halford would have returned to the ice to give UVM four skaters, Silk knocked in a rebound at 15:11 and the score became 2-0 BU... momentarily. Somebody on the Vermont bench had noticed that Silk's stick had too much curve to it. According to referee Tom Walsh this is an infraction that the opposite team has to call. They are entitled to ask for a measurement any time it suits

Upsets Stymie Vermont Icers

By Paul Gardner

With a cruel twist of fate, UVM lost two games they considered crucial to win to make the playoffs, 7-2 to Providence and 6-4 to Princeton.

Though in the ECAC's Division 1 anything can and usually does happen, it seemed the Cat's record would be 7-5 for BU Saturday. It even looked that way for a period of hockey against PC that was close to being UVM's best all season. However after evening the score at 2-2 in the second, the PC Friars went on to ruin Vermont 7-2, with four goals in the last eight minutes of play.

Turcotte made several good stops earlier in the game, but in the third he seemed to lose concentration and a lot of shots started going in.

Dropping to Princeton 6-4 the Cats virtually ended their playoff hopes for this year. UVM outshot Princeton 34-23, but failed to take advantage of this edge.

As it has been most of the season, Vermont's break out from its defensive zone was lacking and led to many extra chances for Princeton. At times, UVM was forced to dump the puck just to get it out to center. From there, Princeton was able to dump it back into the Vermont zone and keep the Cats bottled up. Too often the situation was worsened by errant passes, or pucks lost in skates or behind the player. For its part, Princeton did not come into Gutterson unannounced. BU sneaked past them 4-3 and streaking Cornell had to score with eight seconds left to win 7-6 playing in Ithaca where Cornell destroyed highly touted BC 13-3. Despite the sloppy overtones of the game Princeton's Tigers earned this win with good shooting and respectable defense in the face of a seventeen shot blitz by UVM in the third period.

Perhaps looking ahead to Saturday night's action against undefeated BU, Vermont coach Jim Cross put Tony Frost in goal for the Cats. It was Frost's first appearance in a Division I game since UVM's 6-3 loss to Harvard two months ago. Frost did a good job on Tiger's aggressive shooters who had several good chances in the first period and continued to make life miserable for the Cats in their own zone.

For UVM the scorers were Bill McAlduff (PPG), Andy Halford, one each in the first two periods. Princeton matched UVM with a goal in the first, roared out to 4-2 lead in the second and held with two more in the third.

There is still hope for the Cats at this point and it lies in improving their defense. If the Cats didn't gamble as deeply on offense they might not have to make up as many goals as they had to in Princeton game. They showed in December that they could win on a minimum of goals by shutting down the offense and concentrating on protecting Turcotte.

Basketball Report

UMaine Bears Bite Cats

By Steven Larose

Mike Kern exploded for 26 points, but he could not break Vermont of its persistent and deadly habit of completely collapsing in the first period, as the Cats were again routed early in the game and went on to lose badly, 94-74, at the University of Maine Saturday afternoon.

Kern came off the bench with three fouls to pump in 25 second half points, hitting 12 shots from the floor. But Vermont had already past the vanishing point, as Maine outscored the Cats 22-2 during a seven minute stretch mid-way through the first half. As Vermont stood with both feet in their grave, Maine had a field day, leading by 22 points at the intermission and by more than 30 points at one time in the 2nd stanza.

The game was almost an instant replay of Friday's loss to Maine. Vermont started out strong, and even led, 11-10 with 13:23 left in the 1st half. Then Vermont's strength ebbed away leaving them crippled on the court, vulnerable to the devastating Black Bear attack.

For the Cats, the loss was another long chapter in their growing book of gloom. It was the nineth consecutive loss on the road this season, dropping the Cats' record to 7-11. All but one of these mysterious road losses have been by huge margins, as the Cats cannot seem to keep glued together longer than ten minutes on the court. A puzzled Coach Salzberg answered "Mechanically, we know what we are doing wrong. Mostly it's offensive, since we have been taking bad shots and have had little patience. But it's puzzling why we keep making the mistakes over and over. It has become more of a psychological problem than anything else."

In addition to Kern's stellar performance, Jim Nocera had 14 points, as he continues to be Vermont's glimmer of hope in a sea of despair. Mark Sobolewski had three points along with Bruce Beynnon. Rob McKenzie and Corey Weilgus both had two points each. Kevin Kelly had seven along with Tyrone Johnson. Dane Correll added six and Greg Davis pumped in four points to round out the scoring.

Vermont returns to Patrick Gym on February 8th to take on the University of New Hampshire, after playing UNH at Durham Wednesday, Feb. 1st.

Salzberg Comments On Cats' Problems

by Steven Larose

"It has become a psychological problem more than anything else," lamented Coach Salzberg as he talked about the recent problems that University of Vermont basketball team has undergone in the last month, causing the Cats to slump to a 7-11 record.

"We lost four games we could have won in the last month. The problem has been in out offense and our poor shot selection. We have had good defense and a small amount of turnovers, but we have popped off too many quick shots, and it has hurt us."

Salzberg continued by remarking "We need to win to regain our tempo, I think we might even be trying too hard to win. In practice, I have been trying to encourage execution. We need to take shots and believe they will go in. My men are lacking confidence, and are making unsure shots."

When asked about Jim Nocera's dazzling performances, Coach Salzberg replied "Jim has come a long way this season, he has been working hard and capitalizing on his natural talent. But other individual players have performed excellently in separate games. The problem cannot be pinpointed on any one player's performance, it's a team thing. The team is laboring under a lack of patience. To snap ourselves out of it, we need a win soon. If we can win six out of our last nine games, we will have a successful season. But to do that, we must regain the style of play we had before semester break."

Vermont Stomped On The Road

By Steven Larose

The ghost of games past came back to haunt the University of Vermont Basketball team, as the Cats continued to fall flat in the first half and then be trampled over, this time by the Black Bears of the University of Maine in Orono last Friday night, by a dismal 72-59 score.

Vermont stayed even with the Bears during the opening minutes, but the Cats' lack of patience and poor shot selection did them in, along with Maine's rugged defense. Vermont sunk ten of 27 shots from the floor, to go into the locker room at the half behind 35-23. Vermont played well in short bursts, pulling as close as three points with six minutes left in the first half. But Maine came on steadily, and ran off a 13-4 streak that quickly put Vermont miles behind.

Coach Peter Salzberg pointed to the weak first half as the key reason for Vermont's 10th loss of the season. He also mentioned that Vermont's poor shot selection and Maine's harrassment of the Cats' man-to-man defense led to the poor showing.

Vermont switched to a zone defense that stalled the aggressive Bears, and allowed Vermont to pull within seven at 50-43 with 9:29 left in the game, but the Cats again collapsed and the Bears coasted in for the easy victory.

Jim Nocera was Vermont's only man in double figures, with 13 points on six field goals and a foul shot. Mark Sobolewski and Dane Correll both pitched in eight while Charlie Trapani and Tom Perrin both had six. Bob Dyer, Mike Kern, Tyrone Johnson and Greg Davis all had four each, while Bruce Beynnon rounded out the Cat scoring with two points.

The loss dropped Vermont's record to 7-10, and set the stage for Saturday's repeat performance.

BU Trips Cats

As the period began, UVM had 53 seconds left to serve on a penalty. When the penalty expired, Dave Otness stepped onto the ice prematurely, resulting in yet another penalty, BU powerplay and goal. The goal gave Bethel of BU a hat trick for the evening and put Boston ahead, 4-3.

The Cats fought back, playing well, displaying poise and determination. When Chuck Ross was slapped with a highly questionable charging penalty, the well-oiled BU machine then struck for another powerplay goal and some insurance. Less than two minutes later, the Terriers scored goal number six and put the game out of reach.

UVM's Jim Murphy closed the scoring at 16:19 with a powerplay goal, assisted by Louis Cote and Andy Halford.

The large number of penalties called on the Cats and BU's very effective use of the power play were deciding factors in the game. Four of BU's six goals were made on powerplays.

Conversely, the Cats were unable to capitalize on their powerplay opportunities despite several five on three penalty situations.

The Ice Cats, now 11-10 overall and 5-8 in Division I, will now visit Northeastern (7-6 in Division I) on Saturday, February 4th. This Tuesday, February 7th, Brown University (8-4, third in Division I) will stroll into the Catamount's Den.

them. Goals scored with illegal sticks are nullified in the same way that goals scored after the puck has been directed ahead with the glove are not counted. So, having noticed the stick and having had Silk score with it, Vermont called for a measurement. The goal vanished off the score board and Gutterson rejoiced. Silk recalled, "I was pissed" Pissed enough in fact that he tossed the offending stick out of the penalty box in which he had been incarcerated for the duration of a ten minute personal misconduct, the only trouble being that as soon as the stick hit the ice a ten minute unsportsmanlike conduct penalty followed the misconduct. The immediate result was a confusing interlude (for the fan at any rate) as the time keeper tried to squeeze "20" onto a board that was only made to say "10". That of course straightened itself out at 19:59.

Poor Dave Silk was still muttering to himself about the penalty after the game. When asked if he didn't know that the stick was curved too much he mumbled something largely incoherent, but with an affirmative sound to it. Having squeaked past yet another upset bid, Jackie Parker was in a generous mood. "Any time we get out of this crazy place with a win I'm satisfied," said Parker. About the refs Parker observed that they were pretty hard on Silk. "They gave a ten minute penalty and took his goal, so naturally he's upset. He tried to get rid of a stick which is illegal, and they hit him with another ten minutes. Sure he deserved it technically. Yeah, they called everything close. It actually helped us a lot." Quite likely indeed, UVM had twelve penalties and BU got five powerplay goals.

Women Cagers Topple Williams

By Mike McCormick

Margaret Considine paced the University of Vermont Women's Basketball team to a 76-51 victory over Williams College Saturday at Patrick Gym.

Considine dropped in 26 points and was a deciding factor in both the Cats' offensive and defensive drives. Belinda Emerson chipped in with 12 points as the Cats muffled Williams with a tight defense right from the opening tip. Mary Eddy directed the offense with a variety of fast breaks and set-up plays that kept Williams off balance. Vermont took a 42-25 lead at the half, but was never threatened in the final period. The victory evened the Cats' record at 3-3.

SPORTS ROUND UP

UVM Hosts Ski Carnival

Doug Bruce and Mark Wagner will lead the University of Vermont Ski Team into battle against 11 top collegiate ski teams from around the nation, as they gather at the UVM Ski Carnival to be held Friday and Saturday at Middlebury and Stowe.

The jumping events will commence on Thursday at 1:30, at the Middlebury Ski Jump. The Alpine Giant Slalom will start on Friday at 11 for the Women and at 10:30 for the men on the Chimclip Trail at Mount Mansfield at Stowe. Women's Cross-Country will begin at the Trapp Family Lodge on Friday at 1 o'clock while the men's event will start at 2:15 p.m. The Slalom on Saturday will kick off at Little Spruce at 9 a.m. with the men's trials, while the women will compete at 11.

Captain Doug Bruce, an all-American returning senior, will headline the UVM Men's Giant Slalom team. Bruce finished second in the Nor-Am races held recently at Waterville Valley. Joining Bruce in the top three slots will be Scott Light, a sophomore All-American and McNealus, also a member of the U.S. Ski Team.

Coach Chip LaCasse has not decided who will fill the remaining two spots on the five man Alpine team. Still in contention for starting positions are Alpine Captain Kent Belden, a senior All-American, Jeff Darrow, Calvin Erdman, Richie Wright, and Brooks Dodge.

The Cross-Country team will be powered by the dynamic Mark Wagner, UVM captain, All-American, and U.S. Ski team member. Joining him will be Karsten Medvedt and Mark Quinlan. Kent Karns heads the list of possible fourth position skiers. Coach LaCasse stressed that he can jockey the team rosters, since a total of only seven skiers on the cross-country and jumping teams is allowed.

Roger Holden, an All-American and second place winner in the NCAA finals two years ago, will head the jumping squad. He will be joined by Kare Herje, a freshman from Norway. Dennis Lambert and Dave Larson also look strong as starters. Coach LaCasse lamented that UVM has not been able to train for several weeks, since the loss of UVM's own Williston Ski Jump to high insurance rates, a direct result of the Sunday vs. Stratton case. Fortunately, UVM has gained access to Middlebury's ski jump to train on.

Coach LaCasse closed by pointing out that UVM has won 11 consecutive carnivals going into this UVM Carnival. The UVM Ski Team has also won the Eastern Division I championships for the last two years.

Women Skiers Win At Colby-Sawyer

The University of Vermont Women's ski team took first place over Middlebury in the Colby-Sawyer Carnival ski meet held Saturday.

UVM finished with an impressive 172 points, seven points above second place Middlebury with 165. Johnson State placed third with 108, and Dartmouth finished fourth, scoring 105 points. Maine, New Hampshire, Williams and Colby-Sawyer also competed and finished in that order.

The Cats placed strongly in the slalom event taking four of the top ten spots. Gail LeBaron finished second, with Melissa Papworth coming in fourth. Lisa Morrison and Liz Worner crossed the finish line fifth and seventh respectively. Muffy Arndt took third place for Vermont in the Giant Slalom, followed by Papworth and Morrison at ninth and tenth. Shay and Nancy Dickson placed sixth and tenth respectively to secure a Vermont victory.

The final result was a direct reversal of last week's St. Lawrence Carnival in which Middlebury edged Vermont to take first place.

AquaCats Lose To UConn

At the last moment, the UVM men's swim team was narrowly defeated by the University of Connecticut last Saturday in Storrs. In the final event, the Huskies stole the 400 freestyle relay to claim a victory of 59-54.

Among the standouts for UVM was Mark Kinne, who won the 1000 yard freestyle with a time of 10:45.5. Kinne also took the 200 butterfly in 2:11.1, and placed second in the 500 freestyle with a time of 5:15.1. Steve Levy won the 200 yard backstroke (2:09.1) and gained second in the individual medley, with a time of 2:07.6. Levy also led UVM's winning effort in the 400 yard medley relay. That relay squall also included Andy Daniels (breaststroke), Mark Haun (fly), and Ron Kirkwood (free). In addition to swimming the freestyle leg of the medley relay, Ron Kirkwood won the 50 freestyle with a time of 22.7 and took second in the 100 free in a time of 49.8. Captain Peter Golhaar triumphed in the 50 free, taking first place. Kim Berman, a freshman from Malden, Mass, took second, behind UVM's Kinne with a time of 2:14.4. Bryon Cassidy took third in his first attempt at the 1000 yard freestyle event. Dave Platow captured a third in the 200 yard backstroke, with a time of 2:14.4.

The most exciting race of the afternoon was the 200 yard breaststroke, in which Allen Kopel secured second place in a grueling race with the lead changing many times.

The Diving Corps of Bob Clews, Don Conture, and John Prushko capped off the Aqua Cats performance. Conture took second, and Prushko took third. Aqua Cats will travel to Durham, N.H., Saturday February 4th to challenge UNH.

Concordia Drops Vermont Women Icers

By Melissa Brown

The University of Vermont Women's Ice Hockey team traveled to Montreal last weekend for a pair of games as part of the 11th Concordia College Annual Invitational Hockey Tournament. Although UVM lost both games, they displayed some fine skating skills. The Catamounts were a bit sluggish in the offensive zone, however, perhaps owing to the long Christmas break.

In the first contest of the tourney, UVM lost to Concordia 4-0. In their first meeting earlier this year, the two teams tied 2-2 but Concordia came out skating more sharply in the first period of this game to establish an edge in shooting which did not diminish until the third period when the Cats outshot the Stingers 14-6. UVM was initially hampered in the first period as the Cats were forced to make some unusual defensive combinations due to lack of personnel. As UVM was unbalanced, Concordia scored immediately following the initial center ice face-off. Midway through the same period, Concordia scored again to take a 2-0 lead into the second period, as the Stingers made good on a pair of floating shots from the point. In the third period, UVM looked sharper and played an even period of hockey with Concordia, but emerged scoreless. UVM goalie Ann Bartlett had 26 saves.

The next day UVM took on Cornell in the consolation final and lost 2-1. The Cats skated with them throughout the game despite their loss. In the first period neither team scored. Although both teams had many fine opportunities, Cornell outshot UVM by a large margin.

In the second period UVM's Doris Bonner connected on a centering pass from left wing Cathy Sagaser to make the score 1-0. Shortly following the first goal, UVM was caught in a line shift and Cornell evened the score at 1-1. The third period was back and forth as both teams had several shots which went just wide of the net. Both teams also suffered from several panalties for "body contact" which were part of the controversial officiating during the tournament. Cornell finally scored to go ahead for good. UVM tried unsuccessfully to even the score in the closing minutes of the period by inserting a sixth skater. Goalie Ann Bartlett finished with 33 saves for UVM.

UVM is now 4-4-1 on the season and next takes on UConn at Leddy Park Saturday February 4 as part of the Burlington Winter Carnival.

Track Cats Surprise UNH

by Bernie Gagnon

The University of Vermont Men's Track Team stole enough points from New Hampshire to allow Bates to pull in a surprise victory during the Bates Tri-meet last Saturday. Vermont finished with 48 points, only 6 behind UNH's 54 point second place finish. Bates racked up a 70 point score.

These results produce a struggle for third place conference honors that will not be decided until the championship meet on February 18 at UConn. At that time, UMass and UConn will fight it out for the top spot. However, Maine, UNH, and Vermont will all be gunning for third. In meets held earlier this year, Maine was handily defeated by Bates and UVM, while New Hampshire soundly beat Maine.

Several Vermont tracksters pulled off upsets at Bates, including captain Dick Emberley's victory in the 440 yard run and Captain Bernie Gagnon's come from behind victory in the mile relay. Joe McClallen was Vermont's only double winner, taking the 45 yard dash and the long jump. Coach Kusiak later called McClallen one of the finest sprint prospects in New England.

In other events, Eric Benson and Ryan Rickarby stunned the Tri-meet crowd by finishing first and third in the pole vault. Dick Emberly placed third in the triple jump, and Craig Buscemi was fourth. John Cushman placed fourth in the 45 yard dash. Ed Nemeth placed fourth in the 1000 yard dash. UVM was third in the two mile relay, while the Vermont team of Looney, Hanlon, Gurney and Gagnon won the mile relay. Bernie Gagnon also placed third in the 600 yard dash. Charles Claudio took second in the high jump, while Bob Frank and John Looney placed third and fourth respectively, in the 45 yard hurdles. Claudio also took fourth in the 35 pound weight. Ed Nemeth ran an excellent time of 2:20 in the 1000 yard run, rounding out a respectable showing by the Track Cats.

Doug Woodcock- Pro Ski Racer

By Brian Evans

Doug Woodcock, one of the best alpine skiers in the world, presently is making a living competing on the World Pro Skiing Tour. At the English Leather Cup, held at Spruce Peak Jan. 12–15, Woodcock placed second in the slalom and left Stowe heading to the next competition more than $3000 wealthier. Last year Woodcock finished seventh on the pro tour pocketing $14,927 in prize money.

Woodcock is 26 years old, and started skiing at the early age of five. He won his first major skiing championship at 17. He soon went on to become the Canadian downhill champion. Thereafter, he skied with the Canadian National Team for four years but never placed higher than 19th in a World Cup competition.

"Finally I started getting bummed out with the situation. I wasn't very happy with my skiing. I had seen a Pro race and I was impressed by it and I was really impressed by the fact that the guys seemed to be having a good time. I made the step and it was a good move," explained Woodcock.

Woodcock has been on the pro circuit for five years. World Pro Skiing is distinguished from other alpine skiing competitions by its dual format where the racers compete on two parallel courses in head to head confrontation. In amateur competition the skier races alone against the clock. Woodcock prefers the pro format. "There's no question that it's a fairer format. It suits me better. Some guys seem to excell in the head to head competition. You ski better when you're competing on a man to man basis rather than by yourself," Woodcock said.

The fact that Pro race courses are shorter than the amateur ones has become a criticism of the circuit. But when one considers that Woodcock and the other top three finishers had to ski eleven runs before claiming their prizes, it's hard to believe the pro circuit is any less grueling. So why did Doug Woodcock go professional? Woodcock continued, "It was partly because I wasn't happy with my own skiing. I didn't think I was skiing well, and, to a certain extent, that I was going to the races I wanted to. I was competing mostly downhill and I didn't have enough of an opportunity to work on my slalom and giant slalom. That's why I thought it would be great to go pro because you have to work on both G.S. and slalom."

With regard to his 14th place finish in the downhill at Stowe, Woody had the following to say: "It's been four years since I've run downhill so obviously I haven't had the training like Jungle Jim Hunter (first season pro who has won both downhills this season) or some of the other guys who have come from the amateurs."

The World Pro Ski Racing format makes the slalom events exciting to watch. The spectators see pairs of racers challenge each other and know who won as soon as the competitors reach the finish line. The observer can feel the tension mount as the winning racer advances from round to round heading for the top spot of the day. The question that comes to mind is whether or not the crowd's psyche adds to a racer's.

Woodcock has mixed emotions. He went on: "I think maybe it does. Most of these guys, and that's part of being professional, are living from race to race and are trying to make enough money to pay the bills. You've just got to be able to perform your very best whether there are five thousand people or fifty on the hill cheering."

It would be naive to think that a ski racer turns pro not hoping to support himself from his gliding maneuvers. But for many of the guys on the tour, making ends meet is not always easy. Woodcock is one of the best, but for several years all of his expenses were paid out of his own pocket. Now, he skiis for Head, who, in addition to supplying his skiis, pays him a salary and bonuses for finishes. Last year, $14,927 of prize money was definitely clear profit; none of it had to go towards expenses.

Perhaps the most serious competition on the tour is behind the scenes where racers vie for sponsorships. Woodcock notes: "It's getting so competitive that contracts are very hard to come by. The thing is if you've got anything on the ball you can make yourself available to the company in more ways than just being a ski racer. We test

Havlicek And Namath Retire

By Mark Kevorkian

Odd as it may sound, I'm glad to hear John Havlicek has announced his retirement, effective at this season's end. For 17 years, Havlicek has worn the green of the Boston Celtics and has performed quietly, with consistency and courage. He does not now, nor ever did have a forty inch jump-reach, blazing speed or exceptional grace on the court. In today's game these qualities are almost necessary to success, but Havlicek has achieved his success through simpler, though more demanding techniques: stamina and brains. The 37-year-old Havlicek has played more games – over 1200 – than any other player in history. He is the only player to score 1,000 points in

"His body is made to go on forever."

--Jerry West

15 straight seasons, and is ranked third with over 25,000 points on the all-time scoring list behind Wilt Chamberlain (31,419) and Oscar Robertson (26,710).

Jerry West, coach of the LA Lakers, once said of Havlicek, "His body is made to go on forever." West, who starred for the Lakers for 14 seasons, was not entirely wrong. If the Boston Celtics this season bore even a trace of the Celtic teams of just a few years ago, it would not be too surprising to see Havlicek leading the fast break and the Celtics to the playoffs. Two years ago in the finals against Phoenix, and last year in the semi-finals against Philadelphia, Havlicek demonstrated the intensity and desire that was his – and the Celtics – trademark during the fabled Celtic dynasty.

But this year is entirely different. The Celtics are limping along with a 14-29 record and are not going to make the playoffs. Havlicek can't run the once dreaded Celtic fast break by himself and he can't make the team hustle and play defense. The basketball team from Boston has forgotten that they are Celtics and Havlicek, the player who epitomizes the phrase "Celtic Pride" has become a stranger to the team he led to seven NBA championships. This year the Celtics are not the "Celtics" and Havlicek is, alas, no longer "Havlicek."

So I'm glad to hear that you're retiring, John. I only wish you had done it a season earlier and spared yourself this terrible senior year.

Joe Namath, who also announced his retirement last week, could have retired four seasons ago without too much effect on his career or on how his name will read in the record book. Namath ran out of gas several miserable seasons ago with the hapless Jets and his trade to Los Angeles last year was like a trip to the old folk's home.

Although Namath's last few seasons have been less than successful, nobody showed more courage on the field than Broadway Joe. With a set of knees like his it's a minor miracle he could get out of bed in the morning let alone drop back and set up to pass. By playing on knees that more closely resemble frayed rubber bands on a team as bad as the Jets, I can't help but wonder what made Namath go. I don't expect it was booze, broads, and fast living.

There are many off-the-field exploits for which Namath is famous. Among others, he showed off his fu-manchu moustache and modeled panty hose – both on national television. But the off the field Namath moment I remember most is a poolside interview he gave before the 1969 Super Bowl. Sitting in a chaise lounge, sipping a drink, Namath was asked if he thought the upstart Jets stood any chance of beating the powerful Baltimore Colts. Without hesitating, Namath said "I guarantee you the Jets will win on Sunday." Sunday's score read: Jets 16, Colts 7.

So long, Joe. You did the game a service and it will never be the same.

Aquacats Baffled By UConn

Cathy Forsberg placed first in the 100 I-M swim and 2nd in both the 100 free style and 50 fly, but the University of Vermont Women's swim team was defeated 78-52 by the University of Conn Saturday.

In the 200 meter free relay the team of Mason, Doyle, Pardee and Hill combined for a time of 1:53.9, their best time this year. Kathleen Leahy of UVM took first in the 100 yard breast stroke, with a time of 1:22.0. Bonnie Dix took second in the 100 yard breast, with a 1:27.3 time.

In other events, Polly Doyle (100 Free), Liz Damon (50 back), Trish Valicenti (100 Fly) and Joannie LuKasiewicz (100 I-M) all bettered their previous times in their events.

In the Women's Diving events, Sarah Moore set two new varsity records, in both the one and three meter diving, with scores of 177.9 and 201.2 respectively. Also bettering the old record was Missy Dempf, with a score of 182.05. Vermont's record is now 4-5.

The facts of the matter.

With something as important as your future being discussed, it's very urgent that you get and understand all the facts. Air Force ROTC can be an important part of your future, and we'd like to take this opportunity to outline some of the main facts of that matter and invite you to look further into the subject.

The U.S. Air Force needs highly qualified dedicated officers. Both men and women, and we need people in all kinds of educational disciplines. Air Force ROTC offers 4-year, 3-year and 2-year scholarships with $100 monthly tax-free allowance, and contrary to what some people think, there is no military obligation during the first two years of the Air Force ROTC.

Upon college graduation you'll receive a commission in the U.S. Air Force and the opportunity to compete for a challenging job with advanced educational opportunities.

Let's get together and discuss Air Force ROTC further. We'll give you all the facts and clear up the fictions. It could be one of the most important talks you've ever had with anyone.

Doug Woodcock

skis for Head, I'm involved in summer camps. We do promotions and clinics. The guys that are making a living out of it treat it as such. They are out doing things for their sponsors all summer."

In further questioning about the pro circuit rules, Woodcock explained the elimination process of a Pro-Am challenge race. "We start with a field of eighty then they narrow it down to fifty and then down to thirty-two before the head to head competition starts. There are two rounds of eliminations before you get to head to head racing. And they're (the eliminations) getting pretty intense. In relation to five years ago, even two years ago, the caliber has become unbelievable. I'm skiing way better than I ever skiied and am just sort of holding my own. You've got to go like mad and bust your ass in the summer a little bit to try to place better and then a little bit more because you know everyone else is doing the same thing."

In an assessment of pro racing he has stated that: "To be a top pro takes hard work, luck, and a little bit of inspiration which in my case is the 'Grateful Dead.' (Woodcock is a confessed Dead Head from his Canadian National Team days.)"

In an assessment of the slalom at Stowe he said, "It's nice we've got some North Americans up there with the top guys. It's nice that we had a good final, that someone didn't crash, that it went all the way down to the finish. That's the way it should be."

Womens Gym Tumbles Ithaca

By Amanda Miller

The University of Vermont Women's Gymnastic team tumbled over both State University of New York and Ithaca, as they racked up a 107.40 score over Ithaca at 104.75 and Albany at 87.95 in the SUNY at Albany tri-meet this past Saturday.

Individual performances included Kim Chung's second place finish on the bars. In vaulting, Anne Berry took first, while Yami scored an eye-opening 8.4. Third place in vaulting was a tie between Kris Costello and Janet Lynch with a 8.15 score. On the balance beam, Kris Costello took third. Janet Lynch placed first in the floor exercises with an 8.25 score. In the all-around gymnast category, Kris Costello racked up a 27.95 score to take first, while Anne Berry and Lisa Duff took second and third, respectively.

Coach Holly Szabo commented "Despite a weak beginning in the uneven bars, we increased our performance with each event. In the vaulting, the amplitude and execution of our top three vaulters was the best this season. The Balance Beam team had a solid showing, helping lead us to a complete victory. As we moved to floor exercise, the confidence our gymnasts displayed throughout their routines was sufficient enough to send us home quite happy and eager to practice in preparation for Northeastern (away Tues.) and a home meet with UNH this Saturday."

Mens Gym Splits

By John Light

The University of Vermont Men's Gymnastics team opened its regular season this past week with a 171-152 loss to Lowell and defeating Connecticut College, 149-146. Being the Varsity Men's Gymnastics team's first year, these were the first two official NCAA meets ever for Vermont.

The split in the two meets gave coaches Tom Dunkley and Bill Hopkins both their first victory and defeat.

In the opener, Vermont faced Lowell last Wednesday. Lowell already has racked up a score of 192 (very high) this year and is ranked as the best team in New England. Even though Vermont was defeated, there were some encouraging signs. Hans Nilsson, a new member of the team this semester, by way of Sweden, captured the individual all-around honors with a score of forty-five points. Jon McDonald took third in the all around competition.

Vermont had better luck on Saturday with a 149-146 victory over Central Connecticut. Once again, Hans Hilsson won the all-around competition, with Jon McDonald placing third and Marc Ricard a few tenths behind in fourth.

The addition of Hans Nilsson, a junior olympic champion in Sweden, has greatly boosted the Cats. Unfortunately, this gain has been offset by the loss for the season of Steve Rancour, with torn knee ligaments. Still the team hopes to be competitive in upcoming meets. Vermont's next challenge is against Oneonta, at Patrick gym, on Saturday, February fourth at six p.m.

Cats Face Northeastern & Brown

By Jim Fletcher

After four losses last week, the UVM hockey team's playoff hopes fell as the Cats dropped from fifth place to twelfth in Division I. The Cats were 5-8 as of Saturday's loss to Boston U.

UVM needs at least an 11-12 record to make the playoffs. A record of 10-13 could tie the Cats for eighth with Dartmouth if Northeastern beats Providence and there are not any upsets the rest of the way, an unlikely possibility. The chances of making it with an 11-12 record are much better. A 12-11 record would probably be good enough.

Six teams appear to be certain of a playoff berth: BU, Clarkson, Cornell, Brown, BC and UNH. Three teams are serious contenders for the last two spots: Harvard, Dartmouth and Providence. Harvard has the easiest schedule of the three, but their games are much tougher than in past years and the Cantabs have injury problems. Providence is hot while Dartmouth has a hard schedule, playing Cornell and Brown twice each. Dartmouth visits the Friars in an important contest on Tuesday. Four other teams, Northeastern, RPI, UVM and Yale have outside chances of a playoff berth.

The Cats return to action Saturday afternoon with a game at Northeastern. In each of the past three seasons, either UVM or Northeastern has knocked the other out of the playoffs.

Three years ago, the Cats bombed the Huskies 7-1 at Gutterson. UVM then lost to Clarkson on the last day of the season, to knock NE out of eighth place. Two years ago, the Cats were pretty much out of the playoff race and NE desperately needed a victory. The Huskies took a 3-0 lead, but the Cats came from behind to win 4-3 in overtime with Andy Halford scoring the tying and winning goals. Last year, NE took revenge, seriously damaging UVM's playoff hopes by a 6-5 O.T. victory.

The strongest asset of the Huskies' game is their offense. NE has an average of 6.20 gpg, second in the league behind Cornell. The defense is tenth at 4.93 gpg. The offense standouts are Scott Gruhl who averages over two points per game, and freshman Doug Harvey.

A tough Brown team challenges UVM at Gutterson on Tuesday. Brown was severely hurt by graduation, but had a fine recruiting season this year to make up for it. They were 8-4 going into Wednesday's game with BU.

Top Brown forwards include juniors Dave Roberts (No. 8) and Jim Bennett (No. 9), and senior Skip Stovern (No. 15). The Bruins have the best defense in the league, giving up 3.17 gpg. Tim Bothwell (No. 24) and Mike Mastrullo (No. 2) are two of the best defensemen in Division I. Possibly the Bruins' greatest asset is having two of the finest goalies in New England. Junior Mike Laycock has a .908 save average and 2.87 goals against average in 9 games while sophomore Mark Holden has .905 and 3.00 in 6 games.

BEHIND THE ZAMBONI:

Randy Koch is now number three on the UVM all-time scoring list with 155 points going into last night's game. Koch passed Patty Wright ('73) with his goal in the Princeton game. Roger Mallette ('75) is in second with 160 points.

Andy Halford passed Fred Hunt ('73) with his goal in the same game to move into seventh place. He had 135 points before last night's game. Michel Lebeau ('77) is in sixth with 138 points.

Synchronized Swimming

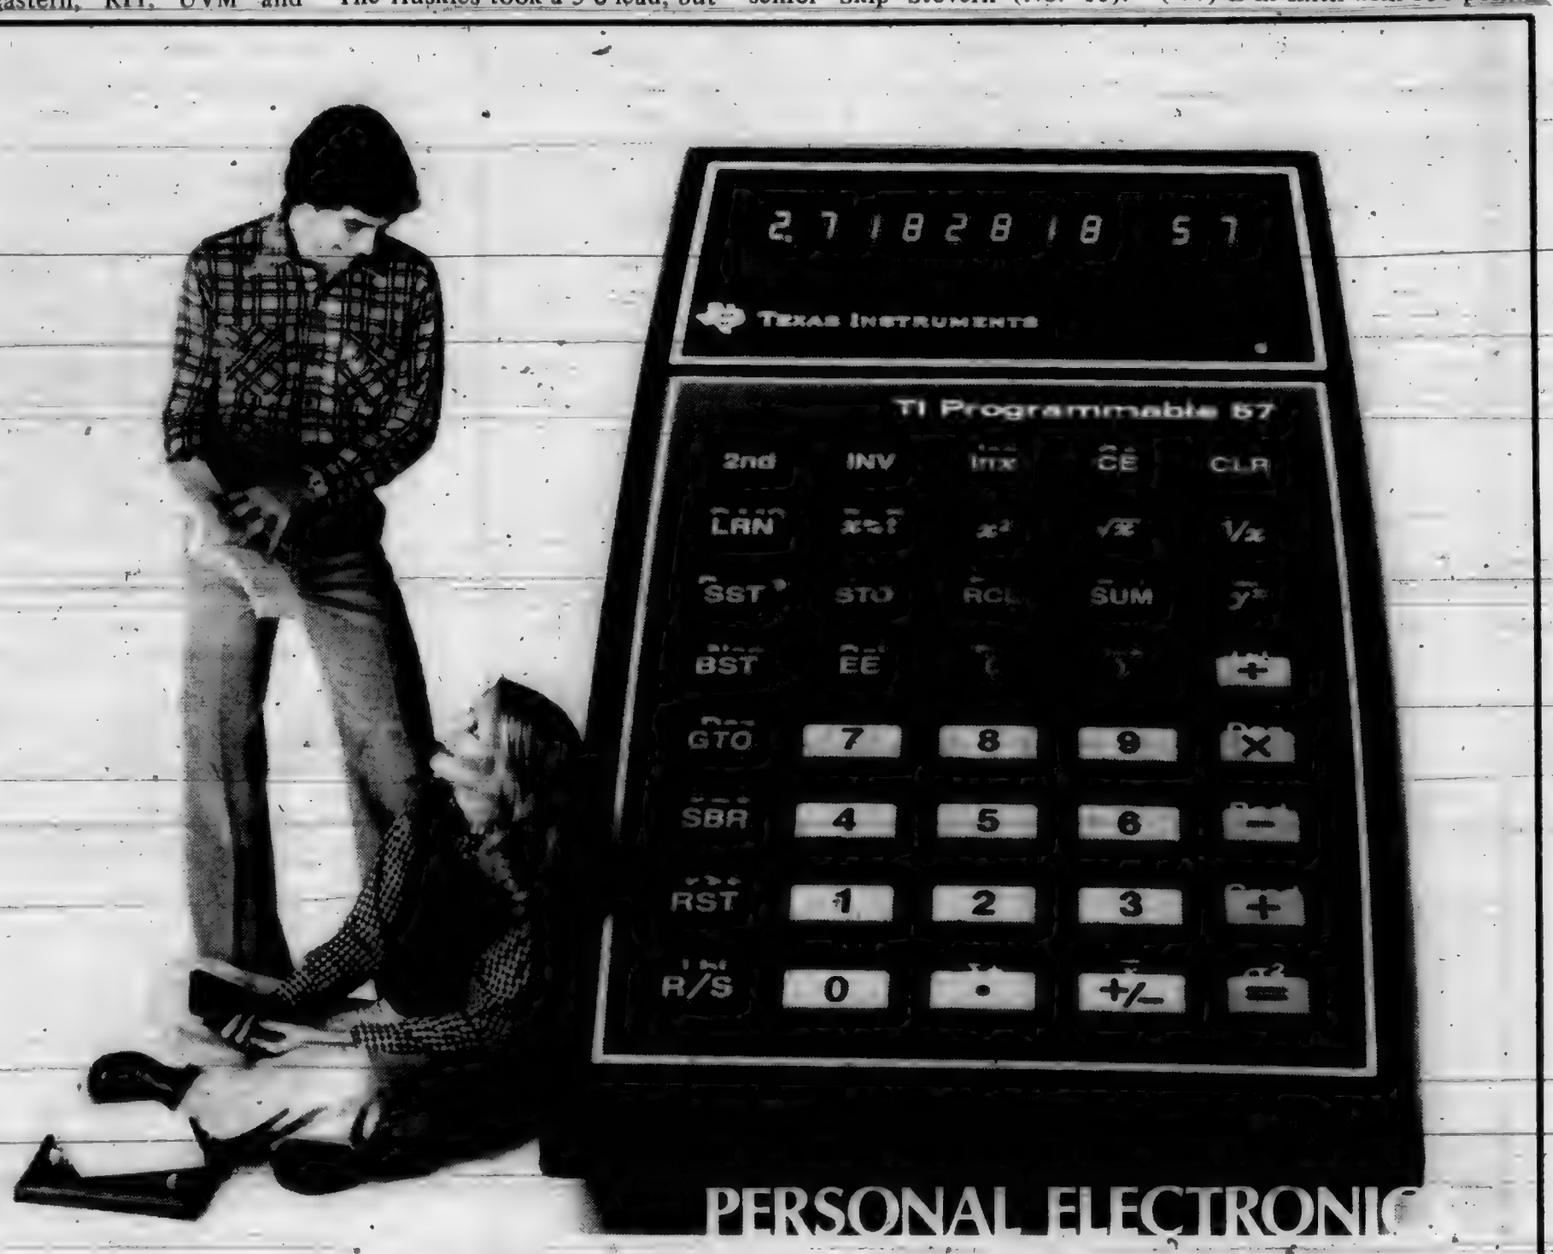
The Vermont Synchornized Swim Team hosted a regional conference for the National Institute of Creative Aquatics this weekend in cooperation with the Burlington YMCA. Swimmers from a number of states presented compositions and participated in conditioning and dance workshops, among other things offered.

Eleven compositions were presented with three swimmers receiving a "qualify 1" rating, enabling them to join national level competitors. Dianne Tulley, from New Jersey, presented "The Signs of Language," based on sign language used by the deaf.



Sunday morning, twenty-nine swimmers attempted to get ratings in the technique seminar. Sixteen were successful. Among them were two UVM students, Chris Dabrowski and Lynn Greiger. The competition included sculling, underwater swimming and figure combinations.

UVM has held fourth place in the East for the past few years, and the team is hoping to raise its standing during the 1978 season. Although hard work will be needed against their tough opponents, the swimmers are optimistic. "The first-year team-members have impressed me with their hard work and progress. Combined with our returning swimmers, we should be able to do quite well this season," Coach Maggi Hayes commented.

UVM has developed a friendly rivalry with the State University of New York at Geneva. They will be the team to beat as the season progresses.

Marathon Tennis

Townsend Gilbert, head pro at the Twin Oaks Tennis Center, will play 100 hours of non-stop tennis in an attempt to break the present world Record of 89 hours. The marathon will take place between Jan. 31st at 3 p.m. and will wind up Saturday, Feb. 4th at 7 p.m. at Twin Oaks. Among the dignitaries Gilbert will play include University of Vermont President Lattie Coor, who will take to the courts between 7 and 8 a.m. on Friday, and Gov. Snelling, who will play the last 2 hours. Proceeds of the pledge drive will go to the March of Dimes. Immediately after Gilbert completes his feat (Saturday at 7 p.m.) Twin Oaks will hold a charity auction.

The TI-57. The super slide-rule that'll get you into programming... fast and easy.

Even if you've never programmed before.

For the student who requires slide-rule functions, the TI-57 delivers an exceptional combination of advanced mathematical and statistical capabilities. From functions such as trig, logs, powers, roots and reciprocals...to mean, variance, standard deviation and much more.

And as long as you're in the market for a super slide-rule calculator, why not buy one that can also put the power, speed and convenience of programming at your disposal?

Programming a calculator simply means giving it a logical set of instructions for accomplishing what you want it to do. Programming enables you to solve lengthy and repetitive problems quickly by substituting new variables into the set of instructions which you have already entered into the machine.

The end result is more efficient use of your time in problem-solving.

All this and more is explained in our unique, illustrated, easy-to-follow guidebook, "Making Tracks Into Programming." This 200-page book comes with the TI-57. It contains simple, step-by-step instructions and examples to help you quickly learn to use programming functions to make your problem-solving faster, more accurate and fun.

Camus' "State of Siege" Not To Be Missed

By P. Relick

Maybe Westmoreland should have demonstrated outside of UVM's Royall Tyler Theatre on Tuesday night. Because inside that building the magic of Camus as interpreted by the University Players ripped down and discredited almost everything Westmoreland stood for during his years in Washington. Government.

The setting of the play is the sleepy Spanish town of Cadiz where the people live in resigned gloom. Their leaders oblivious to their cries of sorrow and pain, rest contemptuously in their walled mansion. Then the Plague arrives, and everything is changed. Or is it?

Director Thomas R. Dibble has made the American premiere of State of Siege a true event, and he has brought to life a production with social implications which one can't help but parallel with some of the turns which our government has taken in recent years.

From the moment one walked into the theatre, they knew the production was to be something special. The set had a split-level configuration, with buildings represented both stage left and right. A backdrop of the heavens with the ocean below made the sea-side town complete. In stark simplicity Cadiz came alive.

The tension supplied by the music kept the audience in suspense; never was there a moment when the next move was known.

Possibly the forte of this production was the little things which happened very subtly and were only noticed by a small portion of the crowd at a time. For instance, the guards mime as they opened and closed the gates of the besieged city, letting no inhabitants escape, and allowing no fresh air to sweep its way through to clear the Plague.

Members of the government wore masks, as did the townspeople once when they were infected with the disease. These masks gave the audience a good image of the character before he even spoke his first line, and then the voice of the actor would reinforce the personality. The masks were the brainchild of the director, and if you can't think of a good reason to go and see this production, I'll give you one – the masks.

The governor and his assistant wore humorous masks which seem to poke fun at the characters and the positions they hold. The Plague and his secretary sport masks which are foreboding and evil, while the infected townsfolk wore mute white masks which cut them off from the joys of living. Finally, the henchmen of the Plague's masks represent soldiers of different nationalities and eras illustrating the universality of the government's problem.

Kip Kinnard as "Nada" in State of Siege.

And then, there are the actors. They interpreted their parts. They felt the moods. They were superb. Special recognition must be given to Nada (Kip Kinnard), the enlightened drunk, and the Plague (Craig Murray) who injected the audience with a feeling of frenzy with the strength of his portrayal and the power of his voice. The other main characters were equally comfortable with their roles, and they were ably backed up by a fine chorus.

If any minuses must be given to this production, they are few and far between. Apart from a few opening night dialog mistakes, the play flowed smoothly.

One had the feeling that he was in a three-ring circus, and all of the acts were equally good. At the same time you could watch the guards, the chorus, or the main characters and see many different aspects of the same moment.

For some this play may seem a bit different than the normal stage production, but don't be scared away by this thought. The unique experience presented by this play SHOULD NOT be missed, it is both hard and compulsive while being soft and emotional.

Don't miss State of Siege. If not for the script, then for the actors and actresses, if not for them, then for the masks and set. State of Siege is at the Royall Tyler Theatre this Friday Feb. 3 and Saturday Feb. 4 at 8 p.m.

The Fleming Museum Shivers At Night

By Vaune Davis

Originally built to accommodate UVM's growing collection, the Fleming Museum is now "stuck between the horns of a dilemma." Unless a sum of more than one million dollars can be raised for the proper climate control, storage facilities and other renovations necessary for the preservation of the works, many of the museum's permanent collections, some over 100 years old, cannot be renovated and reinstalled.

"What we have been doing, and we started it a long time ago, is trying to reestablish some of our permanent collections," said William Lipke, new director of the museum. The ancient peoples exhibit was reinstalled and opened up in November. By this Spring, the American gallery in the west wing should be a permanent installation.

Nevertheless, Lipke stressed the pointlessness of renovating many of the collections until the necessary facilities for their care are installed. "In a climate such as Vermont where you get such incredible extremes," said Director Lipke, "if you don't have constant temperature and humidity, furniture can crack, paint can chip and flake, and canvases can swell and bubble. If this goes on for a long period of time, the paintings, some which in the permanent collection date back to the eighteenth century, can be severely damaged."

Four years ago, Nina Parris, the curator, and Richard Jansen, the former direotor, received a planning grant from one of the national endowments to study the problem. And without any alterations that a visitor would be able to see, a consulting firm came up with a project, consisting of climate control, rewiring, heating and storage, that would cost approximately $600,000.

At that time, new federal regulations on buildings and renovations said that a certain percentage of the money had to go to making the building fit new, updated codes including double access on the second floor and improved facilities for the handicapped. "It shows you the bureaucracy that, as we become increasingly safety conscious, we have to deal with," said Lipke. By this time, the project had assumed a cost of well over a million dollars. "And none of that money," Lipke added, "was to go to the actual care of the works of art."

Looking for the funds for the project, the museum staff is unable to proceed with their plans to reinstall some of the works. "We are stuck between the horns of a dilemma," Director Lipke said, "and that is that a lot of the work needs very serious attention, but it's foolish to have that done if the works are going to be brought back to a climate which was initially the cause for its deterioration."

Lipke does not think the funds will come for quite some time. "Part of the problem we face now," he said, "is that we are strictly a university museum, although the building faces Colchester Avenue and we serve the community also." And because the Fleming is a university museum, it unfortunately must rely on scant university finances. Lipke said, "The difficulty is that, while the administration is very sympathetic to our situation, they are also trying to find additional funds for the library, the girl's gymnasium and what passes for a student union. Obviously, the library will take priority over the museum."

Lipke pointed out the fact that private funding services are also the sources for the library. "It's hard to raise that much money on a campus of this size with an alumni of this size because then we are competing with the library." Technically, the Fleming is part of the College of Arts and Sciences, the main financial resource of the museum funds. Other sources, such as memberships and occasional larger gifts by donors and benefactors, usually go towards updating the collections.

The Fleming Museum is a unique resource for a university of this size and, presently staff members are working in conjunction with UVM faculty and the Third World Seminars program to present a more complete learning experience. "The fact that we are part of an academic community makes us different than what is associated with a fine arts museum," said Director Lipke. "Artifacts, whether they are works of art, doorhandles from African villages, or everyday

Arteberry's Antics Excell

By Alexandra Eschenbrenner

With spirit and agility, grace and enthusiasm, Trent Arteberry brought the speechless art of pantomime to a capacity crowd at the Ira Allen Chapel on Monday.

Having at one time toured with Pousette-Dart Band, Arteberry, however, because of political conflicts now works more on his own and performed in Burlington as a part of his tour throughout the Northeast. As warm and smiling in person as on stage, Arteberry's warmth extended and contributed to his fascinating original choreography. During the hour long show which included approximately twelve separate acts, Arteberry proved the art of mime is undying.

Introduced poetically by a voice through the loudspeakers, Arteberry appeared on stage made up as a harlequin dressed in a red lined black satin cape. Exhibiting his talents as a contortionist, his agility was evident in the first scene as his body parts appeared to move without any restraints, almost as if they were attached with pivoting hinges. After removing his cape, Arteberry reappeared for his second scene as a desperado complete with the light-hearted humor that was characteristic of the entire show. For his third scene, Trent portrayed a dog constantly thwarted by his master's leash. At this point, the entire chapel became a stage as Arteberry brought his show out into the audience. This was warmly received and further characterized the extent of Trent's sincere enthusiasm.

The comic tragedy of the unexperienced babysitter was portrayed in the next scene entitled "Daddy Babysits." Here, Trent had his audience laughing throughout as he depicted such common chores as changing diapers and feeding the baby in a cleverly comic manner.

As each new scene unfolded better than the previous one, new facets of Arteberry's talents were revealed. In the scene "Man and Horse," Trent was really put to a test which he passed with style. In this difficult scene, Trent switched between two players, first the rearing horse, and then the determined rider. This, carried out with skill and ease, led one to believe that there were two distinct figures on stage. Not only was his physical skill proven here but also his ability to mix serious drama with comedy.

In spite of faulty lighting, his next scene, which consisted of humorous interpretations of insects, complete with a kazoo for the mosquito and a cocaine snorting bumble-bee, put the audience in hysterics. A slightly morbid but humorous act followed as Arteberry dug through apples in search of worms to eat. Here too the crowd shared his enthusiasm as Arteberry threw in some on the spot gestures to comply with audience interjections. Continuing his comic act, Trent moved on to caressing a string bass in a somewhat subtly perverse fashion while illustrating the joys of love. After this, much of the comic element was removed as Arteberry effectively portrayed his interpretation of war.

Returning again to the light-hearted, Arteberry brought life and character to inanimate objects such as a teapot, toast and a fried egg. Following this was his interpretation of a person smoking a joint which definitely received support and cheer from the primarily collegiate audience as Arteberry passed around his imaginary reefer.

The finale was beyond doubt the climax of the entire show. Illustrating the myth of Icarus, Trent mounted a podium and with the poise and agility of a ballet dancer, truly appeared to be soaring through the air.

After this, the crowd rose for a well-earned standing ovation while Arteberry, modestly accepting the praise, mimed his way off stage.

Buddy and Junior Wail On Main St.

By Shana Schwartzberg

For those who are fans of the old Chicago Blues, Hunt's was the place to be last Sunday night where Buddy Guy and Jr. Wells played to a warm crowd.

Before either Buddy Guy or Junior Wells appeared, the band played a few songs to whet the appetite of an already voracious crowd. After a few opening numbers Junior Wells sauntered on stage and wished all an inebriated good evening. He then proceeded to wail away in a style that has become the trademark of Midwestern American Blues.

While Junior was doing pretty well at holding himself together musically, he seemed to experience a slight difficulty in communicating a few basic ideas with the band (such as key changes). However, these discrepancies were fairly subtle and were picked up by only a few. The basic problem seemed to stem from the fact that Junior had a pretty good buzz on. On the other hand, so did most of the crowd.

Finally Buddy Guy was summoned to the stage. Decked out in a plaid suit, he appeared alive and vibrant. It took a while for his masterful guitar playing to become visible (and audible) but it certainly did happen. He played with assurance throughout, moving from the slow, melodic true-blues into funky, rhythmic music. At one point Junior proclaimed "We're going to get so funky you can smell it!" Well, I don't know how my olfactory glands felt about the whole performance, but my ears and eyes certainly were pleased. It always adds to the show when the performers seem to be enjoying themselves on stage, which was certainly the case. The bass player had fun by occasionally plucking the strings with his teeth as he kept a steady beat.

At one point Junior exclaimed, "We're going to get so funky you can smell it!"

Despite the fact that blues is frequently regarded as simple music (and even dull by some) technical competence was at such a high level that boredom was an impossibility.

The band appeared to grow even stronger and tighter as the show drew to a close. The climax, born of Buddy Guy's hot guitar playing was followed by each musician leaving the stage, one by one. Finally just the drummer was left, doing his best at keeping a beat while he let the crowd down easily. Then he got up, walked to a front table and started drumming on the table, progressing on to the ash tray for the final fade-out. Naturally, they were called back for more, as they deserved to be.

I spent some time talking with Buddy Guy between shows. Although he's been living and working in Chicago for quite some time now, he'll be returning to his original home in Baton Rouge, Louisiana for a few months. He and Junior have been playing and touring together since 1969. Even though he owns a club in Chicago, has put out several albums, and has spent a lot of time touring, Guy still says, "Money doesn't make you, you make money."

He teaches guitar at the University of Chicago. I asked about future album plans and he said they'd be working on something in about six weeks. It will probably come out in late spring or early summer.

To sum it all up, the performance was definitely up to par, maybe even slightly above par, but I know they are capable of better.

Winterfest '78!

By Eric Silverman

UVM's third annual winterfest will move into full swing this Friday and, according to the Winterfest '78 Committee, it will be "much bigger and much more organized" than in the previous two years.

Close to a thousand broomball players have already begun to enjoy this year's festivities at Centennial Field. Previously held in front of the shoe boxes, Broomball is greatly improved over last year with better referees, bigger courts, stadium lights double elimination and fewer injuries. The eighty-six teams involved are all striving for the finals which, on Sunday, February 5, will close the Winterfest activities. Women's finals will start at 11:00 a.m. and men's finals will start at 12:00. President Lattie Coor should be there to commence the games by throwing out the broomball.

Friday's activities start with the judging of ice sculptures. Worked on all week by residence halls, fraternities and sororities, the ice sculptures will be judged by the Winterfest Committee. Prizes will be presented by President Coor that evening at the Winterfest Ball.

Once again, a free movie orgy will be shown at Ira Allen Chapel at 7:00 p.m. on Friday. Described as a "fractured filmic frenzy," this year's Movie Orgy should be even better than the one shown last year.

To end Friday's events, a Masquerade Ball will be held at the Radisson Hotel starting at 9:00 p.m. The theme for the ball will be "Alice in Wonderland" and students should dress accordingly. How about going as a drugged-out Cheshire cat? Hors d'oeuvres will be served, door prizes and prizes for the best costumes will be awarded, and music will be provided by the High Rollers. Tickets are $3.50 for one and $6.50 for a couple and are on sale at Billings this week from 11:00 to 1:00 or at any dining hall except Harris-Millis and Wright.

On Saturday, the Outing Club will sponsor the Cross Campus Cruise, a five kilometer cross-country ski race. The starting time will be 10:00 a.m. behind the Gutterson Field House. The course will go around the golf course, behind the Newman Center, down Redstone Path, through the tunnel, and will finish in front of Billings. If you would like to be in your first cross-country ski race, show off your style or just have the opportunity to ski through the tunnel, sign up at the Outing Club by February 3. The entry fee is $1.00.

On Saturday night, S.A. Speakers will present Burt and I, featuring Marshall Dodge. Admission is free and it will be held at 8 p.m. at Ira Allen Chapel.

Winterfest should be a lot of fun this year and special thanks should be given to the Special Affairs Committee, the Student Activities office, Robert Wiler of Student Activities and everyone else who is making this opportunity possible.

Controversial Film "Hearts and Minds" Tuesday

The UVM Third World Series will present the award winning documentary film on U.S. involvement in Vietnam Hearts and Minds, on Tuesday, February 7. The showing will be at 7:30 p.m., Room B-106 Angell. Lecture. Admission is free.

In the movie director Peter Davis (who also directed CBS–TV's The Selling of the Pentagon) attempts to portray the causes and the consequences of the American intervention. "I wasn't puzzled why three million Americans turned against the war..." explains Davis — "I was puzzled why 197 million Americans didn't turn against the war."

The movie relies largely upon newsreel footage and interviews conducted by Davis himself, in its attempt to illustrate the national mentality of the Vietnam era. Among some of the more thought-provoking scenes are clips from old World War II movies depicting Orientals as racially inferior that is still subject to a great deal of emotion in this country.

savages and a look at a particularly violent college football training session. The film's interviews and speech excerpts include a wide variety of personalities who affected and were affected by the war: President Johnson, Walt Rostow, William Westmoreland, a crippled soldier, a Vietnamese coffin-maker, and many others.

Although Davis is an American, Hearts and Minds first appeared in Europe. The film was lauded internationally but was almost never shown in the U.S. because Columbia Pictures feared lawsuits from former war policy leaders, such as Rostow. In the end, however, the film was allowed to come home, to be released just before the final capitulation for the South Vietnamese government to the Communists, in 1975.

Following General Westmoreland's highly celebrated visit to the UVM campus by exactly one week, Hearts and Minds should offer an extremely controversial, thought stimulating counterviewpoint on an issue

An Evening of Incredibleness

On Friday, February 3, 1978, the Activities Committee of the Living/Learning Center and the Living Arts Series, assisted by the Vermont Council on the Arts, will present an "Evening of Incredibleness" at 8 p.m. in the Fireplace Lounge, Living/Learning Center, University of Vermont.

David Moss will offer Drum Song. Moss uses an amazing array of percussion instruments plus voice to create a fusion of a vast spectrum of percussion sounds with the wide range of vocal textures in performance. What evolves is a network of sound-stations, which are both exciting and unusual.

George Sherwood elevates the act of juggling from the often routine rhythmic tossing of small objects to an art which is spell-binding, not only because of Sherwood's professionalism, but also because of the variety of his repetoire. Sherwood will sign people up for a series of workshops in juggling during the evening on a first-come, first-served basis.

Sandy Lewis, mime, will perform and will also involve the audience in her creative interpretations of literature and of life. Members of the audience will be delighted by the performance while at the same time realizing their own potentials in mime and in dance.

Picker Parkening Performs Monday

The Lane Series presents Christopher Parkening, who first commanded national attention when still in his teens, now ranks as America's leading virtuoso of the classical guitar. Andres Segovia, the master guitarist of the century, has declared, "Christopher Parkening is a great artist – one of the most brilliant guitarists in the world." The reasons for this enthusiastic enclosement will be very much in evidence on Monday February 6th at 8:00 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium.

A California native, Parkening took up the guitar at age eleven, and after the first year of study gave his first recital. His program of Bach and Scarlatti prompted a critic to exclaim, "Although only twelve, he has a musical instrument and a self-assurance seldom attained by most adult musicians."

By the time he was fifteen, Parkening was appearing with the Los Angelos Philharmonic Orchestra, the Pasedena Symphony Orchestra and numerous other orchestras. He was then accepted as a scholarship student by Andres Segovia in a master class at the University of California at Berkeley. Parkening was chosen from three hundred students to perform daily, and later was selected as soloist when the master class was telecast nationally.

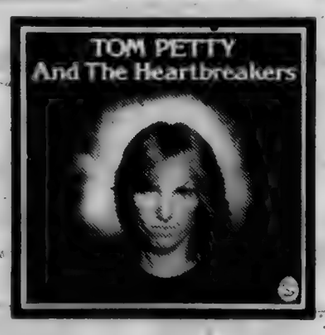
In January 1966, Parkening gave the world premiere of the Second Concerto in C for guitar and orchestra by Mario Oostelnuovo-Tedeseo, which won him wide acclaim.

In July 1968, Parkening was named one of the outstanding young artists of the year by the High Fidelity Magazine. He then signed with Columbia Artists Management for his first concert tour of the United States and Canada.

Of late, his concert engagements have taken him to Japan and Spain. Parkening has also been soloist with the New York Philharmonic, Minnesota Orchestra, Milwaukee Symphony and the Boston Pops. He has also performed several times in Alice Tully Hall at Lincoln Center.

This season, Parkening is touring primarily on campuses of many universities and colleges in the United States. He is so popular with students that he has had many re-engagements with most of the outstanding universities.

Christopher Parkening is the author of "The Christopher Parkening guitar method, Volume I," devoted to basic techniques of guitar playing. The book presents the artist's personal approach after his years of study, playing and teaching, and it has already been adopted by conservatories and schools of music across the country.



Monday, February 6, 1978 at 8:00 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium. For further information and ticket reservations, call the Lane Series office (802) 656-3418 or write The Lane Series, 234 Waterman Building, University of Vermont, Burlington, Vermont 05401.

Emerson, Lake & Palmer

"ELP's ensemble is one that could put George Lucas and the technical designers behind Star Wars to shame"

By Randy McMullen

Emerson Lake and Palmer (ELP) along with about fifty road crew lackeys will lug their act into Plattsburg State College, on Wednesday, February 8th, at 8:00 p.m.

While it cannot speculate as to what new kinds of special effects they will bring with them, it can most likely be assured that no one in the audience will fall asleep. At the very least, it would be far too noisy.

Ever since their first official concert — which commenced with the firing of a row of cannons — ELP has been noted for performances that leave your senses stinging. Keith Emerson has used a rotating, elevated piano, and a synthesizer that walks and explodes. Carl Palmer has been seen on a revolving stand that highlights his hand-engraved drum set, his church bell, and a host of other percussion instruments. Greg Lake, the conservative member of the band, has remained content to stand peacefully upon his $6,000 oriental rug that effectively complements his collection of some twelve different types of guitars.

When organized into a coherent entity, ELP's ensemble is one that could put George Lucas and the technical designers behind Star Wars to shame. R2-D2 may be cute, but can he sizzle, explode, and whistle a piano concerto?

When the smoke clears up, and the fireballs fade, however, there is still a chance that you will hear some fairly good music. Emerson, Greg Lake, and Carl Palmer have different musical roots and preferences, which in the mosaic gives the group a wide range of possibilities. Palmer, the straight forward, hit-ya-hard percussionist, is the hard rock side of ELP. His presence can be felt in tunes like "Jeremy Bender," and the newly released "Tiger in a Spotlight." Greg Lake, a stunning vocalist and romantic lyricist, has a preference for folk ballads. He has composed many of ELP's most popular tunes, such as "Lucky Man," "From the Beginning," and the current single, "C'est La Vie." Emerson's keyboard work has largely classical origins. In fact, he has been criticized often for restructering classical works and failing to rely on his own creativity. Emerson shrugs off these claims, however, and has impressed many with his renditions of "Pictures at an Exhibition," and "Toccata," a piece from Alberto Ginastera's first piano concerto. Emerson also has a jazzy side to him, which is apparent in the second movement of "Karn Evil 9," and his new version of Scott Joplin's "Maple Leaf Rag." Together, Emerson Lake and Palmer's musical blend has been roughly labeled as "art-rock." The New York Times has referred to it as "...progressive rock with a lot of regard for the past."

But labels and laser lights aside, ELP is a band that is probably worth seeing. They have six gold lp's to their credit, and Emerson's list of keyboard awards is as inexhaustable as his energy. It should be warned, however, that there is a thin line between an entertaining rock concert, and a brash explosion of galactic gobbldegook. Next Wednesday's performance will probably be a little of both.

Is the Devil a Woman?

The second film of the Lane Series Dietrich Series, The Devil Is A Woman, will be shown on Saturday, February 11 at 7:00 and 9:00 P.M. in the Marsh Life Sciences Building.

This 1935 film was the last on which Marlene Dietrich and director, Josef Von Steinberg collaborated. Forseeing that this would be his last work with Dietrich, Von Steinberg threw caution to the winds and created his most extreme exercise in style. The result has been hailed by many critics as the most beautiful film ever made, and its intense pictorial beauty is overwhelming. The story, based on the novel, Woman and Puppet by Pierre Louys, tells of femme fatale and the men who destroy themselves for her in nineteenth century Spain. It co-stars Lionel Atwill, Cesar Romero, and Edward Everett Horton.

Josef Von Steinberg is the foremost visual stylist of all the American cinema. He is the man who discovered Dietrich and then fashioned worlds for her to conquer. He is also the master of cinematography, whose richly textured, luminous images transform mundane reality into a feast for the senses.

The four films remaining in the Dietrich Series will be directed by Von Steinberg. They are Dishonored, on February 25, Blonde Venus, on March 11, Morocco on March 18, and Shanghai Express on April 8.

A scene from "The Devil Is A Woman," starring Marlene Dietrich.

The Devil Is A Woman will be shown in the Marsh Life Sciences Building on Saturday, February 11 at 7:00 and 9:00

Award-Winning Films Presented By Director William Greaves

By Suzanne Karkus

Duke Ellington, Langston Hughes, Cab Calloway and Bessie Smith came alive again at UVM Monday night when award-winning filmmaker William Greaves spoke for the Harlem Renaissance section of the Vermont Seminars.

Greaves, who has achieved distinction as actor, director, screenwriter and television producer, presented two films dealing with Afro-American heritage which he both wrote and directed.

The first film shown, From These Roots, documented a period in American history known as The Harlem Renaissance. It highlighted some of the major black figures living in Harlem in the 1920's, and portrayed the mood of the times, moving from the smiling face of Bill Robinson to the death masks worn by Ku Klux Klan lynching mobs.

Filmed entirely from actual period photographs, Greaves said his first problem was locating enough visual material from the 20's to make the film and next, "how to make a movie out of static images."

"The night before the big screenings for our sponsors," he said, "we looked at the film and said, 'This is not working!' So we tore the whole thing apart, and then went into a state of shock. After 36 hours of pushing and pulling and juxtaposing the different segments, I hastily wrote the commentary in two and a half hours."

After polishing, the resulting documentary went on to receive 23 international awards, and earned for Greaves the Best Director award of the Jamaican Film Festival.

The second film Greaves presented was shot in West Africa at the First World Festival of Negro Arts in 1966. It depicted actual footage of the festival, including dance performances by numerous African tribes, a piece by the Alvin Ailey Dance Troupe, music by Duke Ellington, and poetry by Langston Hughes.

More than a lesson in Afro-American history, these films collectively recorded the enormous black contribution to the world of art, and served as a reminder of the proud and rich heritage of the black people.

On Feb 6, the Harlem Renaissance Symposium will feature James Loewen

Here is a good gut argument for you. One that tears through your soul all the way down to your toenails. The very mention of which causes all number of otherwise sane people to see red, to start breathing fire and to generally turn into a bug eyed monster.

SF vs. Academe.

Well, they've been going round on that one for a couple of years now, ever since SF went respectable, and a considerable amount of waste heat has been produced thereby. One one side you have academics insisting that SF should be judged by the standards of literary criticism (Lit. Crit.) and on the other side you have ranting English professors screaming "put SF back in the gutter where it belongs!"

To anyone who reads this column every week my position should be obvious. It is my opinion that literary criticism butters no parsnips. I used to think that it was harmless, like masturbation, but I don't anymore. I've seen too many people who can really write seduced into producing enduring masterpieces instead of good stories, conned into writing to please the LitCrit squad because their egoboo sounds the most authoritative (it is, I will grant, the only real assurance that people will be forced to read your works long after anyone's interested in them).

And so I tend to view with alarm rather than point with pride when the literary establishment moves in on SF. Many a great restaurant has been destroyed by being "discovered," and come to think of it, the Indians must feel much the same about North America.

And sure enough, here come the missionaries to tell me that my gods are inferior. George Edgar Slusser, author of Robert A. Heinlein, Stranger in His Own Land (Newcastle/Borgo Press, 60 pp., $1.95) spends fifty-six pages proving that Heinlein can't write his way out of a paper bag, and then spends three full pages listing Heinlein's book publications alone (if he had added magazine sales, I calculate he'd have needed five more pages, and anthologies would have added another ten easily). The irony of this situation seems to escape him.

As near as I can tell from his opening argument, Slusser is offended because you couldn't graph out a line of a Heinlein plot and come out with regular curves and repeating patterns. The hairy old barbarian bestseller violates the precious Dramatic Unities — Tsk, Tsk. From there Slusser uses all the classic tools of literary criticism as hatchetwork (quotation out of context, non sequitur, post hoc ergo propter hoc reasoning, outright distortion and plain stupidity) to show that Heinlein is an immature, irresponsible, morally bankrupt bungler who shouldn't be allowed to run loose in a sane world.

Well.

I find this pamphlet as significant as an urchin defacing the base of the Taj Mahal, and if you want to pay as much to read it as it would cost you to score a copy of the paperback edition of Stranger In a Strange Land (or Space Cadet or Rocketship Galileo or...) you go right ahead. The biggest thing about this book, the part that bothered me most, is that I'm not at all sure that Slusser knew better. But he still wins my award for pointless hostility!

RECENT CUTS

The Pied Piper of '78

By Dan Adams

Reviewing a new Jackson Browne album is somewhat of a fruitless venture. To those caught up in this songwriter's cult, additional exposure to him – of any quality – is a guaranteed high. To the rest, whose view of Jackson Browne's work is no doubt more rational and less emotional, Running on Empty will take its place along side the numerous other simple California folk/rock albums which have hit the market in the last decade.

If Running on Empty tells us anything about Jackson, it is that he has learned how to sell an album. His trick (other than releasing the record just before Christmas as an ideal stocking-stuffer) is to write concretely about intangibles, appealing to our inner emotions and most significant of experiences.

In his fifth album, his first recorded live, the issues are the well-worn inquiries into love (absence of and distance from), the plight of the minimum wage-earning laborers (in this case his faithful roadies to which he attributes dogged loyalty and difficult hardships), and, significantly, life on the road.

Also fairly basic are the instrumental backings, largely fundamental chord progressions filled in with L.A. rhythm by The Section and colored with melodic meanderings and howling leads by Irishman Lindley. Yet this musical backing – standard Jackson Browne, Eagles, America, CSN&Y style – has working for it a general tendency of most folk/rock critics to overlook instrumental shortcomings while concentrating on the more critical lyrical symbolism. Thus we view Lindley as premier in the folk/rock crowd on fiddle and lap steel guitar as opposed to quite average among musicians of string quartet, orchestra, and symphony fame.

Such is the ruling of the American consumer. No loss. Jackson responds, displaying his wisdom in the selection of his theme. By writing of the simple, frantic, drugged blur of endless concerts, hotels, and dotted white lines, he appeals to the romance of the life on the road which we may occasionally venture into yet mostly fantasize about from our upper-middle class security. It is the simple life which to many seems so attractive from afar, yet which can lose some of its color in experience.

Only Jackson could pull it off. Throughout the album's ten songs, he agonizes over the weary boredom, repetition, loneliness and uncertainty of roadwork, only to come away sounding like an ecstatic, self-actualized troubadour. We ignore his rather sad and pessimistic statement about life like a lover ignores a point blank rejection from his partner, caught up in a romantic fantasy we can't let go. (I'm hitching to Boston next free weekend.) And we tell our buddies to buy the album.

Rather than comparing Running on Empty with earlier recordings, it may be best simply to view it as a statement of where Browne is today – musically, technically, and in search of that ultimate high. Excellent mixing and the realism and energy of a live recording speak to the first two of these. Jackson's sorrowed voice is as appropriate as ever, and blends well in timely intervals of vocal harmony.

As to Jackson's search, life seems to be as hectic, confused, and apolitical as ever. To say that the album title says it all may be trite, but Jackson hints of apathy seem to focus on the here and now – the highways and dancehalls, the bottles of wine and broken white lines, the pain of roadwork and the ever-present cocaine. In today's self-centered crowd, the album should sell well.

Almost...But Not Quite

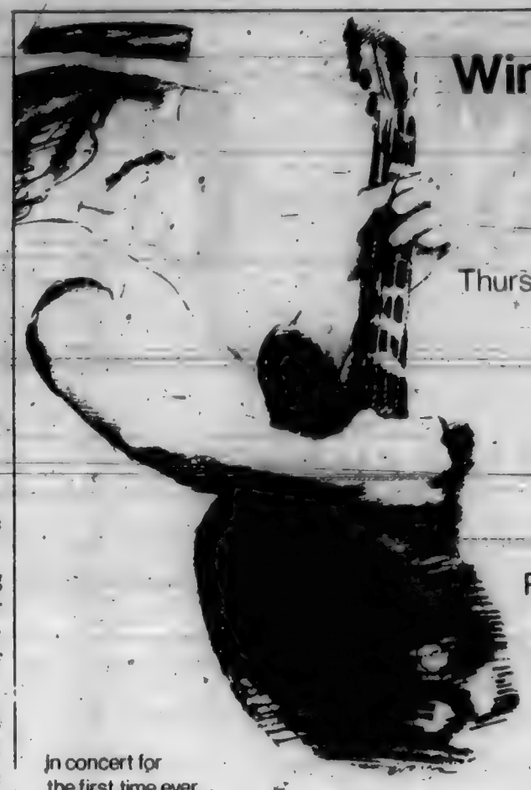
By Tom Nuccio

Eric Gale, once a long lost studio guitarist for Creed Taylor Records, has finally come into his own. Within the span of two years he has been elevated from a sojourning studio musician to an exciting solo artist. His music, a crossover between rock and jazz, is masterfully presented on his third solo album Multiplication.

Gale was once merely pickup guitarist. He played on everyone else's albums but never cut one of his own. His first solo attempt in 1974 failed to impress critics. After this discouraging failure, Gale again returned to the studio scene and anonymity. At times he was struggling to survive. Soon the tide changed, however.



In early 1976, Gale and studio drummer Steve Gadd organized a six piece band, later to be known as Stuff, which became the turning point in Eric Gale's career. Stuff's first release in 1976 was a smashing success. This jazz-rock combo gave Eric Gale the commercial recognition he needed.

Soon recognized as one of the premier talents in modern guitar, Gale cut his second solo album, Ginseng Woman which was one of the top-selling jazz albums in 1977. The clever arrangements of Bob James and the style of Gale yielded substantial success.

The same combination makes Multiplication a top-rate album. This 1977 Columbia release features Eric Gale soloing in excellent tonal balance with the orchestra behind him. The string and horn arrangements of keyboardist Bob James set an impressive background for Gale's resounding Gibson guitar. Talented rhythm sidemen and featured soloists Alphonso Johnson (electric bass), Steve Gadd (drums), Richard Tee (keyboards), Hank Crawford (alto sax) and Grover Washington Jr. (tenor sax), are also highlights.

On Multiplication, Gale exhibits more technical ability than on both his last solo effort and his work with Stuff. Two fast-tempoed side one cuts, "Thumper" and "Multiplication," display more intensity and creativity than he has previously. Yet he has still not reached his technical and creative peak as a guitarist.

1978 will be a promising year for Eric Gale. While still reaping benefits from his first two solo albums and his work with Stuff, he will certainly be an active man in the future. Eric Gale, formerly a studio artist, groping for opportunities to play, may now have more than he can handle.

NOVELS

The Book of Common Prayer

Joan Didion, *The Book of Common Prayer

By Jeffrey B. Aronson

An earlier column commended those writers who successfully utilized humor in their novels. The stylist who inserts wit into a serious work will capture the reader's attention; once accomplished the author then leads the reader in sharing in the emotions of the novel, perhaps by personalizing an experience common to both, or perhaps by allowing the reader to fantasize a desired feeling. The rediscovery of emotion is a great part of the excitement of reading. Simpler entertainment like television shies away from stirring up emotions — a viewer, deeply involved with a program cannot devote full attention to the commercial message. Movies must make their impact while the audience remains captive in the theater. You cannot savor a particular scene from a movie by rereading it, only by seeing the entire film for yet another time.

Authors vary in their ability to integrate humor in their novels. Few writers possess a deft touch with humor; indeed, most male writers use it as a blunt instrument, Jimmy Breslin, a popular writer with a serious side, offers good examples of the problem. His humor is effective. In The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight, Breslin describes the task facing the Mafia upon its establishment in the United States. Created to protect wealthy landowners in Sicily, Mafiosi found American land-barons "had so many guards it was ludicrous. The National Guard shot down women and children during a strike against the Rockefeller mine in Ludlow, Colorado. "No can match," Guiseppe (Extreme Unction) Magaddino of the Kansas City outfit said. "...Of course, even with a clear field, the Italians in the Mafia never came close to the magnitude of larceny committed here by English Protestants, but they have been formidable, given the limits of education and intelligence." Similarly, in novel on the Irish-American, World Without End, Amen, Breslin observes that the occupants of the waiting room in the New York City Criminal Court building can be determined by the position in which they leave the Daily News. Copies of the newspaper left opened to the pictorial centerspread have been read by policemen, while issues left open to the sports pages have been read by attorneys — but they all read the Daily News.

Joan Didion, in The Book of Common Prayer, displays a softer touch of humor which she brilliantly weaves throughout her novel. The book excells in its perspicuity, intelligibility, and compassion. It ought not be, but perhaps it is true that the heroine is the province of the female writer; Didion's women are far more potent than their counterparts in male-authored novels. Furthermore, her characters offer more to the reader, and yet ask more of the reader, than do the often less-challenging works of other contemporary authors of any gender.

The book's characters are complex and fascinating. The central figure, Grace Strasser-Mendana, is a twice-married American widower afflicted with terminal cancer. The death of her second husband left her "in putative control of 59.8 percent of the arable land and about the same percentage of the decision-making process." Grace's son, Geraldo, flits in and out of the country as his mood suits him and as his fiances allow. Possessed of a facile adaptability, Geraldo opens his nation's first chic Boutique, but when business subsides, quickly converts it into a Pentacostal reading room.

Few writers possess a deft touch with humor; indeed, most male writers use it as a blunt instrument.

Grace's first husband, Edgar, brought her to Boca Grande, the Central American nation where she resides and reigns, to accompany him on his anthropological investigations. Her discoveries on human society dispirited her sufficiently so that she took up the study of microbes instead. In her present capacity of the Barbara Stanwyck of Boca Grande's "Big Valley," Grace comments incisively and trenchantly, yet with great caring and concern, about the people around her.

Charlotte Douglas' life in Boca Grande provides the story line for the novel. The arrival of any North American in Boca Grande sends the country's upper class, such as it is, into a shark-like frenzy of avarice and lust, but Charlotte proves to be an enigma. Proper in dress and manner, frequenting Boca Grande's dyseptic night spots, Charlotte stuns her peers at a village festival by expeditiously killing a chicken by snapping its neck. Married first to Warren Bogart, the loutish, venomnous, but vibrant Southern writer, she leaves him for Leonard Douglas, a cross between William Kunstler and F. Lee Bailey. Their daughter, Marin, joined the ranks of ideological terrorists and spent much of her revolution holed up in Buffalo, despising her mother for the wrong reasons, soliciting her father's legal assistance, and denying her history. Indeed, most of Didion's characters obsessively seek to forget their pasts and create new lives for themselves, still relying on past misconceptions to justify their new existances.

Boca Grande receives much attention throughout the book, and as an instructor in courses about Latin American nations, I must laud her talents in succintly describing the milieu of Central America. On a literary bent, Charlotte Douglas attempts (and provides a good parody of) a New Yorker "Letter from Boca Grande;" she writes, "Boca Grande is a land of contrasts."

"Nonsense," says Grace, "on the contrary, Boca Grande is relentlessly the same. The cathedral is not Spanish Colonial but corrugated aluminum. The politics of the country at first appear to offer contrast, involving as they do the 'colorful' Latin juxtaposition of guerilleros and colonels, but when the tanks are put away and the airport reopens, nothing has actually changed in Boca Grande. There are no waterfalls of note, no ruins of interest, no chic boutiques to provide dramatic cultural foil to voodoo in the hills. In fact there is no voodoo in the hills. In fact, there are no hills, only the flat land and the lifeless sea." Grace is equally as acerbic and accurate in her observations about the Sonoma-like in-laws and relatives who comprise the nation's ruling family.

Didion's characters love, hate, manipulate, and hurt like those of any author, male or female, but she startles you with her freshness, wit and near poetic feeling for people.

The Book of Common Prayer does all the things a novel should — relates a story, provides humor, investigates people, and gives entertainment — but it does so in a most unique manner. Her clipped, concise style still offers a rich experience in the use of our language. The book initially seems like a fast read, but you quickly discover yourself slowing down to enjoy her insights and commentaries. Didion's characters love, hate, manipulate, and hurt like those of any author, male or female, but she startles you with her freshness, wit and near poetic feeling for people. This is a remarkable book (now available in paperback) femine and feminist, without ideology.

Strollin' Down The Tokaido Highway

Viewers are in for a treat if they stop in the Lounge Gallery of the Fleming Museum to see the series of woodblock prints in color depicting the resting places along the Tokaido highway, the route between the capitol city of Edo (now Tokyo) and Kyoto, the ancient seat of Japanese Imperial civilization.

Executed in 1832 by the artist Ando Hiroshige, the scenes captured the beauty of the landscape and the variety of travellers along the route: pilgrims, priests, businessmen, tourists, and huge processions of Shoguns and their retinues heading to the Imperial Court to pay homage to the Emperor.

The Tokaido Road or Eastern Sea Route, noted for its magnificent scenery along the Pacific coast where majestic, snow-capped mountains met the sea, consisted of 53 stopping places or "stages" maintained by the Imperial government. The Fleming Museum and Vermont are fortunate to have prints of all 53 stages and the 2 terminals at either end, a complete set.

Known in Japan as ukiyo-e, literally translated "pictures of the floating world," woodblock prints became popular in Japan during the Edo period (1615-1857). The era was one of peace and prosperity when a moneyed merchant class arose and with it, an "art of the people." Woodblock prints were a very popular medium, and in making a series based on the stages of the Tokaido Road, ukiyo-e artists were continuing an even older tradition known as meisho-e, or "pictures of famous member of the government fire brigade in Edo when he was only 12 years old, he had shown such artistic talent that at the age of 14, he was apprenticed to a well-known designer of superior landscape prints. His opportunity to travel the Tokaido Road in 1832 as a member of an embassy from the Shogun to the Imperial Court provided him with the material he used to create his masterpiece.

Robert Hull Fleming Museum, Lounge Gallery. 15 January through 28 February – Monday through Friday, 9 to 5; Saturday and Sunday, 1 to 5.

On February 22 at 8 p.m. Professor Peter Seybolt of the University of Vermont History Department, who specializes in Asian history and culture, will speak on "The Tokaido Highway." The lecture is in conjunction with the Hiroshige exhibit and will take place in the Wilbur Room at the Fleming Museum.

objects and glassware from China, can be viewed in the broad context of the development of the social and political culture in addition to the development of an artistic idea. This," he added, "is where we feel we have a lot of room for growth."

In addition to working with the History, Psychology, Anthropology and Art departments, the museum will present two exhibits this semester in conjunction with the Vermont Seminars program. "War!" a cross-cultural exhibit corresponding with the Third World Lecture Series featuring weapons, costumes, trophies and other visual responses associated with war, will open February 15. Photographs of life in Harlem by James Van Der Zee, presented through the Harlem Renaissance program, will be on display March sixth through April eleventh.

However, whether or not some of the older collections will ever be reinstalled is questionable. Director William Lipke does not see any immediate solution. "They are long range problems and ones that every museum faces," he said. "It's basically a problem for the particular cultures to decide whether the records we have accumulated, either purchased or received as gifts, are worthwhile, and whether through federal agency, state agency, or our own pockets, they should be preserved." Lipke further stated, "A lot of people argue that that is extreme – we should look at works of art as we look at human beings. We're born, we die and that's the life span. But somehow, we should look at the records of the past in a different way. We want to preserve them."

The Week of : Feb. 2 - Feb. 9

Learn to Meditate

A free introductory course in meditation, the experience of consciousness, reincarnation and Bhakti yoga will be held at the Living Learning Center, Rm 102A at 8:00 p.m. The course will be taught by Devaki, Mrs. Groulx from Montreal who has lectured on the subject of meditation and spirituality extensively in Montreal. The program will lead into a 6 week course that will cover such things as the experience and expansion of your own consciousness through meditation and will each week give you a new type of meditation to practice at home. All are welcome to attend. Admission is free. This program is sponsored by the Sri Chinmoy Centers. Monday, February 6.

Coffee Houses

During the month of February the UVMchapter of the Hillel Foundation will be sponsoring a series of coffeehouses on assorted subjects. On February 6th at 7:30 p.m. the series will open with Dr. Mark Stolar speaking on the U.S. policy in the Mid-East. Everyone is welcome and we will be meeting in L/L Commons 216.

R.A. Positions Available

The Department of Residential Life is announcing Resident Assistant position openings available for the academic year 1978-79. Any full time undergraduate student with a minimum 2.4 overall accumulative average, and possessing leadership and communication skills is eligible to apply.

The function of the Resident Assistant is to work with other residence hall staff members and the hall residents to facilitate an environment within the residence hall that will contribute to the intellectual, social, and cultural development of the students. The Resident Assistant articulates to the students the philosophy and policies of the Office of Residential Life and the University, and in turn, represents and presents the needs of the students to the administration.

All potential candidates are required to attend one of the General Information Sessions to be held at 8:00 p.m. on Sunday, February 5 at the MAT Dining Hall and again at 8:00 p.m. on Monday, February 6, at the Simpson Dining Hall. All applications must be submitted to the Department of Residential Life at Mansfield House no later than Monday, February 13, 1978 at 5:00 p.m.

If you have any questions, please contact the Department of Residential Life at 656-3434.

Go Delta

Again this year, Delta Delta Delta has worked hard through service projects to raise $600 for their scholarship program. This money is given, as a scholarship, to any full-time UVM woman student to be used next semester. Delta Delta Delta national service projects fund also awards $1,000 annually for which all local winners will be automatically eligible.

Applications may be picked up from the Director of Financial Aid or Tri-Delta Sorority at 143 South Willard St. on campus.

Deadline is March 15, 1978. For more information call Tri-Delta at 864-5051.

European Culture Night

On Friday evening, Feb. 3, the UVM Folk Dance Club will present an evening of Eastern European folk dance and song. The event will begin at 8 p.m. in Southwick Ballroom on the Redstone Campus.

The program will include dances and songs from Ukraine, Russia, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania. Some will be performed by the Folk Dance Club's performance group "Kaval," and others will be taught for audience participation.

Refreshments will be served. (Contributions to the refreshment table are very welcome.) Admission is free for UVM undergraduates and club members, $1.00 for general public. This event is taking place with the help of the Eastern European Studies Program. For more info. call 863-6686.

Literary Magazine

There will be a meeting for anyone interested in working on the staff of The News and the Weather, the UVM literary magazine which achieved critical acclaim with its first issue last semester. The News and the Weather is looking for students who would be interested in running the magazine next year, in addition to able minds and bodies for this semesters editions. The meeting will be on February ninth, at 7:00, in the English Department office on the third floor of Old Mill. Anyone and everyone is welcome!

Need Advice?

Steve is having difficulty making the grades. He can't understand where he went wrong. He's upset about being placed on academic trial, and doesn't know where to turn. Should he take a leave of absence? Should he work on scheduling courses so that he doesn't overload himself? Should he get some help with study skills? How does he explain his low grade report to his folks? If you have similar concerns come to the Advising Referral Center at 337 Waterman, x4174. Let us help you sort things out, and get the most out of your education!

$175,000 Up for Grabs! !

Attention all S.A. recognized organizations already funded by S.A. and those wishing to be funded. Budget Request Forms for the academic year 78-79 are available as of February first. The Student Association has $175,000 in funds which will be allocated to S.A. recognized organizations. These budget forms are self-explanatory and specific S.A. funding policies are explained on page one of the form. All S.A. recognized organizations wishing funds should pick up these forms soon from the secretary in the S.A. office.

Beer Slalom

The UVM Ski Club will sponsor a beer slalom race this Saturday, Feb. 4, at Smuggler's Notch. Course fee is free with UVM I.D., and the race is open to all levels of skiers.

A beer slalom consists of an easy race course on simple terrain. The contestants negotiate part of the course, drink two beers, continue, drink two more beers, and then finish. The best time wins, but competition is not a prime factor — it's just for fun. Anyone interested in helping with this event, or interested in the Ski Club in general is invited to attend a meeting tonight at 7:30 in 216 L/L Commons.

Videotaping

The College of Education and Social Services Career Planning and Placement Office will offer videotaped interview experiences for its seniors preparing for professional positions. Registrants will have the opportunity of viewing themselves after simulated interview sessions for the purpose of acquiring confidence and self-awareness of interpersonal involvement and non-verbal reactions. Seniors enrolled in the College of Education and Social Services are invited to call 656-3477 or come to the office in 411 Waterman to sign up for thirty minute appointments. Kim Cobb and Becky Floyd will coordinate the videotape sessions according to the following schedule: Thursdays 1:00 – 5:00; Fridays 2:00 – 5:00. The first sessions will begin Thursday, February 9.

Cross Country Freaks

On Saturday, February fourth the Outing Club is sponsoring the second Annual Cross Campus Cruise. This five kilometer cross country ski race starts at 10:00 a.m. on Archie Post Field (behind Gutterson Field House). The course goes around the Golf course down Redstone Path, through the tunnel and finishes in front of Billings Center. There is a one dollar entry fee and the deadline for registration is February third. So get down to the Outing Club (656-3439) and register soon.

Masquerade Ball

The first annual UVM Masquerade Ball will be held on Feb. 3 from 9 p.m. – 1 a.m. at the Radisson Hotel. The Masquerade Ball will take the form of a crazy costume ball with a theme of Alice in Winterland and prizes will be given to the person and couple whose costumes show the best interpretation of this theme. Because it is intended to be part of UVM's Winterweek, which is an annual event, the Masquerade Ball will also be held annually, with a different theme each year. Since this is the first annual Masquerade Ball and a new idea, it has to be a success to prove there is enough enthusiasm to have another one next year. Tickets are $3.50 per person or $6.50 a couple and can be bought in Billings from 11:00 to 1:00 and in the dining halls. The Highrollers will supply the dancing music, door prizes will be announced regularly and midnight hors d'oeuvres will be provided by the Radisson. What a deal for only $3.50!

Sound like fun? It's sure to be the gala event of the year so don't miss it! Sponsored by GCC and Alumni Association in cooperation with the Winterfest Committee.

Want to Dance ?

The Orchesis Concert Dancers are looking for new dancers. Interested students, both men and women, are encouraged to contact Maggi Hayes for audition information. Phone no. – 656-3240.

Orchechestra to Play

The University Orchestra will perform its second concert for the 1977-78 season on Sunday, February 5th at 4 p.m. in the New Music Building recital hall on Redstone Campus.

The orchestra is conducted by Peter Brown, professor of cello at the music department. The group is a mixture of university students and community members. The Program will include Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Frank's Symphony in C Minor, and a Bach orchestral suite.

Admission is $1 for students and $2 for general admission. Please come.

Pre-Med or Pre-Dent

Two informational meetings are planned this year: one for premedical students and one for predental students. If you are planning to apply to either or both professions, you are strongly urged to attend these meetings. Both sessions will provide information about application procedures, deadlines, admission tests and application services, as well as statistics on acceptance.

Premedical Students: February 14 at 4:00 in North Lounge, Billings Center.

Predental Students: February 15, at 4:00 in Marsh Lounge, Billings Center.

If you are planning to apply to medical, dental, osteopathic, optometry or podiatry schools, the Premedical/Predental Advisory Committee recommends attendence at one of these meetings.

Aschenbach in Meditation

The New Unitarian-Universalist Group, an alternative worship experience, presents June Aschenbach in a Meditation: Light, Color, Sound, February 12, Sunday at 2:00 p.m., Room 108, Home Economics Bldg. (opposite Bailey Library) UVM campus. Public invited.

This is a Jungian based experiment. Its title is WAITING.

Country Dance

The Green Mountain Volunteers, a traditional New England Dance Group, will present a performance and country dance at 8:00 p.m., Sunday January 29th at Southwick Ballroom. The GMV was formed in the spring of 1977 to contribute to the current reawakening of interest in traditional New England Dance. Along with many performances around New England, the GMV will be touring Eastern Europe next summer.

The evening, sponsored by the UVM Folk Dance Club, will consist of a performance of two sets of dances. One set will include dances from the post revolutionary war era, while the other will feature dances from the late 1800's. Each set will be performed in traditional attire. Following each set will be a country dance in which everyone is invited to participate, regardless of experience. The admission for the general public is $2.00; UVM students and children, $1.00.

Program Reviews to Evaluate Departments

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

The pilot study for a comprehensive review of academic programs, academic support and administrative units was issued last week by Dr. Robert Arns, UVM Vice President for Academic Affairs.

The program reviews, scheduled to begin this semester, have as their primary purpose "program improvement" to "focus the university," according to Arns. Calling the programs "terribly important," he wrote in the pilot study, "We need to understand ourselves better not only in order to do a better job of meeting our educational responsibilities, but also in order to explain ourselves more effectively to our several publics."

While two outgoing trustees, Paul Low and Daniel Burke, cited before they left a need to make program cutbacks, Arns stated emphatically that these new reviews are not to help determine where cutbacks might be made.

In conducting the reviews, a number of new committees will be involved to evaluate the programs under scrutiny on such criteria as quality, value, effective use of resources, and goals versus activities. The three new committees, the Self-Study Committee, the External Review Committee, and the Coordinating Committee will work independently of one another yet will concentrate concurrently on the same areas.

The members of the Self-Study Committee will be appointed by the dean after consultation with those involved in the program, unless an entire college is being considered. In the latter case, the Vice-President for Academic Affairs will make the appointments. The same holds true in terms of appointments for the External Review Committee. The Coordinating Committee, on the other hand, will be made up of members chosen solely by the Vice President.

When asked if the Self-Study and External Review Committees might end up as being self-serving to the head or dean of the program being looked at, Arns replied, "They surely can. But I think it can be avoided." He did add, however, that the committees could be self-serving in the positive sense rather than in the perjorative sense.

In trying to determine which areas will be – and need to be – considered first, Arns said the individual colleges have been asked to make these selections on a "variety" of criteria. "I suppose you'd have to ask the individual deans" as to what these criteria might be, he added. Nevertheless, he did point out why some programs might be looked at first. These reasons included: When there is a new dean or chairman in a certain department; when a program has been considered "stable" or "mature" whereby it may have been overlooked; or where the program is linked to existing accrediting schedules.

Arns noted, "These are ad-hoc committees and not a bureaucratic thing. The program is not as time consuming as it may at first appear."

Thus far, the only review that has been completed is of the UVM Extension Service and a review of the Living/Learning Center is currently in progress. These reviews drew their initial direction from the "Proposed Procedures for the Review of Academic Departments and Programs" which was prepared by Associate Vice President John Moore in November, 1975.

Vietnam Expert Criticizes Warfare Strategy

Dr. Lawrence Grinter, Defense Consultant.

By Anthony G. Cambreleng

During the Vietnam war, the US stressed "big-unit" conflicts or a "largely conventional approach" to the War, while North Vietnam "relied on small units for the primary emphasis" a contrast which had "enormous implications," according to Lawrence Grinter, a research consultant at the National Defense University.

Grinter spoke on "The American Effort in South Vietnam and South Vietnamese Society," at the Living/Learning Center of UVM, last Monday night. His lecture was part of the Seminars program "U.S. Power and the Third World." Dr. Grinter worked in Saigon in 1966-67 for the Simulmatics Corporation and later was professor of foreign affairs and director of the East Asia and Western Pacific Studies program at the National War College. His publications include several papers on the outcome of the Vietnam War, official studies on the effectiveness of U.S. military operations there, and implications of the war's outcome for U.S. foreign policy. Grinter was originally scheduled to be one half of a panel discussion with Frances Fitzgerald, author of Fire in the Lake. Fitzgerald was unable to attend, however, because of the adverse weather conditions.

This clash of strategies raised questions about America's military effectiveness, and allowed North Vietnam to use "political-military judo" on the U.S., he said. The U.S. "did not adapt to the special conditions of the war," he added. North Vietnam's small unit operations were characterized by "harrassing-type fire" and constituted ninety percent of the North's military activity, Grinter said.

Grinter noted, that, if the situation were to arise again, he is "not sure we can overcome the mistake we made in Vietnam," because of the United States problem in seeing through a "revolutionary Marxian challenge" and being able to deal with it.

Grinter agreed with General William Westmoreland's view that the US should have no fear of introspective analysis concerning Vietnam but added that the sheer complexity of the events of Vietnam and their causes hinders fruitful analysis. Westmoreland, former Commander of Armed Forces in Vietnam from 1964-68, preceded Grinter as a speaker in the Vermont Seminars program.

Grinter cited three reasons for the failure of the U.S. military operation in Vietnam. The inability to determine the nature of the enemy, the inability to diagnose the actual operative nature of what Hanoi was doing in South Vietnam, and the misplacement of emphasis in responding to Hanoi's strategy and operations.

General Westmoreland, in his recent book, raised a question as to whether there were alternative ways the U.S. could have proceeded in the Vietnam conflict. Grinter responded to this question by citing four alternative forms of action: the encouragement of political development, the protection of the population, the provision of territorial security, and increased efforts at pacification.

In assessing the United States' role in Vietnam, Grinter stated that the U.S. "performed quite ineffectively despite good intentions and a valiant effort." "It is difficult to fight totalitarianism with democracy," he said.

Responding to a question as to why the U.S. became militarily involved in Vietnam, Grinter said he didn't know and pointed out that the U.S. "never did articulate our national interest in Vietnam."

He described North Vietnam's casualties as "that enormous slaughter of young men, deliberately sacrificed by Hanoi for its own purposes" and further stated "it must add up to nothing less than genocide." From 1965-75, approximately 1.5 million North Vietnamese Soldiers left to fight in South Vietnam and over forty-percent (850,000-950,000) of them died there.

On Lengthening The Add/Drop Period

A New Proposal Would Extend The Add Period To Four Weeks

By John Letteri

The Faculty Committee for Academic Affairs submitted a proposal to the Student Association (S.A.) and various academic committees on the possibilities of lengthening the Add-Drop period this week. The proposal also offers some changes in the withdrawal situation. Although in the preliminary stages, the proposal drew some criticism from the S.A. and students.

Currently, the Add-Drop period lasts one week, while the Drop period extends over the first three weeks of classes. Presently, during the fifth and sixth week of classes, a student may withdraw from a class, without penalty, receiving a "W" on his transcript. During the rest of the semester, a student may withdraw from a course, and receive either a "WP" (withdraw passing) or a "WF" (withdraw failing).

"We would like to see much of the debating go on before (the proposal) goes to the Faculty-Senate on Feb. 28."

—Academic Affairs Chmn.

The proposal would extend the Drop period by one week to four weeks stating that "by this time the student hopefully has been exposed to an examination or some other form of written work allowing the student an opportunity to make a realistic evaluation of his or her ability to handle the course."

The proposal further states that the Add period "should be made equivalent to the Drop period" (four weeks) alleging "there seems to be no compelling reason to prohibit a student from trying to catch up in a course," as long as the student realizes the responsibility for course work prior to his or her enrollment. It stipulates that faculty "would not be required to give make-up exams, papers, or quizzes."

It states that drops should cease after the fourth week unless the student has been enrolled "by administrative error and has not been attending classes." Withdrawals during the fifth and sixth week (as is the current policy) carry no penalty and would be recorded on a transcript as "W."

S.A. President Geoff Ligget agrees with the proposal. Linda Purdy, Vice-President of S.A. and head of the Student Action Committee, which is considering the proposal, finds it "a very sound proposal. It realizes much more of what we wanted in the way of extension than we had expected."

Controversy, however, has arisen over part five of the proposal which states: "Until the last day of classes, the student who wishes to withdraw would fill out an appropriate form and submit it to the instructor. The instructor would report a "W" grade where the grade represents an evaluation of the student in the course at that point in time, (WA — WF), for example. One copy would go to the student's dean for informational purposes and the other copy would go to the registrar to be recorded on the transcript." The proposal stipulates here that rather than a WP, a grade of WA — WI would appear on a student's transcript, although not affecting the GPA at all. A WF would (as it is presently) be treated as an F. It concludes that "no withdrawals would be allowed after the last day of classes."

Liggett finds fault with the stipulation that WA — WF would appear on a student's transcript. "Some courses consist of only a term paper and a final," said Liggett, "and to ascertain a grade for a student withdrawing from a course of that nature would be difficult." He criticized the WA — WF clause and contended, "it should simply be WP or WF, with further qualification unnecessary."

Purdy and members of the Student Action Committee voiced opinions in agreement with Liggett. Purdy contends there would be "no reason for the WA—WF stipulation" and that "A grade of WP or WF is enough."

Dr. Christopher Allen, Chairman of the Committee for Academic Affairs, stressed that "the proposal is in the preliminary stages," and "we would like to see much of the debating go on before it comes to the Faculty Senate on February 28." Defending the WA — WF clause, Dr. Allen said "it will present to someone viewing a transcript a more realistic picture of what a student has accomplished at the university." Offering this example, he said, "suppose a student has been doing very well in a course, and for extenuating circumstances, must withdraw from a course. Wouldn't it be a truer evaluation of the student's work in that course to see a WA or WB on the transcript rather than a WP?" However, Dr. Allen concluded, "the proposal, as is, is an idea and is open to opinion and debate. It is by no means a final draft."

Many students find the WA — WF proposal distressing. One said "If there is no credit involved, what should it matter if I have an A or B in the course when I withdraw?" According to another, "It would look better having WP or WF. The reason you want to withdraw from a course, usually, is that you're doing poorly and want to get out with a WP (withdraw passing) rather than a D." Others criticized lengthening the Add period to four weeks. Said one, "to add some courses after four weeks and try to catch up would be impossible."

VERMONT CYNIC

Rathskeller Bill:

Up For Round Three

By Susan Heller

After years of controversy, the Rathskeller Bill, which would permit Vermont state colleges and universities to obtain liquor licenses, may pass through the Vermont Senate and become a reality.

The bill, which has recently been revised, is co-sponsored by representative Randy Niquette. During the last legislative session, Niquette organized students from various state colleges, helped them secure administrative support, and presented testimony from out-of-state Rathskeller managers.

In 1973, the bill was approved by the Senate, but did not pass the House in Montpelier. This year it went to the House first, and after passing there is now in the Senate.

There is some debate about the necessity of the Rathskeller Bill, but Niquette contends that it is essential: "The law states right now that alcoholic beverages shall not be dispensed in any manner on a college campus." As an example, Niquette cited an incident which took place in 1975 in Rutland County, when the State's Attorney prevented Castleton State from holding its Oktoberfest.

Castleton is the birthplace of the Rathskeller Bill. Senate testimony in favor of the bill included claims by the college that the Rathskeller would serve as a focal point for students and faculty, provide a sense of community, and function as a cultural and entertainment center.

Passage of the bill would provide a license for beer and wine only. Furthermore, if a Rathskeller or campus pub was opened, it would be limited to the university community. Niquette says, "It would be a club-license, which means that only UVM students, plus two invited guests, could go there. By virtue of your affiliation with the University, you would become a member of the University Rathskeller Club."

Even if the Rathskeller Bill succeeds, there is a hierarchy of individuals who must approve the liquor license request. It must pass from the legislature to the State Liquor Control Board, from there to the college president, and finally to the Board of Aldermen in each community.

Niquette wishes to add to the bill a stipulation that the potential profits of a Rathskeller be placed in a scholarship fund for each college or university.

Niquette is hopeful about the bill's success, and said, "It will probably be a month until it's back on the floor again... from what I can see so far, the votes are there to pass it." Niquette feels that much credit should be paid to Senator Bill Daniels, who worked hard to get the bill into the Senate Health and Welfare Committee.

Niquette is determined about the necessity of the bill. As he protested, "They're treating the college students like infants. They can't drink at their own club on campus, but they can go downtown and drink in any bar." He argues that the rowdiness and vandalism which characterize dormitory drinking would be minimized in the atmosphere of a Rathskeller.

" They're treating the students like infants. They can't drink at their own club on campus,but they can go downtown and drink in any bar." — Randy Niquette Co-Sponser of the Rathskeller Bill"

Linda Purdy, the SA Vice President, commented on the Rathskeller Bill. Purdy noted, "The University is in great sympathy with the state colleges," but because of its location, UVM is not in immediate need of a pub. She remarked that SA is "...not as concerned with a pub on campus as with having a catering service."

If there were to be a pub in Billings, some believe the increased traffic would be damaging to the building. According to Purdy, "the Senate talked about the Rathskeller Bill, and we feel it would be harmful to Billings." Ideally, she said, UVM would like to preserve the building, perhaps by converting it to a library again, moving SA somewhere else. Purdy added that space is definitely limited, however.

Linda pointed out that unless the bill is amended, it will apply only to state colleges. In reference to dormitory drinking, one's residence hall is legally an extension of one's private home. Therefore, Purdy explained, beer, wine and other liquor is permissible in a dorm.

Considering bars in Burlington, Randy Niquette noted, "We had no opposition whatsoever from downtown." A random poll of several bars and restaurants revealed varying sentiments expressed by local operators.

Rommis Nector, owner of "Nector's," opposed the bill. He maintained that bars cannot protect against it, because their "voice is too small." If there was to be a pub on campus, Nector is convinced that students would drink there, for convenience. He continued, "I love to see students come downtown, but there is nothing we can do about it."

Bob Harding, owner of the "Last Chance," doesn't believe that passage of the Rathskeller Bill would affect patronage of his establishment. "I don't think UVM is going to go into the bar business... they are in the education business; we're in the entertainment business," he stated.

Ed Madden of "Hannibul's" said that his first reaction was less than favorable, and that the bill would inevitably affect business to some extent.

In response to these claims, Niquette observed, "there are something like fifty-two liquor licenses already granted in Burlington. I can't see how fifty-three will take away any of the business." Only the future will tell the fate of the Rathskeller Bill.

Speakers Debate Act 250

"Act 250 is a dynamic,flexible and exiting forum in which citizens should decide their own fate" — Attorney Brownell, co-author of Act 250

By Rich Hyland

The Church Street Center for Community Education with the Citizens for Responsible Growth presented "Pyramid Mall and Act 250: Update and Discussion" last Monday night at St. Paul's Cathedral. Three speakers were involved: Robert Burley, architect; Dr. Thomas Eastler, environmental geologist, University of Maine; and Jonathan Brownell, attorney, environment and policy studies professor at Dartmouth University. Brownell is also co-author of Act 250. The act, a series of land use standards, is presently being tested in the controversial Pyramid Mall construction in Williston.

The objective of the meeting, however, was clarified by moderator Tim Maker. He claimed it was not to pass judgment on the Pyramid Mall question but rather to examine various issues which were "interesting, or needing attention."

Among such issues was the question of Act 250 in relation to aesthetics, the subject of Mr. Burley's remarks. Burley maintained that if a "preservation document" like Act 250 were to be effective, it would require a cleaner definition of aesthetics and a provision for positive course toward that definition.

Mr. Burley criticized the proposed mall design as an attempt to conceal the aesthetic loss of the land reducing public opposition. "Truth is beauty," said Mr. Burley. "And in truth is practicality, honesty, simplicity, and a quality that is genuine."

Another issue concerning the effectiveness of Act 250 was its provision for responsible energy use. Dr. Eastler addressed this topic, and condemned Act 250 as "ill-defined and non-defined in terms of energy conservation." He believes its phraseology was too vague to have the power to provide citizens with enough direction.

Eastler found this problem was a result of the uncertainty in developing national or state policies. He asserted that only through resolution of the energy crisis, which he considers "societal crisis" could we continue our notion of progress as growth. Dr. Eastler also stressed the need for conservation of primary agricultural lands, to maintain "Vermont's high survival potential."

The third speaker of the night, Jonathan Brownell, defended Act 250, contending it has the potential to promote and protect the public good. He mentioned the positive power it has had to prevent what he termed "unwise development" and a shifting tax burden.

Mr. Brownell was also careful to note that Act 250 could not be used to protect local business or to exclude minorities.

Defending the charge that Act 250 is vague in terms of aesthetics and energy conservation, Mr. Brownell described Act 250 as the opportunity for knowledgeable citizens to answer those questions themselves.

"Act 250," Mr. Brownell said, "is a dynamic, flexible, and exciting forum in which citizens should decide their own fate. It involves far more responsibility and far more frustration. That is what self-government is all about. That is what Act 250 is all about."

Legal Service Highlights Next S.A. Assembly

By Susan Jo Perkins

The Student Association announced earlier this week that it has scheduled the first All-Student Governing Assembly of this semester. The date is set for Wednesday, February 15, at 7:30 p.m. in Wright Dining Hall.

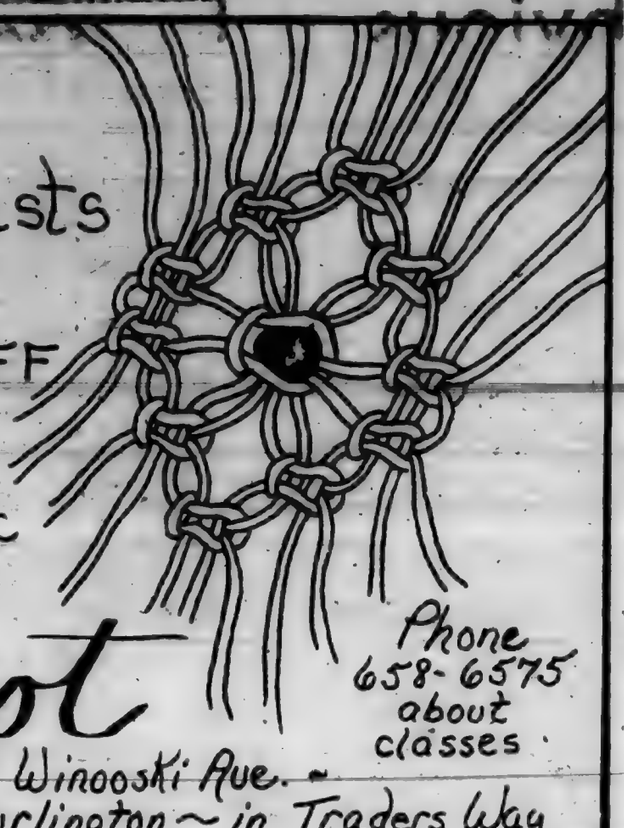
The new Student Legal Service is a major item on the agenda. According to S.A. Communications Committee Chairperson Rob Smith, three non-senators have formed an ad hoc committee that has been researching the Legal Service proposal. These students are Donna Cobb, Peter Drakos, and Randy Friedman. Smith noted that the whole Student Legal Service has been a "presidential project," as "it has not been run through any senatorial committee."

The Legal Service will establish itself during the next two weeks. This year it will be largely a referral service, with hopes to expand into a fuller program next year.

At the Assembly, S.A. President Geoff Liggett will inform students about the project: how to use the Legal Service and what to expect.

When asked if the Service could be used to challenge UVM, Smith declined comment. Apparently he was not trying to conceal information; he didn't seem to know the answer to that question. Among other uses, Smith said the Service could accomodate students with tenant problems, consumer problems and even income taxes.

Other items to be discussed next Wednesday night include the S.A. Information booklet. This proposal, stated Smith, was conceived by President Liggett last November. The purpose of the booklet is to acquaint freshmen with the organizations and operations of the S.A. The booklet will be mailed to incoming freshmen before they arrive at UVM, as part of the Orientation packet.



Smith was asked if he thought it was fair for enrolled students to finance, through the SA fee, a booklet to be used by students who are not yet enrolled and who have not contributed to its cost. Although he considered the point valid, he stressed that it was "imperative to educate" incoming freshmen and sophomores early. Soon they will be filling the student trustee posts.

Smith added that the booklet should be sent out prior to the students' matriculation.

"We're shooting for freshmen, because we know they are more likely to read something about the University before they get here. We feel we'll get a higher readership than if we were to distribute a book to the upperclassmen."

Working on the book are students Lisa D'Alessandra and Mark Roader.

Smith admitted he did not know how Liggett will address such concerns as gym expansion or plagiarism and cheating. Regarding the latter, he remarked that "There's been a recent increase in trials. We want to inform students of the options available to them," continued Smith, "if they are accused by or wish to accuse a teacher."

New Members to Join Board of Trustees

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

During the past two weeks, the university's Board of Trustees has picked up five new members and replaced three old ones.

Whether or not the voting tendencies of the body will be altered with one-fifth of its members being freshmen remains to be seen, but the likelihood of a drastic change in the general trend of thinking seems remote. The reason here is simply that voting records show nearly every time the board addresses an issue and then puts it up for vote, there is a consensus among its members.

The new trustees are from the self-perpetuating segment of the board, of which there are nine in total, and also two from the student body. The self-perpetuating group has traditionally been made up of alumni, but this year's selections include the first non-alumni from this portion. These nine members are chosen internally by the existing group, which submits its own list of names for consideration.

The incoming group of "alumni" trustees consists of Edward Davis, an IBM executive, Everett Bailey, president of the Whiting Co. of Burlington, and Richard Bickford, a pharmaceutical executive of the New Jersey based Merck Corp.

Davis is vice president for development and manufacturing in IBM and senior executive at the company's Essex Junction facility. A 1954 graduate of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, he earned his masters degree in electrical engineering at California Institute of Technology and his Ph.D. at Stanford University in 1958. In 1956, he was named Outstanding Electrical Engineer of the Year and is a fellow of the Institute of Electrical and Electronic Engineers.

Bailey is president and treasurer of the Burlington based E.C. and A.C. Whiting Co. and president of the Associated Industries of Vermont. A 1940 electrical engineering graduate of UVM, he is also a member of the Board of the Vermont Symphony Orchestra, has served on the Executive Committee of the state Office of Economic Opportunity, and has been active in alumni affairs.

Bickford, a 1943 graduate of UVM, is director of Animal Production Technical Services with Merck & Co. of HoHoKus, N.J. A native of Newport, Vt., he serves on the University's Alumni Council.

The other new trustees are the ones representing "students as consumers," Andi Pearl and Butch Crandall (see 2/2 Cynic). They were chosen last week by a selection committee consisting of students from major facets of the university.

UVM President Lattie Coor said he is "pleased with the breadth and diversity represented in the five new trustees who weil join the board in March."

The full 25 member board includes nine members selected by the state General Assembly, three appointed by the governor, nine within the "self-perpetuating" group, two representing students, and two ex-officio members, the governor of the state and president of the university.

The threenon-student trustees will each serve on the board for six years.

Vermont Highways Upgrading Policies

By Tom Daniels

"You can't get there from here," says the old Yankee proverb. But in Vermont you can get just about anywhere, weather permitting, and the basic means of movement is by road. Road building has been a state pasttime since the late 1700's, and today Vermont boasts over 2,900 miles of state highway, almost half of which are in poor repair and rapidly becoming worse.

Last month, Transportation Agency Secretary Ronald Crisman unveiled a $260 million "departure" from the aggressive highway construction policies begun in the 1950s and pursued by former Highway Commissioner John T. Gray. Instead, Crisman has proposed a long-range program to upgrade state roads which were ignored while the interstates were being built.

"This may be our one last opportunity to put things right before we have great difficulties in maintaining the road system," Crisman warned. "Expenditures for road maintenance are the same now as in 1972, but since then costs for materials and labor have doubled." Even with a $51 million budget for 1978, it remains to be seen if Crisman can put his intentions into action.

Last week Vermont Public Interest Research Group Assistant-Director Leigh Seddon was skeptical. "On paper, the Transportation Agency's plans look like a shift to road maintenance, but we'll be finishing up John Gray's construction agenda for the next five years," Seddon remarked. "Vermonters aren't going to see these road improvements for a long time, if ever. And the longer we wait, the more the roads deteriorate, inflation takes its toll, and the likelihood of federal funding diminishes."

Seddon cited the case of U.S. Route 5 in Putney which was desperately in need of repair. However, the Federal Highway Administration (FHA) decided against spending half-a-million dollars on cosmetic resurfacing of a road whose base was shot. Consequently, the FHA pulled out of the project, leaving the state to pick up the bill. Crisman described the situation, "It's rather ironic that a road gets so bad that the FHA won't participate in reconstructing it. The ones that need it most don't qualify for federal funds. But 'He who has the gold rules' – we have to do highway projects that will fit into federal funding projects."

"Repairs on Route 5 will cost the state $700,000 a mile. We are trying to bring these roads back to where they are usable; it's a challenge." Crisman concluded.

But VPIRG has charged "The Highway Dept. has been less than candid when telling citizens throughout Vermont that needed road repairs will be

Repression Is Less Obvious But Remains Widespread

By Robert J. Moore

Repression of dissidents in the Soviet Union, Poland and Czechoslavakia is now "below the level of public observance" but remains as widespread as ever, according to Professor of Soviet Affairs Robert Sharlet of Union College. Sharlet described dissent in these countries as "reformist in character," pointing out in his February second lecture in John Dewey Lounge, that the dissidents "are not talking about overthrow" of the government. They are working for "internal changes."

Sharlet described Soviet repression as being well organized and a model that Poland and Czechoslavakia have been "taking cues from." The three countries are using the same repressive techniques," said Sharlet. In his view, these countries are no longer trying to eliminate dissent altogether, but are now trying to simple contain it. This change in strategy is closely linked to the move from "high profile," open repression, to the less visible forms of restraint, he said. The Soviet Union originally attempted to make deterrent examples of prominent dissidents but instead "created martyrs" and consequently "more and more people became enraged," Sharlet continued.

Repression of dissent in the sixties and early seventies was characterized by political trials in which the person was charged with crimes such as sedition. According to Sharlet, these laws "can be interpreted at will". The problem with this type of repression, he continued, was that it left records and was very visible to the public. This, he contends, served to increase public dissent and outrage, instead of acting as a deterrent. Sharlet said that more recently repression had been characterized by criminal trials in which the government has "planted evidence" and "perjured." The defendant is generally convicted and thereby removed from the political arena. Sharlet noted that this type of repression is "hard to confront and deal with," and because of the nature of the trials does not command a substantial amount of attention from the Western news organizations.

Mental institutions are used to remove political opponents from society.

Bureaucratic "red tape" is still used in the Soviet Union, Poland and Czechoslavakia to harrass and discourage dissidents, observed Sharlet, but he emphasized the increased number of murders and muggings of dissidents and their associates. He attributed responsibility for this to government personnel "appearing to be thugs." He compared it to the "mob days" which characterized the 1920's, and called it a "type of administrative murder."

In Sharlet's opinion, the use of psychological terror is also more prevalent than before. Mental institutions are used to remove political opponents from society, a procedure he termed the "medicalization of dissent." Those committed to institutions are not examined by independent psychiatrists but by psychiatrists employed by the government.

In addition to the increased use of psychological terror, Sharlet observed that instances of expulsion or "forced expatriation" have greatly increased. This form of suppression, he said, "works very effectively" because the pressure is brought to bear on the dissident's family and friends. The Soviet Union, Poland and Czechoslavakia have achieved a "lower profile" of repression by increased use of these techniques, which are easily disguised or concealed, Sharlet explained.

He characterized dissent in these countries as having begun "to congeal" and become a "movement," in contrast to the fragmented, disorganized efforts of the past. In Poland, "the regime itself has frequently forged this unit," he said.

Concerning the threatened trial of Soviet dissident Zacharov, Sharlet described it as a bluff by Russia to gain bargaining power.

Editor's Note – In addition to a number of political papers, Robert Sharlet has written numerous books on the Soviet Union, and on comparative politics.

Some Caribbean Medical Schools Termed Rip-offs

By Craig H. Smith

American students applying to Caribbean medical schools should question and investigate school claims of official recognition. Schools in Antigua, the Dominican Republic, Barbados, the Bahamas, and Granada have claimed they are accredited by organizations that, in fact, do not have the authority to grant such status. Some schools have claimed accreditation by the World Health Organization, which only publishes a directory of medical schools.

Medical schools in Puerto Rico are generally considered legitimate because, as part of a U.S. territory, they are subject to American accrediting standards. But at least two Puerto Rican medical schools are not accredited, and one has charged the American agency that accredits medical schools with conflict of interest and "flagrant violation of accrediting standards." The charge was made last fall by the Universidad del Caribe de Medicina of Cayey, in response to being called a "ripoff" by Dr. James Schofield, director of the U.S. accrediting agency, the Liaison Committee for Medical Education (LCME). Schofield said the Universidad del Caribe tried to enroll 240 students in its first year of operation. Most American schools try to teach only 24 students in a first class. The committee denied the school accreditation because it lacked teachers and facilities to accommodate 240 students. The other Puerto Rican school denied status was D'Hostos Escuela de Medicina in San Juan. Only Catholic University of Puerto Rico received accreditation from the committee.

Schofield warned of false claims of "fully accredited programs" that appear in American newspaper advertisements and said that many Caribbean schools have directed massive mail campaigns to college advisors claiming "full accreditation." He emphasized the fact that only schools in the continental U.S. and its territories can receive approved status from his committee, which is run jointly by the American Medical Association (AMA) and the Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC). It is this close association with the U.S. medical community that is being used by Universidad del Caribe's president, Dr. Bernardino Flores, to fight the LCME charges of "ripoff." Flores is claiming that the AMA-AAMC monopoly on accreditation creates a conflict of interest because it constrains entrance into the "medical inner sanctum," eliminates competition, and blocks access to the profession.

The Federal Trade Commission has been investigating the LCME, and there is speculation that hearings will be held to determine if the LCME does indeed block access to the profession and if allowing an AMA–AAMC committee to accredit medical schools creates a conflict of interest.

The number of students decieved by the false claims is as yet undetermined, but Schofield speculates there may have been "hundreds."

The number of students deceived by the false claims is as yet undetermined, but Schofield speculates there may have been "hundreds." One Puerto Rican school was run by a young dentist on the fourth floor of an apartment building. Schofield said the director would not show him the classrooms or clinical facilities "because they were closed."

Career Spectrum Series Begins February 13

By Kimberly Honza

The fourth semester of the Career Spectrum Series is slated to begin this Monday, February 13, with a panel discussion on "Careers in Personnel." The Series, sponsored by the Alumni Relations Office and the Office of Career Planning and Placement, is an effort to bring together students and professionals in an informal atmosphere to exchange valuable information concerning careers.

The format for each Career Spectrum is similar. The panelists, who are often recent UVM graduates, give a short discussion on the responsibilities of their positions. The students are encouraged to ask questions concerning the job market, who to contact when applying for jobs in that particular field, and what they can do to better prepare themselves for eventual employment.

Since the start of the Series in the fall of 1976, attendance has more than doubled. Larry Simmons, director of Career Planning and Placement, praised the program. "Response from both sides has been outstanding," stated Simmons. He attributed the success of the Career Spectrum to the insight into the professions that is provided by the panelists. "People really do need good information for making job evaluations. The program provides that insight for the students," he said. The panelists for each of the Series encompass a broad range of views and responsibilities from the particular field of endeavor.

Simmons continued, "Not only do the seniors benefit from the Career Spectrums, but the freshmen, sophomores and juniors who attend can take the information they obtained into account in planning their educational programs."

It is felt that the University of Vermont is taking great strides in providing more adequate programs for students in the area of career planning. Gail Rozenthal-Newman of the Alumni Relations Office said, "In conversations with other colleges and universities, it is clear that the University of Vermont is one of the leaders in career exploration programs for students. Particularly important to the success of this program is the close co-operation of the Career Planning and Placement Office and the Alumni Office in providing students the opportunity to interact with people who obtained professional jobs upon graduation from UVM."

This semester's Career Spectrum program covers a broad range of topics from "Careers in Personnel" to "Careers in Computers and Management Information Systems." Listed below is the schedule for this semester.

Monday, February 13, 7:30 – 9:00 p.m. "Careers in Personnel

Panelists: Cindy LaWare, Employment Coordinator, Chittenden Trust Co.; Bill McKendree, Wage and Salary Office, UVM; Lee Pledger, Director of Personnel, Digital.

Monday, March 13, 3:00-5:00 p.m. "CAREERS IN HEALTH CARE ADMINISTRATION"

Panelists: William Earl, Administrator of Professional Services, MCHV; Aaron Fuchs, Health Planning, Vermont Department of Health; John Stevens, Cooperative Health Care Information Services.

Monday, March 20, 7:30-9:00 p.m. "CAREER ALTERNATIVES TO TEACHING IN THE CLASSROOM"

Panelists: Dorothy Helling, Program Coordinator, "On the Other Hand," Washington County Youth Service Bureau; Barbara McConnell, Coordinator, Consumer Education ACCESS Project; Johannes Troost, Advocate, Children's Advocacy Council; Kathy Trzaskos, Tit[illegible] Program Coordinator, Adult Education.

Monday, April 3, 7:30-9:00 p.m. "CAREER ALTERNATIVES TO MEDICAL SCHOOL"

Panelists: Dale Bernhardt, Physical Therapist, MCHV; Martha Burt, Assistant Nutritionist, UVM; Jerry Page, Vocational Rehabilitation, Burlington; Professor Larry Weed, Problem Oriented Medical Records System.

Monday, April 10, 7:30-9:00 p.m. "CAREERS IN COMPUTERS AND MANAGEMENT INFORMATION SYSTEMS"

Panelists: John LaLiberte, Systems Analyst, UVM; Arlene McLeod, Director, State Information Services; Keith Picard, Operations Manager, Academic Computing, UVM; Jim Reidy, Analyst/Geographer, Cooperative Health Care Information Systems.

All offerings take place at the Alumni Office located on 86 South Williams Street, behind Waterman. For more information contact the Alumni Office at 656-2010.

Vermont's Major Environmental Issues to Be Discussed Feb. 9

The University of Vermont will be sponsoring a discussion on the major environmental issues affecting Vermont, with a special focus on the Coyote and Bobcat at 7:30, Thursday, February 9th in Commons 216 Living/Learning Center. The talk will be given by two nationally known wildlife authorities, Ted Williams, and Toby Cooper.

Williams is a freelance environmental writer specializing in the New England Area. He lives in Grafton, Massachusetts and has had articles appear in many prominent publications throughout the U.S. He is currently a Field Correspondent for Defenders of Wildlife, the conservation magazine of the Massachusetts division of Fisheries and Wildlife as well as the Managing Editor of Gray's Sporting Journal.

Cooper is the Wildlife Creativity Director of Defenders of Wildlife in Washington, D.C. He earned his masters degree in Zoology from the University of Michigan, and later taught at Principia College in Illinois.

Cooper, an arden outdoorsman, served on the U.S. Olympic canoe team in 1968 and at the World Championships in Stockholm, Sweden in 1970. Since then, he has been a major factor in environmentally concerned litigation, legislation, and citizen action in Washington, and in many other parts of the country.

Admission will be free, and the public is welcome.

THE VERMONT PUBLIC INTEREST RESEARCH GROUP

Proposal to Charge Ratepayers for Political Advertising Challenged

A proposed decision to allow Central Vermont Public Service Corporation (CV) to charge ratepayers for the costs of political advertising has been challenged by the Vermont Public Interest Research Group, Inc. (VPIRG). Harriet King, Vermont Public Service Board's (PSB) General Counsel is responsible for the proposal decision. VPIRG and six other energy groups have argued that the distribution of a pro-nuclear pamphlet to CV's 94,000 customers two years ago should be charged to stockholders and that similar advertising should be restricted in the future.

The public interest group plans to present oral arguments to the full Board in an attempt to overturn the proposed decision by King, the Hearing Examiner for the case. "This will be the Board's first big test of consumer sentiment under Chairman Richard Saudek. If General Counsel King's proposed findings are any indication of future Board stances, ratepayers can expect the same shoddy treatment they have received from past Boards," commented VPIRG staff Energy Researcher Charles Sheketoff. King was appointed General Counsel by Board Chairman Saudek.

King's proposed findings reportedly agree with the energy groups views that the subject of nuclear power is a controversial public issue, that the brochure presented only one side of the nuclear power controversy, and that it was "political". King denied however the request that the flier be charged to stockholders and that similar political advertising be restricted in the future.

In a letter requesting oral argument before the full Board, Mary Skinner, Attorney for the seven energy groups, argued, "...the decision is nothing more than continuation of the old policy of neglect toward political advertising. If adopted, the Board will in effect be saying that petitioners are right in all their major contentions, but that they have no remedy." Concerning who should pay for political advertising costs, King suggested the issue be raised in a CV rate case. In the letter requesting oral argument, Skinner accused the Board of refusing to look into the issue in the most recent CV rate case. According to Skinner, "failure by the Board to address the substantive issues of utility advertising will result in continued erosion of public confidence in the Board."

VPIRG researcher Skeketoff noted, "Utility commissions in four states, California, Idaho, New York, and Iowa, have restricted use of bill stuffers to promote utility views on controversial issues of public importance." Other groups protesting the pro-nuclear pamphlet are the New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution, Energy Coalition of Southern Vermont, Citizens for Safe Energy, Vermont Friends of the Earth and For Land's Sake.

Vermont's Container Deposit Law Discussed in Montpelier

Vermont's container deposit law and a bill calling for (1) the sale of only standard refillable bottles, and (2) the clarification of the labeling requirements on cans, were discussed at a public meeting in Montpelier recently. The bill was opposed by representatives from brewing companies, soft drink manufacturers, and beverage distributors. Support for the bill came largely from environmental groups, including the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG).

In 1977 the bill was introduced into the House of Representatives by Reps. Stone (D-Montpelier), Lloyd (D-Weston), and Baker (R-Randolph). Adoption of the legislation would prevent alleged abuses of the container deposit law by the brewing industry. According to VPIRG, the large brewers are currently using certified "refillable" bottles that are actually crushed for recycling or dumping in landfills.

Industrial lobbyists made a concerted effort to discredit the bill's legality at the public hearing. According to the U.S. Brewers Association, the amendment's provision for the actual refilling of bottles is an unconstitutional constraint upon a private industry.

Assistant Attorney General Benson Scotch disagreed with the Brewers, stating "No unconstitutional strictures are embodied in the law, since the proposal doesn't require each individual company to refill its own bottles." He claimed that the State is only providing a strong economic incentive for the reuse of bottles.

In support of a strict container deposit law, Leigh Seddon, VPIRG's Assistant Director and environmental researcher said: "A recent survey of Vermont supermarkets showed beverages in refillable bottles were an average of 10 percent less expensive than the same brand in throwaways. A report by Rep. James Jeffords found the average Vermont family can save $60 a year by purchasing beer and soft drinks in refillable bottles."

According to Seddon, the principal environmental reason for encouraging the use of refillables is energy conservation. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has concluded that refillable bottle systems use only one quarter the energy of conventional one-way systems.

Bill Monitoring Salt Use on Vermont Highways Introduced into House

Seven members of the Vermont House's Natural Resources Committee have drafted a bill which would require the monitoring of salt in surface and ground waters along selected new and old highway routes. It would also require regulation and monitoring of salt storage by the Agency of Environmental Conservation. The bill (H.489) is sponsored by Rep. Lisle Barthlomew (R-Benson) and is supported by the Chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, Henry Carse (R-Hinesburg).

The state's controversial "bare roads" policy has continually been criticized by environmental and consumer groups. These groups allege that heavy salt use is responsible for the deterioration of drinking water quality, damage of vegetation, and automobile corrosion.

One such group, VPIRG, has called the legislation a "study bill" because they alleged it does not regulate the actual use of salt on roadways.

"It is clear that we must not only study the road salt problem, but also act on it," VPIRG's Assistant Director Leigh Seddon testified. A 1971 Minnesota bill is cited as a possible model for Vermont. It limits salting to only essential use for locations including hills, intersections, and high speed roadways, when safe traveling conditions cannot be achieved by plowing and sanding. Also, annual reports would be required of the Highway Department to be submitted to the legislature on progress and plans to reduce road salting.

The House Committee will discuss the bill next week, and then work out a final version to submit to the full House. VPIRG says it will support amendments that will reduce the amount of road salt used on Vermont's highways, which according to VPIRG, costs Vermonters $50 million.

Coal pact Action Delayed

A tentative pact that would have ended the longest coal strike in the nation's history suffered a serious setback Tuesday when the 39 member United Mine Workers Council decided to delay action on the proposal. At issue is said to be a provision that would penalize wildcat strikers by fining them $20 per day with the proceeds going into miners' benefits funds. Officers of the UMW are reportedly pleased with the 37% increase in wages and fringe benefits for miners over a three-year period.

United Mine Workers President Arnold Miller is trying to sell the council on the tentative coal strike settlement. The council must approve the agreement before it can go to the rank and file miners.

Wayne L. Horvitz, chief federal mediator, emphasized that the pact was only tentative pending approval by the bargaining council and UMW's rank and file members.

Labor Secretary Ray Marshall called the proposal "a fair contract, genuinely good for both parties."

Welfare Fraud at $20 million

HEW Secretary Joseph E. Califano told the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Welfare that a computer search in 24 states and the District of Columbia has uncovered more than thirteen thousand persons receiving federal welfare benefits in more than one state. Califano said those cases of apparent fraud cost the taxpayers at least $20 million each year.

According to Califano, the recipients were using the same social security number in two or more states and "making no attempt to hide their apparently fraudulent activity."

Califano is using the figures to promote the Carter Administration's proposal for a complete overhaul of the welfare system.

Ford sued For $127 million

Ford Motor Company has been ordered to pay $127.8 million to Richard Grimshaw, 18, for damages he received when the gas tank of a 1972 Pinto exploded. Grimshaw suffered burns over 95% of his body and has had 52 operations since the accident with approximately 20 more operations expected.

According to Grimshaw's attorney Mark P. Robinson, Ford knew about the faulty tanks but didn't fix them because it would cost about $10 per car.

Ford denied having any knowledge of the faulty tank. The automobile manufacturer is expected to appeal the decision which was reached by a jury at the Orange County Superior Court in Santa Ana, California.

Canal treaty Gains Support

On the eve of debate over the Panama Canal Treaty, Senate backers are stepping up their efforts to pick up the votes they need to win. One Republican opponent of the treaty, Ted Stevens of Alaska, says he's had calls from former President Gerald Ford and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, both urging passage of the treaty.

A two-thirds majority is needed in the Senate for passage of any treaty. The number of Senators who have indicated support for the treaty is far short of the 67 needed for passage.

Ex-agent Appeal Denied

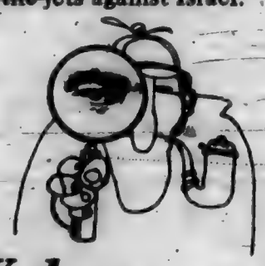
In a close vote Tuesday the Dutch Parliament voted 76 to 68 to prevent former CIA agent Philip Agee from appealing his expulsion from the Netherlands. Agee, whose book about covert CIA activities brought him to worldwide attention, has also been kept out of Britain, France, and West Germany.



The Dutch government says Agee's activities which include a second book about the CIA could endanger Dutch relations with other countries.

Sadat Seeking Support

Stating that he was no longer shy Egyptian President Anwar Sadat was on Capitol Hill Tuesday asking for new U.S. weapons to offset other African nations that have Soviet weapons.

The Administration and Congress are presently weighing Sadat's request to buy short range jets from the U.S. If the deal does go through, it would be the United States' first major weapons sale to Egypt.

Supporters of Israel have raised the possibility that the weapons would ultimately be used against the Jewish State, but Sadat says he has chosen the path of peace and would never use the jets against Israel.

Webster Nears OK As FBI chief

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted Tuesday to recommend Senate confirmation of Federal judge William Webster as FBI Director. If approved by the full Senate, Webster will succeed retiring director Clarence Kelley. The judge had told the committee that he would keep some of Kelley's policies, particularly his emphasis on searching out white collar and organized crime.

Webster would become the third former Federal Appeals Court judge in a top Justice Department position. Attorney General Griffin Bell is one, as is Solicitor General Wade McCree.

The committee vote was 10 to 0 in favor of recommendation.

Carter Okays Student aid

The President is soon expected to announce a new program for increased federal aid to college students. The proposal, expected to cost nearly 1.2 billion dollars, is designed to increase eligibility for government scholarships to students from families with gross incomes in the 25,000 dollar range. It will also expand eligibility to those with incomes up to $40,000.

Vietnam Wants Peace talks

The government of Vietnam has called for peace talks to begin "at once" between the two warring governments of Hanoi and Phnom Penh, the capitol of Cambodia. The Cambodians have not responded to the request and continue to report incursions across their borders by Vietnamese troops.

Reportedly, Vietnam has asked the United Nations to support the plan. The Voice of Vietnam, monitored in Thailand, says Hanoi has sent Secretary-General Waldheim a letter asking him to press for early negotiations.

The broadcast says similar urgings went out for the first time to individual U.N. members not aligned with either the Communist or non-Communist bloc. Vietnam is calling for an immediate ceasefire with Cambodia, followed by internationally supervised peace talks. Both nations are Communist ruled.

Fragment Of Satellite Found Radioactive

Two scientists from Canada's Atomic Energy Control Board removed a highly radioactive fragment of the Soviet satellite, Cosmos 954, from the snow-covered ice in the Northwest Territories of Canada on Sunday.

The thin, flat piece of metal measured about 3 inches wide and 30 inches long and emited a strong, hazardous radiation. Geiger-counter readings exceeded 100 roentgens per hour making this fragment the "hottest" satellite debris found so far by the joint Canadian-American effort, Operation Morning Light, to recover fragments from the first serious accident involving a space-borne nuclear reactor.

Nicaraguan Strike Continues

A national strike aimed at ousting President Anastasio Somoza continues in Nicaragua. The repressive Somoza heads a distatorship in the Latin American country of 2.5 million persons, a country his family has ruled for the last 45 years. Municipal elections held Sunday were boycotted nationwide with Somoza's opponents claiming turnout rather than results would indicate what support remains for the president.

The present turmoil in Nicaragua began on January 10 with the assassination of opposition newspaper publisher Pedro Joaquin Chasmorro.

Galaxy 5:Intergalactic War

By Henry Chamberlain

Back in the year 7190 A.C. (After Planetary Colonization) Galaxy five finally resolved a most sensitive political problem in the Mentauri solar system. The problem had been created by the Second Intergalactic War which terminated in 7145 A.C. For posterity, here is a recounting of the resolution of that problem.

During the Second Intergalactic War, which was waged directly by the Eindle, Etunis, and Rikva solar systems, a race of people, the Dyons, were subjected to incredible inhumanity. It was decided that a homeland should be set aside for these people. That homeland was the planet Istern, the year 7148. The planet, located in the Mentauri solar system, possessed three moons which subsequently would become important.

Immediately, the residents of the neighboring inhabited planets (Egoft, Syond, and Jongbi) were outraged. They all had an interest in Istern as well as in its three moons, which each controlled one of. Added to this, the ideology of the Dyons was incompatible with that of its neighbors. Two interplanetary wars erupted, one in 7148 and the other in 7156. Both of those wars were victories for the Isternian star force, which was far superior to its opponents.

Tensions were precarious when the Third Interplanetary War erupted in 7167. This war was a complete rout for the Isternian star force. In only six solar days, the Isternian forces had defeated the combined forces of Egoft, Syond, and Jongbi. However, this time there was a difference, Istern occupied the three moons as fortunes of war and as strategic areas for its self-defense. This situation further complicated the prospects for an eventual resolution of hostilities.

The residents of the occupied area, the Palies, were displaced into compounds by the Isternians. This just added to the complexity of the political situation there. In 7173, the Fourth Interplanetary Conflict, which was more destructive than the previous three, resulted in no political changes in the area. The emotional and psychological scars resulting from the inability of the three planets to regain their lost territory heightened hostility.

As physically and politically the Palies had no power, small extremist groups resorted to terrorism against Istern. A back and forth conflict ensued which only increased the animosities present. The planet Ulsta, the declining power of Galaxy 5, tried to aid in reaching a settlement by involving itself in an interplanetary shuttle diplomacy. Unfortunately, all of the parties were too fixed in their positions, and nothing came of the effort.

Then in 7177, the ruler of Egoft, Tadas, went to the Isternian assembly in a personal attempt at a settlement. While a gallant and commendable effort, the mission was doomed to failure. One of the conditions set for a permanent peace was that Istern return control of the three moons. This was not acceptable as Istern had begun to build settlements on the three moons, and had no intention of withdrawing from the occupied moons.

However, time was catching up with the Isternians. By 7185, the power structure of Galaxy 5 had changed. No longer was Ulsta, which had historically supported Istern, the dominant power. To the contrary, the mining planets Iruf and Samdu Arafdi were dominant. Ulsta was economically dependent upon those planets to supply much of its raw material needs. As a result, its political influence was waning.

Additionally, those two planets were ideologically aligned with the Egoftian position. Thus, in 7190 Iruf and Samdu Afafdi demanded the return of the three moons to their previous rulers in return for the acceptance of the sovereign integrity of Istern. As the situation was a hopeless one for the Isternians without the aid of Ulsta, they agreed to the peace terms, and tranquility returned after a 42 year absence.

In retrospect, the Mentauri situation should be viewed as a lesson to the future of galactic foreign policy. As a result of the Second Intergalactic War, the dominant planetary powers decided to create a homeland for an oppressed people, the Dyons. This was accomplished by giving the planet Istern to the Dyons, irregardless of the pre-existing political situation in the Mentauri solar system. By introducing and supporting an incompatible culture in the solar system, the dominant powers led by Ulsta rendered the area politically unstable for decades, not to mention the suffering which was endured by the people affected. The Dyonian problem should have been resolved by the powers where they lived, not in a foreign area. Hopefully, a situation such as this will never be allowed to occur again.

"Tensions were precarious when the third interplanetary war erupted in 7167. This was a complete rout of the Isternian star force. In only six solar days, the Isternian forces had defeated the combined forces of of Egot, Syond, and Jongbi"

Shelburne Road Not Into Quarter Pounder People

By Scott Sartorius

The South Burlington Zoning Board rejected a request by the McDonald's Corp. to construct a restaurant on Shelburne Rd. earlier this week. The rejection came as a result of the feeling that existing traffic conditions on the road are dangerous now, and that a new McDonald's would only make these conditions worse.

Anyone who has ever ventured down Shelburne Rd. will no doubt testify to the fact that traffic there is frequently congested and even during the off-hours can present a motorist with a frustrating experience. The frequency of traffic lights one encounters does to the blood pressure what alcohol does to the brain – makes it high. Combine with this the usually large number of motorists who consistently find themselves in the wrong lane and also the shopping utopias such as K-Mart or Grand Way which present some rather interesting intersections and bizarre traffic light schemes, and you end up with collective chaos.

While the move by the Zoning Board is to be applauded, providing it does not get overturned for some strange reason, a number of interesting questions arise as to why such large-scale strip development has been allowed to proceed up until now. Why was the McDonald's construction disallowed when similar establishments such as Sambo's, Pizza Hut, and Bonanza Sirloin Pit have all been quite legally erected – and closer to Burlington than the proposed McDonald's – within the past year? Was it deemed these establishments would have less of an impact on the traffic than the McDonald's? Or was the McDonald's request denied because the road has now reached its capacity?

Not only does there seem to be tremendous inconsistency on the planning of Shelburne Road, but it seems that up until now the Zoning Board has been evaluating the situation blindfolded.

Even someone such as myself, a native of New Jersey who has had to do battle with developments such as the Bergen Mall or the Garden State Plaza, becomes extremely frustrated when confronted with the way in which Shelburne Road is designed. Examples: lights that aren't staggered properly, left lanes that become left-turn lanes, right lanes that become exit ramps, and countless vehicles forced to make a left turn against two lanes of oncoming traffic without a middle lane to do it from. Actually, this latter example of people popping out from hidden driveways and exiting into them is one of the major problems. And it all relates back to the seemingly uncontrolled development that has taken place in that area.

A thought that often wanders through my head is: What were they thinking when they allowed two shopping malls to be built across the street from one another? When they allowed more restaurants than one can count to be built in such a short span?

I certainly hope this strip development has increased employment significantly and also increased the financial well-being of the city, because it has given commuters and everyone else forced to travel the road ulcers.

While it is heartening to hear that the traffic situation is now being scrutinized, one wonders why it took so long. For Ronald McDonald, it was not a good week.

Having lived in South Burlington and having driven on Shelburne Road for a year, I can sympathize with all those people doing it now. The only real savior was Spear Street or the "backroads expressway" to UVM. But now I'm living in Williston and have to use Williston Road... ugh! Well, that's another story altogether.

Vermont Highways

done." The Vermont public advocacy group claimed that out of $110 million of promised projects, only $10 million have been built. Furthermore, VPIRG argued that local desires are not always respected. Seddon gave the instance of the creation of a new $5 million road in Colchester-Milton. The town of Colchester had twice voted against the new road, and even sent the town selectmen to Montpelier to stop construction, all in vain. This road was first planned by the Highway Dept. in 1960, and work on the new road is scheduled to begin in 1979. "Clearly," Seddon said, "the spirit and intent of local control was paved over." But according to Crisman, "It is impossible to plan a highway project for a given year because so much preparation is required."

"If I were you, I wouldn't take that road to Burlington," the farmer told the tourist. "They've got enough roads in Burlington."

Another recent struggle has been brewing over the location of Burlington's Northern and Southern Connectors. Reportedly, the multi-million dollar connectors will reduce traffic congestion on North Avenue and Shelburne Road, and provide greater access to downtown Burlington. Arguments have been heated over the proposed destruction of 18 homes, bisecting a wildlife habitat on the Lakefront, and the building of new roads and bridges. If site designs are approved late this year, construction of the Connectors might begin by 1980.

These and other examples of upcoming road building projects lead one to question how and when the Highway Dept. will indeed emphasize the maintenance of existing roads. "Transportation is so important to our lives, we take it for granted," Crisman said. "We are a road-oriented state, probably more so than most states; even mass transit to us means roads."

One wonders if the Highway Dept. was listening to former Governor Deane Davis when he said, "Vermont is a small state that already has too much concrete. It is time we began to be concerned about the limited amount of space we have left. We shouldn't contribute to highways. We should contribute to the quality of life in Vermont."

In nearly all fields of public and private life, forecasting and predicting have become increasingly unreliable; the greatest source of uncertainty is, of course, the future supply and cost of energy. One fact which does not stir confidence points to known world oil reserves of 30 to 40 years. The specire of dwindling oil supplies, fewer cars, nearly abandoned roads conjures up a nightmare we would rather not consider. Instead, it is easier and more reassuring to look at immediate transportation problems over which we feel we at least have some control.

Join us for three weeks of high excitement.
Sure, we'll teach you basic wilderness skills.
But the point is, we'll teach you how to cope with life wherever you live.
You can learn you have the power to do almost anything you really want to do. Surprising, this new self-confidence.
All this we call "survival." And it might just last you a lifetime.

The Student Association

Going . . . Going . . . Where ?!

Following accelerated student activism during the Vietnam Era during the mid 1970's, college campus student governments were expected not only to responsibly fulfill their administrative duties, but also to voice controversial political opinion. Recent campus surveys, however, have revealed a growing trend of student apathy. Attempts to reconcile these two conflicting attitudes may well result in vague policies and widespread dissatisfaction, and in essence, this is the situation currently facing UVM's Student Association.

IS THERE A DIRECTION?

Recent criticism launched at the present S.A. administration centers on discontent with its leadership and whether S.A. President Geoff Liggett is actually giving any direction to the body. Liggett, however, claims this year's direction was more of a "house cleaning act," and he has concentrated on "internal kinds of things."

In support of his contention, Liggett commands the praise of many notables, including that of UVM President Coor: "...I give high marks to the Student Association. I have a great sense of credibility about them... I believe that when they tell me things, they have given a lot of thought to them; that they've talked with a number of students and that they do reflect concerns that are on the students' minds."

Senator Peter Corbett concurred; "Geoff's doing a good job. There's quite a lot of work involved and he's up there quite a bit. The fact that there are needed areas of improvement don't reflect on Geoff because that's the way it was before he got there. I think it's getting better and better all the time. People are really working hard there."

In addition, Liggett drew numerous words of praise for his Student Legal Service (SLS) program, which will help students with off-campus housing problems. The proposal, researched throughout last summer, is a premier accomplishment of the Liggett administration. "Basically, it will be an informal referral service," Liggett said.

Two S.A. senators have complimented Liggett specifically for his activity with student subsidized programs: His administration was called "dedicated" by Senator Jill Heath, and Senator Jesse Gadson said, "He's doing a heck of a job for what he considers an S.A. President should do."

Unquestionably, various senators disagree with Liggett's direction of internal stabilization, and question whether or not "house cleaning" constitutes a direction. Senator Knut Ronstad, defeated by Liggett in last year's presidential elections, said, "An overall weakness this year would be a lack of purpose. When I think of all the people involved, I don't think there is one generally understood purpose as a representative body. That has to be fundamental. I guess that comes from the lack of leadership that Geoff, Linda, and Larry have provided – a rather laissez-faire way of going about things, letting the senators or the committee chairpersons take the initiative. But as a result of that, there is no sense of purpose for what the different committees in the S.A. as a whole are doing... People criticize the S.A. for not having any influence or as much power as student governments are supposed to have. I don't think it's because it's not potentially there, I just think it's not being exercised."

Senator Helen Pelzman, added: "Geoff and Linda work hard, but there are certain responsibilities that have to be respected and there's an attitude you have to adopt... They're not accessible, they're really not."

THE SENATE

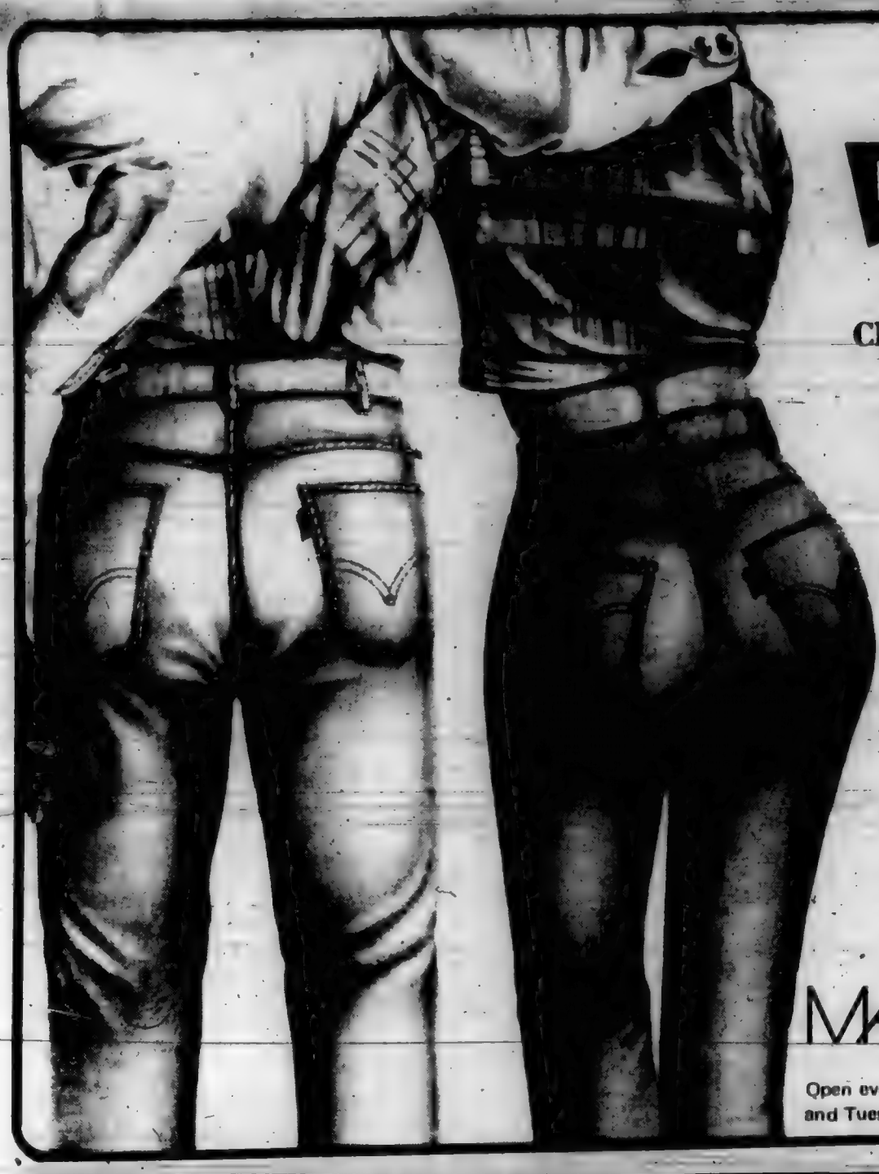
The leadership and activity of this year's S.A. Senate is another controversial matter. Undoubtedly, projects are surfacing. Chairman Rob Smith recently explained: "There were some real positive alternative ideas that came up in the Student Action Committee last semester. The food coop, the alternative dorm, student research teams, students on the Board of Aldermen. I thought it was going to be the same old stuff, like the Rathskeller Bill – which has been kicking for three years, add-drop, and the bookstore. There was pretty good cohesion within the senate." Additionally, most senators feel their effort played a role in the failure of the Cahn-Kitcher proposal. Senator Heath said, "I have really high hopes for this semester. I think we're moving forward in a very positive direction, and I'm excited about it."



The senate election processes and the co-ordinating and directing of senate committees, a duty of the president, are all under considerable fire. Heath, despite her optimistic view of the S.A., noted: "Geoff's trying very, very hard working between committees, but sometimes we need that co-ordination a little bit more."

"A problem of the S.A. Senate," commented Gadson, "is that we don't have a direction, an arrow. If we do, only a few people know that direction... That's a problem but it wouldn't be a problem if at least I knew the issues of the committees..." Rather emotionally, Gadson continued: "I can see issues; but as a whole, I can't see what direction we're moving in. Is there a problem in not seeing direction? Yes, because there's a lack of leadership, we do overlapping work, and we don't know what's going on. I feel bad that I can't answer questions, I feel very bad..."

Reflecting a perceptual contrast to Heath and Gadson, Special Affairs Committee Chairman John Martin stated that coordination between committees was going "very well," and cited the executive meetings, group discussions by committee heads, to support his contention. "One problem is that senators don't know what's going on, but I think that is good to one degree, because they have so little time to do what they do. That way, they'll be working on something but they won't be overlapping, because the committee chairman knows what's going on. It's running fairly well."

Liggett's Campaign Platform

JUDGE HIM NOW AND THEN

The following is an edited version of Geoff Liggett's 1977 campaign platform, followed by his current stand on each particular position. Due to their resolution or non-applicability (Sue Jo Perkins, Liggett's Vice Presidential running mate last spring, lost her election. It would be unfair to hold Liggett responsible for issues his running mate had expressed would be her immediate concerns, not Geoff's) the following articles have been deleted from the list: Varsity Recognition for Lacrosse, Baseball, Gymnastics; Closer Ties with Academic Committees; Gym Use Mockery; and Input for Class Officers.

FORMAL STUDENT INPUT INTO TENURE

March 1977: "At present, the tenuring process at UVM is a mess. There exists no concrete systematic process by which tenure is granted. As it now stands, the tenuring process relies as much on the whims of the individual departments and colleges as it does upon the merits of the candidates themselves. Dr. Coor recently said the tenuring process should be "more rigourous" and is currently seeking to set up a more consistent approach. A formal student role should be established in the selection of those to be tenured. Let's retain the faculty from whom we learn. Let's work with them."

February 1978: "Tenure is one of the most amazing quagmires once you get into it... You're fighting with tradition of what a university is... Today things are changing much more... Students are demanding a greater part of their education, and rightly so... I think there's probably two ways the students can play a part in tenure: one is an effective student evaluation... The other part is to have a student sit on the Academic Affairs Committee... I don't think they are totally confident of students' judgment; that is, judgment as in regards to confidentiality. I disagree. I think students can be found to sit on that committee who can be very mature, who can understand, and can add a vital role to that committee by looking at that teaching aspect even more than the faculty would... I think we have to do more work in trying to convince them that there definitely is a necessary role."

Note: In a recent Cynic interview, UVM President Coor stated: "The faculty has spent a lot of time designing and perfecting the role of the Faculty Affairs Committee into looking into individual tenure cases. I think that's a system that should remain as it is right now because it's working so well."

Coor continued that the university is in an "intermediary stage" of general assessment. When the fundamental question of tenure – "How should teaching be evaluated?" – arises, Coor said, "The answer should have student input."

HOUSING AND TENANT'S SERVICES

March 1977: "We need a coordinated off-campus housing program. We need more housing at less cost and a tenant service for our off-campus students. Along these lines we propose a tenant's service to handle student complaints and problems. Services should include placement and legal advice. The S.A. should provide legal counsel to students faced with such problems."

February 1978: "Right now the interns, or the directors of the Student Legal Service, are going through seminars with a lawyer that we have and we're hoping to open in about ten days (from February 3)."

LEGISLATIVE RELATIONS

March 1977: "The S.A. has been fortunate to develop a rapport with the Vermont legislature. It is a rapport that should be nurtured and maintained as many issues, such as appropriations which affect tuition, confront the state. The S.A. should cooperate with the House and Senate committees and actively lobby for its concerns."

February 1978: "Right now we're looking at Rathskeller and a small claims court bill. I didn't want to spend another $4,000 on a lobbyist, I didn't think it was that vital...

I'm not sure that we can't lobby with the university. It seemed to me that we might have had some conflicting interests with the university when we were going down last year fighting for our Trustee Bill.

For sure we are not as active as we were, we don't have a full-time lobbist. We have an interest in the Rathskeller Bill but we also have confidence because there are a lot of other people sponsoring that bill. It just didn't appear that we would have to spend as much money, or energy, to get this through... I'm pretty confident the bill will pass and we will have a Rathskeller here at UVM. I think it will be another year before they find a place where we can have it."

elections are under attack from nearly every branch of the S.A. The fact that senators do not take office until late September leaves the obvious problem that a month of the semester has not been utilized. The September date is a constitutional law, however, and a formal constitution Revision Amendment would require a formal all-campus ballot.

The quality of senators who are elected is another consideration of any senate assessment. Senator Corbett said, "There is a lack of motivation in some of the senators which may be blamed on the students, because if they don't take an interest in who's elected, then how the hell can we be held responsible?... I would say two-thirds of the senators are good, hard working people. Without being specific, there are five or six people who just don't show up at any meetings. Last semester I saw a senator's mailbox with mail that hadn't been picked up for two months. The senatorial elections could be better run so the students are aware of the mechanicals. One possibility would be that each candidate is required to put out a flyer or something. There are people who run for senator to be able to put it on their resume, and that pisses me off..."

The fact that students run for senate strictly for the resume also upset Gadson: "I feel the S.A. is like a little clique – few people are involved in a lot of things. I like working in the S.A. – it's informative, you meet people, and it gives you a chance to grow. But as far as being a cohesive group, that's a question."

Attack on Liggett's performance also surfaced in his handling of the senate. Pelzman notes, "There is really a lack of leadership – leadership in terms of organizing the senators around something – anything. Unfortunately, we've lacked the organization; we've lacked the cohesiveness. I don't think that people took themselves too seriously. It's almost ironic in a sense, the fact that we had so many people running for office last semester, but it turned out to be a popularity contest." Martin commented: "One problem I see (with working in the senate) is the time factor. Because some senators are taking eighteen credits, they don't have the time to put in. What I'd like to see – and it would be forthcoming – is credit for being an S.A. Senator and having it all regimented when they'd be in the office, and doing projects." Corbett further pointed out the drawback of a yearly personnel change in S.A. He also added, "Something that's going to start clicking will be in the next month or two because we have all of our ideas focused on the problems, or the things we sense as problems."

REACTION TO STUDENT APATHY

A most frustrating emotion for any organization is a lack of response for its efforts. Various S.A. senators have different opinions on the lack of student response to S.A. drives held during the year. Martin noted the problem of getting students to General Assembly meetings: Is it student apathy? Do they not care? Are they too busy to care? Are they just not interested? I would say that 95% of the student body is on the border line of not being interested. I would say 50% of the student body doesn't know who the vice president is. Is it the student's fault, or our fault?

Rob Smith recently announced plans for the Communications Committee members to attend dorm meetings for feedback and answers to student questions. "The senators didn't get to their constituency as well as they should, on campus as well as off," he conceded.

Senator Mike McKinney said, "We don't have that many students who come in with ideas. I don't know if it's the time commitment or they're just afraid of getting involved in anything. Maybe they really just don't care... Most of the students are content with going to classes, partying, and that's about it. I don't see how S.A. can help these people, because they don't want to do anything. There's no way you can make anybody do anything if they're not really interested and don't want to do it."

RECOMMENDATIONS AND RETROSPECT

Those who chose to criticize the S.A. generally followed these remarks with subtle criticism of the Cynic, the major publishing media service at UVM.

"I think for the last year and one half the S.A. has been lucky that there hasn't been the "investigative reporter" type from the Cynic to sort of keep tabs up here," said Ronstad. "There was almost nothing ever critical of Frank Cioffi (last year's S.A. President) and I think there are a number of areas where some constructive criticism might be very valuable... There is no real check, not even an indirect check on the performance of the Student Association.", Gadson simply reiterated Ronstad's statement and added, "Any governing body needs a watchdog... the Student Association doesn't have anybody to push them."

Current senior Ronstad also had a recommendation for improving the strength of the student voice on campus: "Although they may be involved in different purposes, if there were some co-ordination between all the different committees of the Student Association, the Advisory Committee to the Dean and to the different departments. I think there is enough of a common ground and a basic purpose that if the Student Association President and executive branch set their minds to coordinating these committees, I think the impact would be enormous."

Despite criticism, S.A. has steadfastly held to its original policy. Treasurer Larry Landry said: "Our problem this year is our projects have been smaller in scope... We're working on productivity and quality things that you don't see as easily; like the Concert Bureau functioning better because students worked at it last semester, WRUV running efficiently; the last general assembly meeting was the best attended one in two years... We're moving toward in-house changes that make us work better as an organization, and those things aren't detectable as easily."

"This senate, more than any I've seen in three years, has been together... We've gotten real good people, and they've made the effort...that, in the long run, will prove that we really weren't asleep at the wheel after all."

Vice President Linda Purdy recently explained her interpretation of the political duties of the S.A.: "There's quite a few people who come up to me and say "Tell them what you think," "Make them mad if you want, but they'll notice and say that's the Student Association." I don't know if that is appropriate for us to do. I don't know if we're that much of a political being. I think three-fourths of what the Student Association does is collecting fees and providing services and organizations. The other part is the governing body. There are a lot of issues to consider, and there's just a lot of general management and services that are provided."

Hence, the S.A. apparently feels a sense of accomplishment in their goals, while at the same time, the leadership has received criticism from within the organization itself. Ironically the most important issue, student apathy, still continues to emerge as one of the main unsolved problems of UVM's student body. Any solution to this problem, among others, may not be soon forthcoming.

'I think the S. A. could be very valuable in making our services aware more to the students.'

Geoff Liggett

WOMEN'S REFERRAL CENTER

March 1977: "A referral center to house resources and information for women is grossly necessary. The now-established women's organization on campus is integral, purposeful and deals with various issues. It should be complemented by a referral line whose sole purpose is to disseminate information to all women."

February 1978: "One of the biggest problems at UVM is trying to get it out to UVM, out to the community. Their biggest problem is probably publicity. I just don't think enough people know about them... Once accepted, I think the idea (of a woman's referral center) is good, and it will do better as years go on. They're just going to have to rough it until they can establish themselves and more people become aware of the service."

Note: Dana Gallagher of the Women's Referral Center, recently said: "I feel that S.A. has supported us and yet they haven't. Where do you draw from when you're a fledging organization, trying to get your roots in the ground, and you don't know where S.A. stands? That's really scary for us... If we had a bigger budget, I would use it for a phone because we're trying to do a lot of our own referrals, but we can't make contacts with agencies and people can't get to us."

COORDINATION WITH IRA

March 1977: "While a direct line to on-campus students, the Inter-Residence Association develops and coordinates campus social activities. We feel IRA's efforts could be supplemented by instituting a "liaison" between IRA and S.A. IRA should be wholly autonomous, but it is foolish to compete with IRA when by talking with the IRA reps at their regular meetings we can coordinate our activities and share resources. Such a cooperation should be implemented."

February 1978: "Probably I think we can get together on some things that concern on-campus students – probably more than we've done. But I see now, after a half a year, that the things they're concerned with are distinctly different enough that a great deal of joint things isn't really – it's feasible, but I don't think it's really realistic. I think they're doing OK as an autonomous organization, with our helping each other on certain ventures."

Note: IRA President Charles Clark expressed two concerns with the present S.A.–IRA relationship: "There should be more co-ordination with regular meetings. I'm concerned with this only starting this week (S.A. President notified Clark last Friday (2/3) that an S.A. representative would henceforth attend IRA meetings) because I think it is coming from outside pressure instead of being an internal decision." Clark's other concern involved the IRA's removal from the Billings Center, in favor of the new Student Legal Service (SLS) office: "Even though the Billings Governing Board is responsible for running Billings Center, I'm concerned with it becoming more a Student Association Center, and not a center for all student organizations."

IMPROVED ADVISING AND CAREER PLANNING

March 1977: "We need a more aggressive career coordinating program to not only gear students toward a degree, but to also recommend courses and extra-curricular activities in preparation for a career...

Advising must be centralized. ARC, Career Planning and Placement, and Counselling and Testing need to pull together..."

February 1978: "We saw the advising and career planning as really understaffed and it wasn't being done that well. Knowing that you can't move a mountain, I'd say they got off to a good start. This summer they hired an extra person to help get programs started for undergraduates... As for academic advising, they're moving pretty slow. They had a program where I think somewhere in the neighborhood of 20-50 professors stayed in the summer during orientation and got oriented themselves on being an effective advisor, and understanding student's problems. I think they're going to do that a little at a time... I could be wrong but that is my impression."

Note: Concerning their relationship with S.A. Counseling and Testing Center Chairman Richard Does commented; "...I think the S.A. could be very valuable in making our services aware more to the students. At the present time, it is not what I would call a well-developed linkage, and I think probably most of the influence is erratic and for the most part unplanned."

Ridin' That Train...

Cocaine: The Cadillac Of Drugs

By Lesley Wassmuth

Cocaine – often labeled "the Cadillac of drugs," was once thought of as a unique characteristic of musicians, movie stars and the elegantly chic. Not anymore. To the delight of some and shock of others, cocaine is regularly bought and used generously by thousands of Americans. "Cocaine is as popular today as marijuana was several years ago," says one dealer. Undoubtedly, its popularity has yet to reach its peak.

Cocaine is expensive and illegal. An estimated 4.8 million Americans have tried it and according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the cocaine traffic has easily become a billion dollar-a-year business. Known by such nicknames as "snow," "flake," "blow," "C", "white girl," and of course "coke" – it costs between $1,200 and $2,500 an ounce at street prices, depending on purity. Today, more cocaine is being smuggled into the states than ever before, and police estimate they seize as little as ten percent of the supply.

Penalties for sale or possession of cocaine of even the smallest amount are harsh. Cocaine ranks third on the DEA's list of law-enforcement priorities for dangerous drugs, preceeded by heroine and amphetamines, barbituates and hallucinogens, and is followed by marijuana. To date, authorities have determined cocaine is not a narcotic, is not addictive, and causes no withdrawal symptoms. Taken in moderation, cocaine probably causes no significant mental or physical damage. In fact, numerous researchers have concluded that it can be safer than liquor and cigarettes when used discriminately. Last year a judge in Massachusetts ruled that since cocaine is not a dangerous narcotic drug, a state law prohibiting its possession was unconstitutional. Today there is growing pressure to lessen the penalties for its use.

The cocaine powder itself is made from the leaves of the coca plant, which grows in the Andean valleys of South America. The fact that coca was termed the "divine" plant has led to the notion that the Incas worshipped the coca leaf. W. G. Mortimer, the great historian of coca, writes that during the Inca period the coca shrub was looked upon as "a living manifestation of divinity." He also argued that although the Incas revered coca, they did not worship it. It was considered the greatest of all natural products and as such was offered in their sacrifices. Ordinary people legally obtained coca only as a reward for merited service, such as performing errands for the nobility or as a reward to victors in athletic contests. Perhaps the strangest way in which coca was used as a "gift" was when it was presented to sacrificial victims. It was, and still is, believed by the natives that if the sacrificial victim was able to perceive the taste of the coca leaves pressed against his mouth, his soul would go to paradise. It took centuries before cocaine finally found its way into Western European society.

In 1886, an Atlanta, Ga., pharmacist named John Pemberton mixed cocaine and coffee in a syrup which he eventually named Coca-Cola. Coca-Cola contained coke until 1903, when the company complied with the new Food and Drug Act by removing the drug. Chemists at the U.S. Customs office still analyze random samples of Coca-Cola to make sure that all traces of cocaine have been removed.

There are many ways of taking cocaine. It can be dissolved in water, sprinkled into drinks or dabbed onto a cigarette and smoked. It can be burned and the fumes inhaled, or like heroin, it can be taken intravenously. Most often it is sniffed (snorted in the dialect of the cocaine culture), and at times the ritual seems as important as the drug itself. The cocaine powder is poured onto a clean flat, non-porous surface, often a mirror to make it easier to see each granule. Using a razor blade, the powder is divided into "lines," often with undeniable precision. Then, using anything from a plastic straw (the coke granules would stick to a paper straw), to rolled-up bills, the coke is inhaled through the nose.

The refining of cocaine is quite a tedious and complicated procedure. Basically, it can be broken into three separate stages; from coca leaves to crude cocaine, from crude cocaine to rock, and from rock to flake. Once the pure cocaine is in the hands of a dealer, it is inevitably "stepped on." This is usually done by mixing it with substances such as lactose, detrose or quinine. On the average, a supply purchased from a dealer will contain about ten to 20 per cent cocaine. Yet these altered dosages can then be resold at astounding profits.

Storing cocaine is very easy. A well-closed container is all that is necessary to preserve the potency of cocaine. (Water dissolves cocaine and water is present in the air). Factually speaking, the myth that a light-resistant container and refrigeration are necessary for proper storage is just that – a myth. A light-resistant container is usually advised because it is standard practice in storing drugs. However, it would take several years of exposure to sunlight to measurably affect cocaine's potency.

Refrigeration is also unnecessary. According to a Drug Enforcement Agency chemist, pharmaceutical cocaine was still 98 per cent pure after standing on a shelf for four years. Apart from exposure to air, about the only way potency can be reduced over a short period of time is when the refining process has been done sloppy and all the sodium carbonate has not been removed. Cocaine is a very stable compound and none of the known cuts affect its life expectancy.

Despite the medical evidence that cocaine is a relatively harmless substance, the popular view is still that sniffing it can be dangerous to one's health. Thus, there is little likelihood that Federal laws will be revised in the immediate future. One thing is certain – the cocaine culture is sure to continue its growth and popularity in coming years and will more than likely hit a new high.

"The cocaine powder is poured onto a clean flat, non-pourous surface, often a mirror to make easier to see each granule. Using a rasor blade, the powder is divided into 'lines', often with undeniable precision."

The Great (Salty) White Challenge

By Curtis Haynes

Is your car weeping rust this winter? If so, one reason may be that your car is picking up road salt. Vermont has a policy of maintaining safe roads and bare roads, if possible, and salt has been the major ingredient. VPIRG estimates that road salting, particularly corrosion to motor vehicles, costs Vermonters over $50 million a year.

Salt (sodium chloride NaCl and Calcium Chloride CaCl to chemists) is the most common and most controversial snow melting chemical. All winter Highway Department crews in huge trucks work long hours dumping tons of dirty white, coarse salt and freeze resistant blue salt on Vermont's 2900 miles of state highways. Roadsalting is a multi-million dollar a year business. The quantity of salt applied annually to U.S. roads has doubled every six years since 1947, amounting to about 12 million tons in 1976. With a current average price of $20 a ton, the national salt bill is around $240 million, not to mention application costs. Many highway departments in pursuit of a bare roads policy, overuse salt for expediency and convenience rather than for efficiency, or economy. A mixture one part calcium chloride and two parts sodium chloride is spread in doses of 200 to 600 pounds per mile of two lane highway. Salt applications are heaviest at intersections, on hills, and in towns. In fact, town roads receive twice the salt doses on state highways. Burlington uses about 26.6 tons of salt per lane mile, one of the heaviest loads in the country!

Vermont Transportation Secretary Ronald Crisman said that 20% less salt is being used on state roads this year. Instead, "we mix 50 to 100 pounds of salt in a ton of sand to help it stick to the road." After a severe snowstorm last December, the Highway Department spread 6000 tons of salt in one week, the highest since 1972. Even so, Secretary Crisman received complaints for not using enough salt! Crisman cautioned that applying salt during a snowstorm is often worthless because plows come along and push the salt off the road, and then another salting becomes necessary.

But is salt really safe? According to Dr. Julian Walker, Professor of Community Medicine at UVM, highway fatalities are at their lowest from January to March. Accident files from Orange County, Vt. reveal that overall accident rates seem to increase with greater salt use! This may be true because salt splatters on windshields, smears, and blocks visibility. And sometimes salt actually decreases friction between tires and the road. Crisman pointed out that salt is ineffective below 15 degrees Fahrenheit and can act like ball bearings making the road more slippery. Also, in cold temperatures, salt turns snow to the consistency of heavy grease. In a 1976 study, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) concluded, "The link between salt and safety has not been proved."

Burlington, Mass. stopped road salting three years ago and the number of fatal accidents has since decreased. Commenting on salt and safety, Richard McLaughlin, Massachusetts Secretary of Public Safety, remarked, "Snowy roads cause an increased number of minor accidents, but definitely tend to reduce crash fatalities."

Salt is ineffective below 15 F and can act like ball bearings making the road more slippery.

'Snowy roads cause an increased number of minor accidents , but definitely tend to reduce crash fatalities.'

THE ENVIRONMENTAL COSTS

Some environmental effects of road salt are obvious; some are not. Roadsides of withered grass and dying trees illustrate the toll of saltwater run-off. Maples, elms, and pines are highly susceptible to salt damage as are young trees within 60 feet of the road. Salt sprays upon branches and buds, or else leeches through the soil into the tree's root system. Salt injured trees show many symptoms of drought-stricken trees: twigs falling off, stunted growth, leaf scorch, and eventual death. Salt is also damaging to road concrete and severely corrodes bridges. More salt is needed to keep bridges ice-free because bridges freeze and accumulate ice faster than roads, and stay frozen longer.

How much salt makes its way into human and animal water supplies is an open and hotly contested question. Many times the damaging effects are not known for years, and even then it is difficult to assess the costs. But there is little doubt that salt levels in streams and rivers are rising. The EPA estimates "as much as 5% of the population consuming water contaminated by road salt may be adversely affected." In Connecticut, state salt use was reduced by 33% because of rising sodium content in water supplies; the sodium concentrations had exceeded standards set by the American Heart Association and other heart specialists. New Hampshire provides funds for the replacement of public and private water wells, and offers testing of water supplies. VPIRG contends that citizens should be guaranteed standing in court to sue for damages to water supplies and real property caused by road salting; and the burden of proof should be on the Highway Department to show that the damages were not caused by road salt. Currently, Rep. Henry Carse (R—Hinesburg) is sponsoring a bill to require the Highway Department to conduct water quality sampling before road work begins, and to set up a salt monitoring system on state highways.

Critics of salt use should be aware of the effects of non-saline alternatives. Ammonium nitrate and ammonium sulfate (also used as agricultural fertilizers) leech into ground water and streams, raise nutrient levels, and cause the algae blooms of eutrophication. Other chemical compounds for melting snow carry caution labels because they will eat uncurred or worn concrete. A miracle melter is now being developed which reportedly melts ice "40 times faster than salt and works in temperatures down to -50 degrees Fahrenheit!" Reputed safe on concrete and around greenery, this new melter is not yet commercially available.

Alternatives To Salt

Sand is most often touted as a safe substitute for salt; but sand has its own problems. Sand without salt will freeze or blow off the road. Sand merely provides a base for tires and boots to grip, but does not melt snow and ice and must be applied repeatedly as long as the snow is falling. Sand, however, tends to be ground into a powder and clogs highway drainage systems. Highways then are more liable to heave and frost. When washed off roads, sand is deposited as silt in rivers and streams, and is destructive to fish and wildlife habitats. Part of the silt problem could be solved by installing catch basins to collect sand as it is washed off the road. These basins could be shovelled out in the spring and the sand reused. But the cost of catch basins is unknown. Moreover, the cost of delivering sand is high and Vermont sand is in short supply. A large shift to sand use might deplete supplies and drive up the cost.

In sum, sand advocates argue that driver education, improved vehicles, lower speed limits, and better enforcement would lead to greater sand use on winter roads, as well as safe travel.

In Colorado, sand, cinder, or gravel is used as an abrasive. Salt is then mixed with the abrasive in differing amounts according to specific areas. In 1975-76, 13,000 tons of salt were spread on Colorado's 9,200 miles of state roads. In 1974-75, approximately equivalent snowwise, 2,900 miles of Vermont highways were inundated with 79,718 tons of salt! Since then, Vermont Transportation Secretary Crisman has advocated using less salt. This represents a change in policy from former Highway Commissioner John Gray, who often stated that there was no substitute for salt, and that salt was needed to keep Vermont's roads safe. Gray also believed that sand use would cost more because roads require about four times more sand than salt. But with sand at $1.50 a ton and salt at $20 a ton, sand appears cheaper, and Crisman agrees. Crisman feels that salt is more expensive than sand and potentially more harmful to the environment.

Rustproofing your car is a necessity in Vermont because of road salt and the acidic soil of dirt roads. Rustproofing involves applying a penetrant to retard rust and a sealant to prevent rust from spreading. All areas from the windowline down are protected against rust with oil, wax, and metal-based materials. Rustproofing costs about $160 and is guaranteed for 2 years on an old car and 5 years on a new one. Rustproofing is not to be confused with undercoating. Undercoating helps retard rusting, but does not prevent rust, and the undercoating asphalt or tar-based material often cracks with age. Still, undercoating is about half the cost of rustproofing.

Too High On Saturates

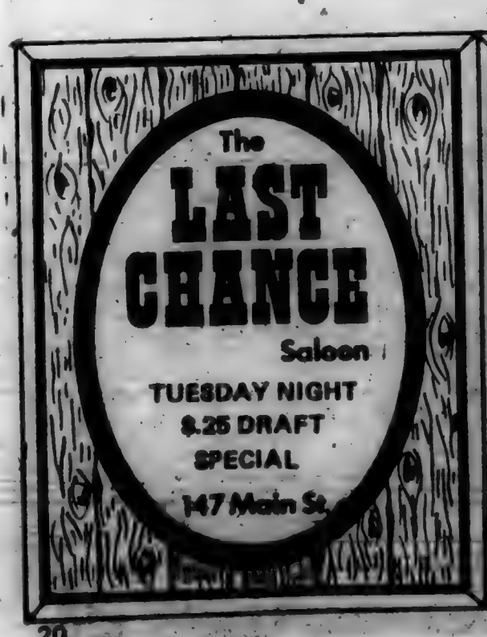
By Peter Millard

Ever since scientists discovered several years ago that consumption of large amounts of saturated (solid) fats leads to an increased prevalence of heart disease, many people have consciously altered their diets to include more polyunsaturated and fewer saturated fats.

The switch from butter to margarine "high in polyunsaturates" created a huge change in the dietary habits of Americans. However, this change may not have been the blessing that was initially expected because the chemical manipulation that goes into making margarine creates new, man-made fats which do not act like those commonly found in nature. Many respected nutritionists now fear that the fats found in margarine might be extremely harmful.

Just as the body requires certain essential vitamins, minerals and amino acids to support life functions, it also demands certain fats (called essential fatty acids) without which the organism will die. There are only three essential fatty acids (EFA's) and, not surprisingly, these are polyunsaturated fats. Many nutrition researchers such as those at the International Institute of Human Nutrition at Oxford, England, believe that these EFA's and vitamin E may hold the key to heart disease (British Medical Journal 12/17/77). The milling process which creates white bread, for example, removes all the EFA's and vitamin E from the wheat and these are never replaced by the "enrichment" process. This may be one reason why people who consume whole grains and cereals suffer significantly less from heart disease.

So eating margarine advertised as being "high in polyunsaturates" will assure that we get enough EFA's to keep us healthy, right? Unfortunately not. The polyunsaturates which exist in margarine have been altered in processing to produce a rearrangement of the chemical structure from the natural form found in vegetable oils to what chemists call "trans-isomers" of polyunsaturated fats. The original EFA's of the oil completely lose their activity after processing into margarine and are used by the body as saturated fat. Margarines which advertise that they are "high in polyunsaturates" are technically within the law, but they are misleading the public. One's body is not so easily misled, however, and the effect of consuming what is functionally saturated fat is known to be harmful.



Because these "trans-isomers" are only found in small quantities in nature, researchers are now concerned with what effect the consumption of large amounts may have on the human body.

Few research studies have dealt with the harmful effects of "trans-isomers" but animals have shown definite changes in the way they utilize these fats. The most recent study, conducted in laboratory rats, concluded the following: "Partially hydrogenerated fats that contain large amounts of "trans" fatty acids have a stressing effect on rats, increase the severity of the symptoms of an EFA deficiency, and suppress growth as well as promote degenerative changes in the testes of EFA deficient animals." (American Journal of Clinical Nutrition, July 1977).

More research needs to be done on the effects of "trans-isomers" on humans. In the meantime, I'll eat butter on my whole wheat bread.

Editor's Note: Peter Millard is currently a first year medical student at the University of Vermont Medical School.

Student Apathy: Whose Responsibility?

Over the last two weeks the Cynic, under the direction of Executive Editor Russell Flannery, has devoted many hours compiling a summary of its constitution and an evaluation of the present leadership of the Student Association (S.A.) Considering that every student is compelled to pay $24 to fund the S.A., and that the organization represents the sole elected student government, we felt that such an evaluation was long overdue. The results of the study are revealing and invite insightful commentary on not only the strengths and weaknesses of the S.A. but also on the level of student consciousness at UVM.

The critical problem, it appears, with the proper functioning of a student organization is to enlist the active support and involvement of the student body as a whole. It is patently obvious that the S.A. has failed in this area, but this failure may be less important than the reasons causing it. Is it caused by unmotivated inept leadership, or is the S.A. simply a victim of a generation fatigued from the zealous criticisms of the Vietnam Era? It's certainly ironic that the only event to spur student debate in recent months — the speech by Gen. William Westmoreland — was a living memory of that tragedy.

Analysis of this status quo complacency as a natural rebuilding process caused by divisions of the war is true enough, but it is rapidly turning into an excuse for a much deeper apathy. Certainly issues calling for equal or greater attention exist today. Nuclear war, mass starvation, growth of world socialism and its variations might serve as just a few examples. Indeed, it's unfortunate that students can't rally and hold public forums concerning these pressing realities.

It should be clear that this sad state is not prevalent only at UVM; surely it exists throughout the nation. Students simply don't want to get involved anymore as personal careers and grades have once again become their predominant preoccupations.

Often unfairly, student government failures are a natural scapegoat for an apathy which is in fact beyond their control. However, this does not mean that student governments should sit back and await another national tragedy to spark activism. Rather it should continue to try to get students involved and, to borrow a trite but worthy phrase, if you don't succeed at first, try try again.

But, while these larger issues may be outside of the S.A.'s control, internal organization and efficiency are clearly within it. Here, their performance is weak and inexcusable. Unavailability, slowness, ineptitude, andindifferenceare all noticeable characteristics of the present S.A. leadership. It takes, for example, weeks, sometimes over a month, to process checks for member club's paid employees. Such irresponsibility is reflected on the entire student population.

The ultimate responsibility for this lies with Geoff Liggett. Hopefully he will learn why such disorganization is rampant and attempt to eliminate it. It's hardly fair to ask people to become active when they're confronted by a disjumbled and misdirected leadership.

Creative Quips

To the Editor:

We are two UVM students and are writing with regard to last week's Cynic Follies. Last semester, the Cynic seemed to lack creative quips and entertaining articles. However, your first two issues deserve the highest praise.

The Cynic is a student newspaper and should be written for the students of UVM. The paper contains many diverse articles and inventive stories. Keep up the good work!

Wing Hall Roommates

P.S. The one-liners are great!

Equal Time

To the Editor:

There have been many articles on the men's ski team (alpine and cross country) but hardly any, or complimentary ones, about the girls'. It seems that the Cynic has the same attitude towards the women's ski team as does the Burlington Free Press. For sure the guy's team is "known" more than the women's. But the women's team does not have long to wait before they are running alongside the men's team — winning. Amongst all the girls there is a tremendous potential to win. They have already shown a piece of their potential, winning at Colby-Sawyer and stomping out Dartmouth for second at the UVM carnival.

The women's ski team needs more support. Encouragement does help a team. Is it not the fans at the Gutterson Field House that "help" make the UVM hockey team psyched to play? If it helps the men's hockey team and the men's ski team, in any way, shape or form, to perform better, don't you think it will do the same for the women's ski team?

A Conflict Of Freedoms

To the Editor:

While most of us may feel somewhat weary of reading about General Westmoreland's visit, the fact remains that one facet of discussion has been grossly neglected. This centers around the disgraceful conduct of a substantial minority of students in Ira Allen Chapel last Tuesday.

Nowhere in last week's Cynic save in one small paragraph, was mention made of the unruly atmosphere that was allowed to dominate the evening. Anyone present can recall the loud whispering, catcalls, and numerous placards which unfortunately displayed a profound dearth of intelligence. The question period was the "icing on the cake", with statements being fired at the General in belligerent tones of voice, emotional rhetoric, and in the case of one student, a personal assault regarding Westmoreland's tombstone. Again the round of applause was indicative of the low aptitude of the participating individuals.

Freedom to demonstrate against certain points of view is surely a primary consideration in an event such as this. But when the assembly moves indoors with the intention of being receptive to a learning situation, the dissenters should remain quiet, their placards should remain outside, or else they should be forcibly ejected. The fact that this was not done engendered in me such embarrassment that I waited for the General to exit from the Chapel in order to apologize on my own behalf. Fortunately, he said he hadn't heard many of the most derisive comments. I personally feel that student idealism cannot compare to the rich experience of a U.S. Commander in a discussion of wartime strategy. General Westmoreland's comment on the number of Vietcong experts was well taken.

Finally, while we can be reasonably certain that President Coor knew what to expect Tuesday evening, there is no excuse for subjecting Governor and Mrs. Aiken to such a display of buffoonery and immaturity. As the majority of the audience was well-mannered and posed questions politely, I sincerely hope that this scene is not repeated at a future date.

Thank you,
Cleet Allen

Sign The Petition

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to an article that appeared in the Cynic two weeks ago concerning the VPIRG petition drive.

It is my opinion that all students should sign the petition, which is aimed at showing our support to the present VPIRG funding system. Under the present system, each student is automatically billed three dollars at the beginning of each semester. The registration materials that accompany each tuition bill clearly state that the VPIRG payment is optional. Those students who do not support VPIRG may either waive payment of the fee at the time of the initial billing or request a full refund during the semester.

Those who criticize this funding system claim that students are "coerced" into paying VPIRG the three dollars. On the contrary, those students who choose to contribute do so because they recognize the value in having a student-run research and advocacy group. They do not contribute because they are threatened or forced to.

VPIRG is a student-run group dedicated to working for social change in Vermont. They do not receive financial support from special interest groups or government funds. They rely on student contributions. Those who choose to pay the three dollars are investing in protection against corporate irresponsibility, environmental destruction, consumer fraud, and governmental unresponsiveness. If the present funding system is eliminated, VPIRG workers would be forced to spend their valuable time and energy raising funds, rather than working to make Vermont a better place to live.

Highway Robbery

To the Editor:

During this week of Winterfest many activities are going on. One of these is Broomball. Broomball properly played is safe, fun, and serves as an integral part of dorm spirit and unity. I feel that something should be done to avoid the same thing that happened to my team this year. Midnite Lumber won its first two games. For both games we had thirty guys, that means six lines which all played an equal amount of time. The teams we played had six to eight guys and really couldn't compete with a fresh line coming in every three minutes.

On Saturday we had a game at twelve noon. We won in over time. At three o'clock on Sunday we received a call from someone connected with Broomball saying we had ten minutes to make it down there for a game. On Sundays most people are recovering from the weekend or studying. We could have made it in fifteen minutes but were awarded a half hour extension to make it. We proceeded in rounding up our players. While we were dressing the phone rang a second time. The voice on the other end said not to bother to come down and that they would reschedule our game. Breathing a sigh of relief, I resumed my Sunday afternoon activities.

Early Monday morning I went to Billings to check the board to see when Midnite Lumber played next. To my dismay the board read Midnite Lumber — forfeit. I checked out the whole board and found that only six of the twenty-four teams scheduled did not forfeit. I saw this as a good way to cut down on the number of teams in competition, but not very practical for teams who had made it that far into the schedule without a loss.

We played Wednesday night and lost to the team we had beaten on Saturday, this games also went into overtime.

My complaint lies in the fact that we had one loss to a team and one loss to the system. If only six out of twenty teams make games, there has to be something wrong. We lost fair and square to the team we played Wednesday. But we had already beaten them once and would have played a different team if we had not been forced to forfeit. Our only hope is that next year the scheduling procedure can be improved so that this will not happen again.

Sincerely,
Jim Downey

The Future of Foreign Policy

By Eric Pollard

INSIGHT

The United States is, for better or for worse, committed to the pursuit of a relatively stable and predictable foreign policy. Few surprises have ever taken place in this area, and indeed few could be expected. It is, with certain minor changes, a policy that can be traced from the early days of the Republic in a direct line of development as to include the present time. Because of this traditional aspect of foreign policy, the American government has come under serious fire from elements both within and without its hierarchy to revamp the thrust of American strategy to account for the rapidly changing international environment. These groups, which include members of Congress and pressure groups both right and left, argue that the patterned response that is built into the system does not provide enough flexibility to cope with dynamic world situations. Perhaps these criticisms are justified in light of the tremendous machinations through which the government must go in order to develop a policy that could easily have been anticipated in advance. But that line of reasoning tends to overlook the question which must be foremost in any such discussion, that being: What is, in fact, the goal of American foreign policy?

Before one can seek to change an already-existing formula of international relations, one must consider carefully the reasons for its construction and utilization. This is no easy chore in its own right, and when viewed in relation to the interactions of the international community as a whole, it becomes a question which involves the character of the United States as a member of that community. It is in this context in which American foreign policy must be evaluated. The fact that certain general foreign policy goals predate the recognition of the United States as a world power would lead one to believe that those goals, in a fundamental sense, were directly related to nature of American government as an integral unit. Of course, a good deal of historical American policy can be explained away in terms of national security and defense of sovereignty, but this should not be the point at which investigation ceases. The roots of American foreign policy lie much deeper than a broad overview would indicate.

That is not to say that defense and security are not elemental in the formation of policy decisions. The United States was founded, in a sense, to allow dissatisfaction about its makeup to strengthen its basic character. It is the only system in which the expression of individual opinions, be they of a supportive nature or not, is the key to its existence. It is a system based on moral rather than political principles. Foreign policy can be said to represent an effort on the part of the government to defend its moral origins in the community in which it must operate. To this extent one can believe as sincere the comments of the many government officials who have fallen back on this moral argument to justify otherwise questionable governmental activities. One must of course realize that that system (and the manpower hierarchy that works within it) is not perfect; nothing created by man can hope to be. But this tradition sets the United States apart from the rest of the world powers, who can boast neither of such right-minded begins nor of any sort of steadfast continuance of fundamental principles.

It remains to be seen whether efforts to redirect American policy will be successful. Such a redirection depends largely on the responsibility which the American people feel to maintain (or restore) the moral guidelines upon which United States policy has been based. Unfortunately, it is usually difficult to see any element of morality in the outcomes of most foreign policy decisions, not because the good intentions are not there, but rather that they are lost in the human desire to blindly pursue a goal. If the people allow the government to divorce the national moral heritage from the decision-making process, they will be denying an integral element of their own "American" character. They must decide whether they wish to be represented by a government that often muddies the water in an effort to do what is seen to be right or a government which seeks the most politically expedient alternative, a contingency which does not preclude bumbling (witness the Soviet Union). Their decision will effect much more than just American relations with other sovereign powers.

The other day, while strolling down in Battery Park just before a brilliant sunset, I came across a nicely dressed, grey-haired man, sitting on a snow-covered park bench. A newspaper was on his lap and he had a concerned look on his face.

"Hello, sir," I said. "You seem troubled. What could possibly be the problem on this glorious afternoon?"

"Oh for the idealist joy of youth!" he exclaimed. "I'm worried for all of us, boy. There's a storm brewing on the horizon."

I looked out over the lake. "Seems pretty clear to me," I said.

"YOU haven't been hearing the news lately. B[o]y, have you planned for your retirement?"

"Retirement? I have a quiz in Poli/Sci 71 next week." (He missed my point.)

"I did. I took advantage of every loophole in the book. First I put in time in the private sector, for an insurance company. I left there to join the military in 1944 where I served until 1950. Then I was a civil servant for HEW until I was elected to Congress where I served for ten years..."

"Congress?" I interrupted. "Hey, I'm looking for a job and..."

"Job?" the man exclaimed. "How can you be looking for a job with the retirement systems in such a mess?"

"Mess?"

"Yes sir. With my employment history, I should start receiving monthly checks from five different retirement systems — the military, the civil service, the Congress, the insurance company, and social security — starting next year. Yet the news keeps clammoring about the crisis facing the retirement systems."

"Crisis?"

"Apparently there's some squabble about the government under-estimating the amount of benefits they have promised to present and future retirees from the government. They call it unfunded liability."

"Sounds grim."

"It is. The GAO recently predicted the unfunded liability for the Uniformed Services, the Civil Service, and the Federal Service combined to be around 280 billion dollars, up 79% from 1970."

"No!"

"And as for actual cash benefits paid, they shelled out over 15.5 million dollars in 1976, up from 5.5 million in 1970. They say this is largely due to increases in the number of beneficiaries (50%), the pay rates on which the annuities are based (for example, white collar rates are up 36%), and the annuity cost-of-living adjustments (64%). Worst thing is, they don't know when it'll stop — or exactly what it means. Generally, things look gloomy for the taxpayer — and for whoever's in office when the crunch comes."

I thought for a moment to let it sink in. "Sir, by switching among the services and earning rights to benefits from all those different pension systems, aren't you what they call a 'double dipper?'"

"Well, yes, my boy. But everybody does it - as you well know it is the American pasttime to take advantage of the system wherever possible."

"I guess you're right, sir. I must confess, yesterday I snuck a chocolate chip cookie out of Simpson Dining Hall after lunch. Sir, how much will you receive in retirement benefits per year?"

"$62,150.00"

"That's quite an income to retire on. Do you need all that?"

"Hey, that's nothing in my circles. Not to mention any names, but one former president I know who served somewhere after Johnson and before Ford now receives $101,000.00 annually."

"No kidding. Well how can the government afford to pay such retirement benefits?"

"They can't. That's the point. They've promised 280 billion dollars in benefits more than they presently have planned to finance."

"Well, why doesn't Congress do something about it?"

They'd like to, son, but any time you reduce benefits or increase taxes — contributions in this case — the public doesn't like it. As for removing loopholes, it's just as tough, like taking away a grown man's toy. I've got battle scars to prove that. My only hope is that the public wakes up in time to permit the Congress to enact the necessary reform. Otherwise, things look grim."

"I think I'm switching majors. Poli/Sci is nice, but I want a job where the retirement system isn't in such disarray. The private sector sounds a bit cozier."

"You can't hide from it," he said. "It is every taxpayer's problem — and the world's problem too if the crisis hits soon." He was getting quite excited, and I was cold and hungry.

"I've gotta go," I said. "What would you recommend a young fellow like I do concerning retirement when I grow older."

"Don't. At least not under the present system. Lord knows what will happen when you — the baby-boom generation — grows older. Work to reform the system — rub out the inequities — remove the loopholes. But do me a favor, huh?"

"What's that?"

"Wait till after I enjoy a couple of months worth of benefits, huh? It's been a long hard road."

As I trudged back up to campus, dark clouds formed in the late evening sky. I didn't notice them as I was deep in concentration — my floor had a broomball game that night.

A Journalistic Misconception

To the Editor:

As author of the article "A Familiar Journey" which appeared in the first second-semester issue of the Cynic, I feel it is my duty to respond to Catherine Chase's letter of low-minded criticism published in last week's edition.

Ms. Chase leveled accusations of irresponsible journalism due to "the lack of plot, story-line, and apparent reasons for having been written." To Ms. Chase I extend my heartfelt thanks for her honest perceptions.

It is regretful, however, that she has assumed the divine position of defining journalism. By her comments, she has openly admitted to belonging to the medieval strata of misguided and self-appointed critics who wish to keep journalism in the dark ages.

To me, the Cynic is far more than a newspaper, it is an opportunity for expression. All articles should not have to be informative or entertaining. It is a pity that the majority of gluttonous readers have been conditioned to believe the opposite.

It is my intention to continue to contribute to the Cynic and when appropriate to abandon all preconceptions of what journalism should be.

Stretching the sensibilities of its readers and pointing a crooked finger at ourselves is my personal crusade. I invite you, Ms. Chase, and anyone who feels I am guilty of violating some literary formula to join me on that journey.

The Blue Smoke Blues

To the Editor:

I just thought I'd drop a quick note here with the hope I'm sure all others have had — namely that it will result in some positive response instead of my simply having spent more time talking to my typewriter.

Although I don't want to make a complaint against the campus bus shuttle on the whole (not wanting to deter mass transportation in any way, shape, etc.) I still would like to wonder out loud if there isn't anything that can be done to prevent my having to breathe in from a vast cloud of blue smoke each time I get off the bus.

I am earnestly awaiting a reply.

Sincerely,
Eric Sorensen

In Need of Reorganization

To the Editor:

Signing up for gym classes has never been a pleasant task at this school. The courses are always offered when you're scheduled to be sitting somewhere on the third floor of Lafayette or else when you're in the process of dragging yourself out of bed to make it to your 10 MWF.

And then when you've finally found a class that does suit your needs, you have to slog over to the gym well in advance of the starting time in anticipation of one hundred other students intending to enroll in the same class.

When I was a freshman, I wanted to sign up for Tennis 5 as a start in fulfilling my gym requirements. Having heard horror stories about the lines that form for such a course, I probably skipped a couple of classes to get there early and ensure myself a spot on the roster. I was the second person in line and ended up being fifteenth (and last) on the class list even though I assumed only one person was going to be signing up ahead of me.

What happened was simply the gentleman who was taking names announced that seniors, Allied Health students (I think), and some such other group would be allowed to sign up first because of priority.

Now that I'm a senior, I assumed I would receive the same treatment that the seniors who were able to cut in front of me three years ago did. Not so.

I'm not exactly sure how long this policy of not granting seniors priority so they can fulfill their requirements has existed, but it blows.

A friend of mine asked a lady who was taking names for a racquetball course the other day if he could skirt the line because he was a senior and needed the credit. Since the line was well over the number of people that would eventually end up in the course, it would have been long closed and waiting in the line would have proven pointless. The woman told him to sign up for something else.

What else??

Well, there's always Badminton 1 at nine o'clock on Saturday morning. And then there's Bowling from 12–5 on Friday afternoon.

The point is simply that seniors should be able to sign up for essentially any gym course they want, within limits, of course; these gym credits are needed for graduation. I have been informed by unreliable sources that the rationale behind this new policy is that some seniors, who no longer needed the credit, were taking advantage of the priority system and were signing up for many of the more popular courses.

Well then, the bureaucrats should be able to figure out some way so seniors can get an authorized note from their Dean's office showing they need the credit for graduation so they can cut the line. I don't object to the credit requirement, I merely object to two things: the fact that the policy changed relatively unnoticed and is now screwing seniors, and also the antiquated methods by which one must sign up for these courses.

Sagging IceCats Bested By Bruins, 3-2

By Paul Gardner

The script has become so familiar that it's almost stale; bring a top ranked team into Gutterson, give them a good scare, then let them off with a close win. The scenario unfolded again Tuesday when the Cats lost a tough contest, 3-2, to Brown University.

Defense and caution characterized the heart of the game. Brown was clearly hesitant to take any risks and Vermont dominated the Bruins in the first period. The Cats were a little hesitant on offense, Coach Jim Cross later admitted. In addition Brown's Goalie Mike Laycock nailed things down to shut out the Vermont attack until 4:38 of the third period. Both teams demonstrated strength against the powerplay, with the Cats having an edge in shorthanded chances and Brown the edge in controlling the puck. Brown even managed to play four man keep away with the Cats for about twenty-five seconds during Vermont's only powerplay of the second period.

Vermont excelled with strong forechecking, so much so that despite the strength of the Brown defensive core, the Cats disrupted the flow of Brown's offense. Goalie Sylvain Turcotte was seriously tested only once in the first period when Brown went on a powerplay. Afterward, the Bruin attack consisted of occasional intrusions into the UVM zone. Brown finally undid the scoreless tie when they caught Turcotte on the wrong side of the crease and Jim Lawson scored late in the second period.

Vermont was forced to play less conservatively in the third period to successfully erase Brown's lead. Without warning Randy Koch was knocked out of the game after a collision.

Cross handled Koch's absence by juggling the defensive rotation. Chuck Ross, Louis Cote and Mark Brown were forced to play two shifts without rest. The move paid off. Not only was Brown held scoreless, but UVM tied the score with a Cote play. As Cote later described it "Homola dug it out of the corner to me. A Brown man came at me fast, and I was able to shift around him and fake the goalie so that he moved his stick to the right and I slipped it between his legs."

Vermont built up steam and took a 2-1 lead when Andy Halford poked it past Laycock from the left side. But the happy scene lasted only a few seconds, as UVM's killer instinct let up. After one close call died at Turcotte's hands, another shot from twenty-five feet out got by Turcotte, just twenty-four seconds after Halford's goal. Vermont went into a tizzy, and Brown took advanfage by sneaking past Turcotte once again for the winning goal, just 27 seconds after their tying goal.

Two Vermont penalties helped crush any hope that the Cats had, as Brown sat on their 3-2 lead. Laycock shut out several hard Vermont shots, adding to the Vermont misery.

Vermont played well, and that is an important factor despite the score. Vermont's defensive core in particular had a solid showing, and seemed to move the puck out of the zone with some fluency. Louis Cote's quickness made him invaluable to the Cats. Louie estimates that he plays as much as any other defense man, but he often breaks rank to charge in on the goalie. Randy Koch also contributed an exceptional performance.

Vermont has shown all the class typical of a Jim Cross hockey team in the past few weeks. The Cats are aware that their record has dropped to 6-10,

Basketball Report

Cat Cagers Turn The Tables

By Steven Larose

Mike Kern, aided by Tyrone Johnson and Kevin Kelly, kept the Cats above water in the late going, as the University of Vermont Basketball team ended a streak of thirteen losses on the road by defeating the University of New Hampshire, 72-59, Wednesday night in Durham.

Kern dumped in seventeen points and snared thirteen rebounds to pace the Cats to their eighth win of the season against eleven defeats. Johnson scored a career high ten points (nine of which came in the final half) while Kelly popped in five. He also had five rebounds while Johnson nabbed three.

Coach Peter Salzberg later remarked "we got a good start early in the game and stayed ahead. We had more offensive patience against UNH and our zone defense was fairly effective. In the past we have been nervous and tight on offense, but in this game we just loosened up and popped in some good shots, instead of making a lot of bad ones."

Vermont came out fighting in the opening stanza, hitting ten of its first twelve shots, as the Cats raced to a 24-14 advantage with eight minutes left in the first half. Mark Sobolewski, Dane Correll and Tom Perrin all contributed four points each in this stretch, and Jim Nocera racked up six to put the Cats well ahead.

But as in so many games before, the regained offensive movement and high percentage shooting Vermont enjoyed suddenly disappeared and the dangerous New Hampshire Wildcats struck from behind. Vermont slipped to a one point deficit, 29-28, with seconds to go in the first half. Only the play of Kern, who sunk two free throws, allowed Vermont to regain the lead at the intermission 31-30.

In the second half, the Cats once again came within a whisker of blowing the lead. Both Nocera and Sobolewski picked up their fourth fouls, and Salzberg turned to Johnson and Kelly to fill the void. The outside shooting antics of Correll and Perrin swelled the Vermont lead to 41-34, where Johnson and Kelly took charge.

The pair combined to score fourteen of Vermont's eighteen points as the Cat lead blossomed to 59-53 with four minutes remaining. New Hampshire then fouled Vermont, but the Cats went sour once again and the Wildcats climbed back into the contest. Both teams strung together a line of missed shots over the next few minutes, until Vermont finally righted itself. In the last minute, Vermont cashed in on nine out of ten attempts while UNH was baffled, and the Cats collected on their first win since Brandeis came to visit the Cats in January.

Sobolewski finished with six points, while Perrin totaled nine. Joining Kern and Johnson in double figures were Jim Nocera, ten, while Dane Correll hit five from the field to pitch in eleven points. Dave Miller also chipped in with two points.

Coach Salzberg continued "we have played well on the road in past years. There was no great mystery to our poor showing, we just played some tough people and probably wouldn't have won even if we played them at home. But there were games on the road we could have easily won, but we just didn't have the good offensive movement to score enough points. Against UNH, we succeeded by limiting our bad shots. Also UNH pulled in their defense, so we were able to get some good jump shots on the perimeter from Correll and Perrin. Even though we have always been confident, the win over UNH made us feel better, we now have something to show for our hard work."

Vermont faced UNH at Patrick Wednesday night, and will now hit the road for three more games against Colgate, St. Michaels and Connecticut, on February eleventh, fifteenth and eighteenth, respectively.

Hockey

but they have not forgotten that they are capable of better. Cross pointed out that it's easier to get psyched when you're winning, but the Cats have been mentally prepared so far, although there are several things to get worried about. Included in this are a mass of injuries at defense. Cross also admitted "the inability to score is still haunting us." For example, in the first period against Brown, the Cats outshot Brown by a 6-2 margin, while on power-play four times, but still came up empty. Oddly enough, in this contest, it was the defense that saved the Cats from being blown off the ice. Turcotte was sharp, stopping several threatening outbursts.

Aquacats Drown Huskies

The University of Vermont Men's Swim Team, after narrowly losing the opening event, ripped past the University of New Hampshire with a score of 64-47, Saturday and set three pool records in the process.

Mark Kinne took top honors in the 500 yard freestyle with a time of 5:09.3 to pace the Aqua Cats. Allan Kopel followed with a first place finish in the 200 yard Breaststroke with a time of 2:24.7. Vermont swimmers took first, second, and third places in both of these events plus the 1000 yard freestyle.

Dave Platow, Steven Levy, Captain Peter Galhaar, and Ron Kirkwood broke another UNH pool record with a time of 3:22.8 in the 400 yard freestyle relay. As UVM clinched the victory, team members threw coach Les Leggett into the pool to celebrate his 100th victory as the UVM swim coach.

Coach Leggett commented "I saw a lot of good things today, but we're just beginning to roll." Some of the other good things were Freshman Kym Berman reaching his personal goal for the season with a 209.3 in the 200 yard fly. He still has a month to go so he probably will surpass even his own expectations. Also, Ron Kirkwood, who after a slow start, is beginning to show his brilliance as he darted the length of the pool to win the 50 Freestyle in 22.7. Steven Levy in his first attempt this year at the 200 yard free won it in a time of 1:53.9. The Vermont swimmers will be at home for the first time this year, after compiling a record of 1-3 on the road, when they host St. Michaels Tuesday, February 7 at 4:00 p.m. Later in the week, the AquaCats take on UMass Saturday, February 1 at 3 p.m. at Forbush Pool.

Cross Campus Cruise Winners

Jim Curran won the second annual UVM Cross Campus Cruise sponsored by the Outing Club Saturday. Charlie Painter took second place, followed by Peter Cassels-Brown in fourth, William Gabriel in fifth and Jim Oaks in Sixth. Other racers in order of finish were: David Filbert-7th, Pat Phillips-8th, Eric Pendleton-9th, Bill Kayo Smith-10th, Pat Watkins-11th, and Ian Salzburg-12th. Kathy Fors was the first woman to finish, capturing thirteenth place. Hoty Smith took fourteenth while Abby Bronson, the second woman to finish, placed fifteenth. Other women across the finish line were: Jocelyn Boldoss-28th, Amanda Bronson-30th, and Donna Raymond-31st.

Disqualification Gives UVM Ski Carnival To Cats

By Rich Chalmers

The University of Vermont men's ski team captured first place in the UVM winter carnival Saturday due to a controversial disqualification of one of Dartmouth's leading skiers in the final event of the competition. Late Friday afternoon it appeared clear that Dartmouth would clinch the carnival but its 30 point lead soon disappeared, leaving the Big Green coaches stunned. UVM tallied a total of 332.5 points while Dartmouth finished with 322.5 followed by Middlebury with 309.

Thursday's jumping competition ended in a 90-90 tie between UVM and Dartmouth. Kare Herie won the event for the Cats with Roger Holden and Dennis Lambert finishing fifth and sixth respectively. Dave Larson placed tenth in the competition for UVM. Dartmouth's strength lay in Chris Berggrav and Bob Zinc who placed second and third backed by Sverre Brott in seventh.

Dartmouth began to pull away on Friday as they placed strongly in the cross-country event. UVM's Mark Wagner finished in first place as usual, but had to share it with Dartmouth's Tim Moerline. Karsten Medtredt placed ninth and Kent Karns finished twenty-first for the Cats. At this point Dartmouth went into the lead 271-244 and hopes for a UVM victory were becoming slim. Many thought it would take a miracle from Vermont or a Dartmouth disaster for UVM to continue its winning streak.

Scott Light skied well for UVM, taking first place in the slalom competition. Kent Belden took fifth for the Cats and Jerry McNealus and Jeff Darrow placed seventh and eighth respectively. Middlebury sprang forward to seize second, third and fourth but was not able to catch Dartmouth which had only one racer, Tim Itin place in the top ten at sixth.

The controversial call centered around Dartmouth's slalom skier John Macomber, who allegedly straddled a gate high on the course and was disqualified. A gate keeper for the intercollegiate ski meet recorded the violation and reported it to the judges. The gatekeeper stated that she clearly saw Macomber straddle the gate, and checked the ski tracks to confirm her decision.

The Dartmouth coaches protested immediately upon receiving the news. Macomber claimed he never straddled a gate. Dartmouth Alpine Coach Dave Durance backed up his skier's claim by arguing against the official's decision.

The controversy was presented before the Carnival jury, which decided to uphold the ruling. Great importance lay in the fact that the official never faltered, even under heavy pressure from the Dartmouth coaches. She knew what she saw and stood with her decision. This weighed heavily in the unanimous decision to back the gatekeeper, for if she had faltered or doubted what she saw, the officials might have voted differently.

If Macomber's two runs had been counted, Dartmouth would have won the Carnival. And although Macomber was positive he never straddled a gate, he did not complain after the final decision was rendered. Macomber said that the gatekeeper did her job in a competent manner and he thanked the jury for listening to his opinion.

The Dartmouth coaches are not satisfied with the result and will appeal the jury's decision to the EISA executive committee for inter-collegiate skiing.

UVM Ski Coach Chip Lacasse commented, "We hate to win a Carnival under these circumstances, but you have to live with things like that. As in any sport, you have to go with the officials' decisions."

When asked about the controversial validity of the call, Lacasse stated, "Judging from the evidence, the call was well made. The jury voted unanimously in favor of the call."

This victory gave UVM its thirteenth straight win, consisting of over two years of undefeated skiing. "The string is nice, but the competition is getting very tough. The loss of Doug Bruce and Mark Quinlan will affect us heavily. There's no question in my mind that they give a big boost to the team," said Coach Lacasse.

Lacasse went on to say it was tough to lose people like Bruce and Quinlan because of Vermont's lack of strong depth.

All eyes will be on the upcoming Dartmouth Carnival this weekend. "It should be a very emotional Carnival due to the controversy overshadowing this past one," Lacasse commented, "But we can handle it. Our goal is to do the best we can. There's no overpowering pressure to make it fourteen wins in a row."

Middlebury Takes UVM Carnival

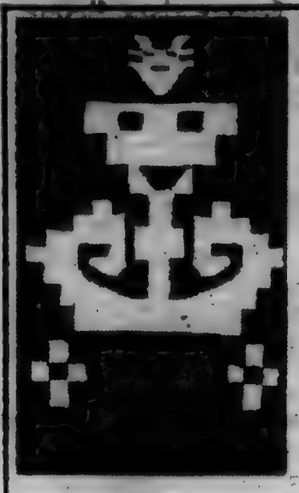
By Rich Chalmers



The University of Vermont Women's ski team competed in the UVM winter ski carnival last weekend and was defeated by Middlebury 227-190.5. Dartmouth captured third in the meet with 169, followed by Williams with 139, and Harvard with 110.5. This was the third Carnival UVM has competed in this season, and it is the second time Middlebury has been able to outski the Cats. Middlebury won the St. Lawrence Carnival, lost to UVM at Colby Sawyer and then came back to finish first at UVM.

The Big Green finished strongly in Cross Country, taking the first three spots and capturing the event. Jannett Kellon, Alice Tower and Liz Carey finished first, second and third for Dartmouth. Mimi Frenett from Johnson and Harvard's July Rabinowitz placed fourth with a total of seventy points. Susan Shay placed sixth, followed by Janett Reynolds at tenth and Amy Lang and Nancy Dickson in a tie for eleventh. Dartmouth finished third in the cross country and Maine placed fourth.

Were you in Billings today?

The Billings Governing Board, which presents "Billings Bedlam" and many other student activities to the students annually, is deciding to put a standard eight foot pool table in Marsh Lounge for the greater enjoyment of the Billings Center by the student population.

Due to the reduction in funding to the Governing Board, this would allow the Billings Center to offer better activities on a self-sufficient basis because the revenues go directly to the Governing Board. The total revenues are split fifty-fifty with the rental company. At a quarter per game, the estimated annual revenue would be between five and six thousand dollars. Since there is no liability for damage to the table, the Center is risking nothing.

If you approve or disapprove, please mark the appropriate box below and return to the main desk at the Billings Center. Thank you very much.

For UVM Gymnasts, Victory Is Not Enough

By Darcie McCann

The University of Vermont Men's gymnastics team competed against Oneonta and came away defeated by the score of 160.1–151.7 and the women gymnasts were edged by UNH 126.2 – 120.8 in meets held Saturday.

Ten events took place throughout the night, usually two simultaneously. Loud cheering rang out from the audience and team members after each competitor finished his/her exercise. The gymnasts were frequently doing back flips, aerials, and incredibly high jumps, seemingly unaware that there was a very hard floor beneath them.

The women's team competed on the uneven bars, balance beam, vault, and the floor exercise while the men performed the floor exercise, pummel horse, still rings, long horse vault, parallel and horizontal bars. The differences between the men's and women's routines can be noticed immediately. While the men's exercises tend to stress strength, the women's tend to emphasize grace.

The women's team, coached by onetime Vermont high school All-Around Gymnastics Champion (1968-1971), Debbie Doscuisko, has earned a 6-3 season thus far. The men's team, coached by Tom Dunkley, has managed a 2-2 record among some very strong opponents. The women's team, comprised of only ten members (Julie Anderson, Ann Berry, Captain Kim Chung, Chris Costello, Amy D'Ajostine, Mary Lou Doxey, Lisa Duff, Kim Dunkley, Connie Howard and Captain Janet Lynch, and manager Linda Beardsley) appears to be an extremely strong squad. The men's team, which includes Marc Ricard, Bill Ahern, Mike Hoisington, Steve Rancour, Jon McDonald, Dan Storgatt, Duncan Edwards, Rob Huntoon, Hans Nilsson, and Terry Tow, has a goal to finish in the top half of the Northern League. Coach Dunkley feels in order to achieve this he "would like to see each man reach his potential for the season.

Coach Kosciusko feels there is a good chance that her team can make it to the regionals. "Learning to give their all in practice so they can achieve their full potential in competition will be an important factor in reaching the regionals," says Kosciusko.

Gymnastics is not just a varsity sport requiring skill and talent. For the UVM gymnasts, defeating opponents is not the only form of success. Women's Captain Lynch commented, "reaching your goal is what success is all about, and it feels good."

Gymnastics is a sport of skill, strength and grace.

Nilsson Excells But Catamounts Falter

By John Light

Hans Nilsson excelled again but the University of Vermont men's gymnastics team dropped a very close and competitive meet to Oneonta State College, losing 151.7 to 160.1 Saturday. The Catamounts held a slim lead going into the final two events, parallel bars and high bar, only to have their hopes dashed by a very strong showing by Oneonta.

UVM's Hans Nilsson was the individual all-around winner with a total of 43.8 and remains undefeated so far this season. Oneonta's Howie Powder was second (35.5) closely followed by UVM co-captain Marc Ricard (34.4). In addition, Hans Nilsson was the winner in long horse vaulting with a score of 8.6. Nilsson also placed second in the parallel bars and third in the high bar and floor exercise.

John McDonald finished second in the pommel horse. Dan Stargatt placed third in the rings and Marc Ricard finished third in the horse.

Vermont coaches Tom Dunkley and Bill Hopkins were pleased with many individual efforts and the total team accomplishment. Coach Hopkins expressed satisfaction in that the team scored more than 150 points for the second time this season. Head coach Dunkley sees room for individual improvement which should raise the team score although he realizes that they have been somewhat dampered by lack of depth and injuries. In fact, both captain Ricard and Bill Alearn are competing with injuries.

Dunkley has high hopes of defeating M.I.T. next Saturday in Cambridge and is looking forward to the next home meet vs. Dartmouth on February 15, which he feels is within reach.

Wildcats Snub Gymnasts

Following a victory over Northwestern, the University of Vermont Women's Gymnastics Team concentrated their efforts to score a record high against New Hampshire, but lost 126.2 to 120.8 Saturday at Patrick Gym. Earlier in the week Vermont defeated Northeastern 113.65 to 102.7.

Kris Costello took first in the all-around competition against Northeastern with a 28.65 score. Costello also placed second in the all-around category against New Hampshire with a 31.4 score.

Kris Costello and Kim Chung placed second and third in the uneven bars against Northeastern. Janet Lynch placed first on the balance beam against Northeastern, while she took third in competition against New Hampshire.

Lynch placed first in floor exercise at Northeastern while tying for first against New Hampshire; Coach Debbie Kosciusko commented "The team is making great progress and seems to be heading in the right direction of qualifying for the Eastern Regional championships. Our score against New Hampshire greatly boosted the team's confidence."

Vermont's next meet is against Springfield on February 15th at 7 p.m. at the Patrick Gym.

Gilbert Sets World Tennis Record

Ed Note -

Townsend Gilbert, head pro at The Twin Oaks Tennis Center, broke the present world record of 89 straight hours of tennis by completing his 100th hour of the sport on Saturday. Proceeds from the pledge drive, lasting from January 31 at 3 p.m. to February 4 at 7 p.m., are going to the March of Dimes.

Among the dignitaries Gilbert competed against included UVM president Lattie Coor and Governor Richard Snelling. This article is written from the viewpoint of many of the spectators present at Twin Oaks.

By Peter Huidekoper, Jr.

"The difficult we do immediately; the impossible takes a little longer."

An Air Force Motto

Townsend Gilbert finished his one hundredth consecutive hour of tennis by winging his racket through the air in joy and then hobbling off the court to embrace his wife. Over two hundred of us at courtside cheered and applauded and moved in closer to smile away at the weary hero, and his teary-eyed friends. It was a sweet moment for all.

Having watched him off and on for the last two days of his endurance record we knew, however, that that final moment of exultation had not come easily. We had seen the strong shoulders sagging and the legs tightening. We had seen his feet – usually so light and swift – holding him back, dragging his body quite unwillingly into position. We had seen the pain shoot through his face when he stretched too far, or when he put too much weight on one of his already thoroughly blistered and bandaged feet. At times it almost seemed as if we were watching him age right in front of our eyes. The youthful smile had faded and all too often we had seen in its place the heartrending grimace that told us that the utter exhaustion had become impossible to hide.

But we hardly needed to worry about his heart. As he proved all week, heart Townsend Gilbert has plenty of. And as he neared the finish line of this seemingly endless race he gave such a beautiful last kick that you had to sit there and be glad for the fact that people like this exist. A little spring returned to his feet in those closing sixty minutes, more than a little zip reappeared on his shots, and at the same time a sense of utter relief began to shine all over his young-again, glad-to-be-alive again face. That terrific grin of his raised itself up once more in genuine, if aching, pleasure. He unleashed a smash or two and laughed at himself, and we laughed with him. He drilled a few backhands across court exactly where he wanted them to go and nodded to himself as if to say, "Phew! I can still do it." And he ripped in a few serves just to affirm that tired or not he was still the pro and that he could still give a lesson or two, by example, if and when he wanted.

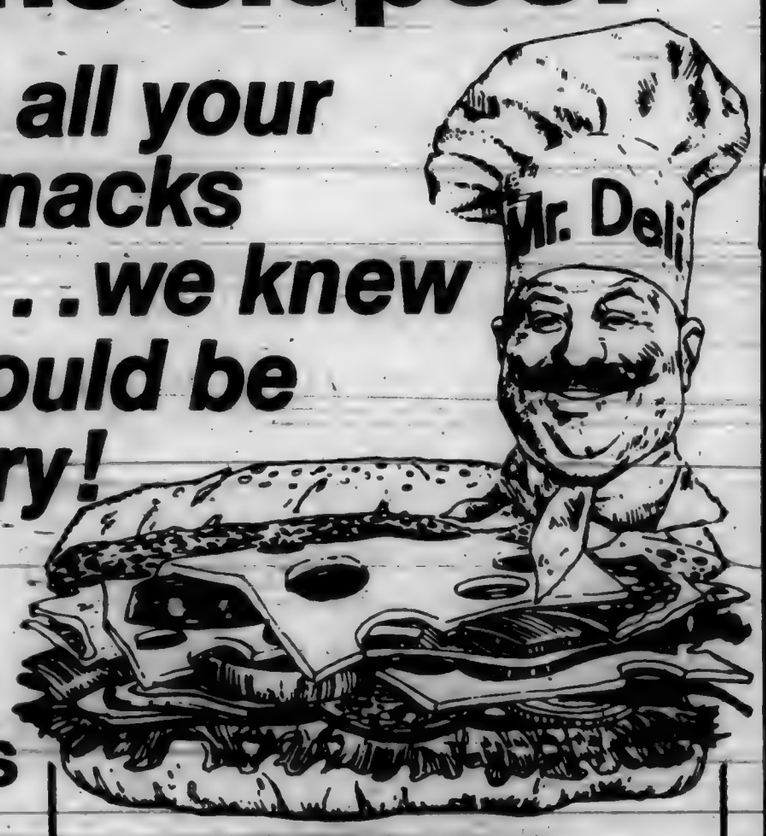
As the final few minutes ticked away, the crowd, in anticipation, grew more tense and excited. All eyes – Gilbert's included – eagerly checked the clock to be certain that it was still moving ahead. It was. 10-9-8-7-6-5-4-3-2-1. It was all over. Grinning with pride, as if he had just finished the best match of his life (and he had), he swished his racket through the air in little boy glee and limped and hopped across the court into the arms of his wife. As we circled them and cheered we shook our heads in amazed delight, and in sheer respect. Everyone of us knew that we were happy to be there for reasons that far transcended the Guiness Book of Records and even the March of Dimes.

For we sensed that Gilbert had given us a lesson in something bigger than the game of tennis. He had taught us, again, about those old and often discounted truths about our need to expect far more from ourselves than the accepted norm and about our need to challenge ourselves, over and over, to give more than we do. Cliches telling us that "where there's a will there's a way" and idealistic words encouraging us to dream – and to strive to fulfill – our own impossible dreams all suddenly took on a new, almost believable meaning.



That was why we came in droves to watch him play, and that is why his simply being out there, day after day after day, fascinated and touched us and, in the end, was so uplifting and so refreshing. By achieving the impossible, Gilbert had inspired us all. Our imagination and our hopes were reawakened, if just for a moment, to consider not just our limitations, but our possibilities, as well.

For that lesson, as well as for the great thrill of watching you endure with that smile on your face, we congratulate you, Townsend Gilbert – and we thank you.

Biorhythm Bunk

By Mark Kevorkian

I shouldn't be writing this column. For the next several days, I'll be taking a risk by merely rolling out of bed in the morning. Going to class could turn out to be a swashbuckling experience. Anything could happen, and whatever it is probably won't be good.

It all started last week at the gym. I was in the midst of a half court pick-up game, on a good team for a change. We were beating the other team quite handily and I was having a field day, throwing shots in from everywhere. For an hour or so I had more moves than Ex-Lax.

Then everything went sour. I began to shoot air balls. All the things which had gone right only moments before suddenly went wrong. I was perplexed.

"Hell," I thought, "even Havlicek has off days. My luck is bound to change." But after I dribbled the ball off my foot and out of bounds on a breakaway layup, I decided that my luck wasn't going to change. So I quit.

Walking off the court, I was stopped by a skinny, short-haired guy with glasses and big ears. I had noticed him earlier. He was the only person I had ever seen in real life who wore black high-top sneakers and no socks.

"Having a bad night, I see," he observed.

"You noticed," I countered. My patience was not at its fullest.

"When is your birthday?" my goggle-eyed friend inquired.

"Why do you ask?"

"If you tell me, I may have a solution, or at least a reason for your sudden ineptitude on the court."

I was a bit suspicious, but he didn't seem like a Moonie or anything. I figured if I told him my birthdate he would go away. "May twentieth," I conceded.

"You wouldn't know the time of birth, would you?" he immediately asked.

Flabbergasted, I said "Nine p.m." and walked down the stairs to the locker room.

After taking a long, hot shower I walked back to my locker. My friend was waiting for me there with a piece of computer read-out paper in his hand.

"It's as I expected," he said sullenly.

I was beginning to find my big-eared shadow amusing. Will I pull through, Doc?" I said and winced.

"It's likely, but you're in for a bad spell ahead," he said seriously.

"You mean I'll be shooting terminal air balls?" I smiled.

"Could be worse. You might not be shooting at all."

I didn't find the conversation as amusing anymore. "All right, Dr. Doom, what are you talking about?" I demanded.

"Biorhythms," he said grimly but with a trace of omniscence.

I didn't have the foggiest notion what he was talking about. "What?" I managed to say.

He smiled for the first time. "I fed your birthdate and time into the computer and I came up with this," he said and handed me the read-out.

I looked at it and said, "Oh." The paper made about as much sense to me as would War and Peace in Russian. Still, I tried to look at it perceptively.

"As you can see," my friend said, "you are about to cross the x-axis. You are approaching a critical day, which is unfortunate. Your biorhythms are not in good shape."

"What are biorhythms?" I managed to say.

"You could say that biorhythms are the mainspring in our internal clock. When the spring is sprung, as yours is about to be, the clock falls out of time. Take care for the next several days," he said as he left me there holding my death warrant in my hands.

That was three days ago. Since then nothing has gone right. I've slipped on the same patch of ice four times. My girlfriend dumped me for a "smart guy who likes computers." I didn't dare ask her to explain further. I also caught a cold so I try to stay in bed because I don't know what waits for me outside. And I haven't even tried to play basketball.

I keep kicking myself for going to the gym that fateful night. I should have known I was approaching a critical day. I keep listening for my clock to start kicking again and feeling for my spring to see if it is still sprung.

But I guess I'm glad I went to the gym that night. If I hadn't, I would have no reason for my sudden streak of bad luck.

SPORTS PROFILE

Nocera- A Bright Future

By Randy Briggs

Jim Nocera has saved the Catamount hoop fortunes from going completely down the drain during the past month. Although Nocera is only a freshman, he performs like a veteran who looks relaxed in every situation. He shoots with a deft touch and drives to the hoop with the utmost proficiency. For his 6'5" size he can rebound with players much taller than himself.

Coach Peter Salzberg saw great potential and ability in Nocera that would probably not develop until his sophomore and junior seasons. For a young player Nocera has been truly remarkable. He has been the team's top scorer in at least half of Vermont's games, and instrumental in all of the Cat's victories thus far.

Nocera has always known success in basketball. Peering his one year at Worcester Academy his team recorded a 20-2 record. In addition, Worcester won the New England prep school championship. Personally he averaged 13 points per game. So we can see that Nocera was an experienced high school player when he ventured to the University of Vermont.

"I want to put Vermont on the basketball map"

---Jim Nocera

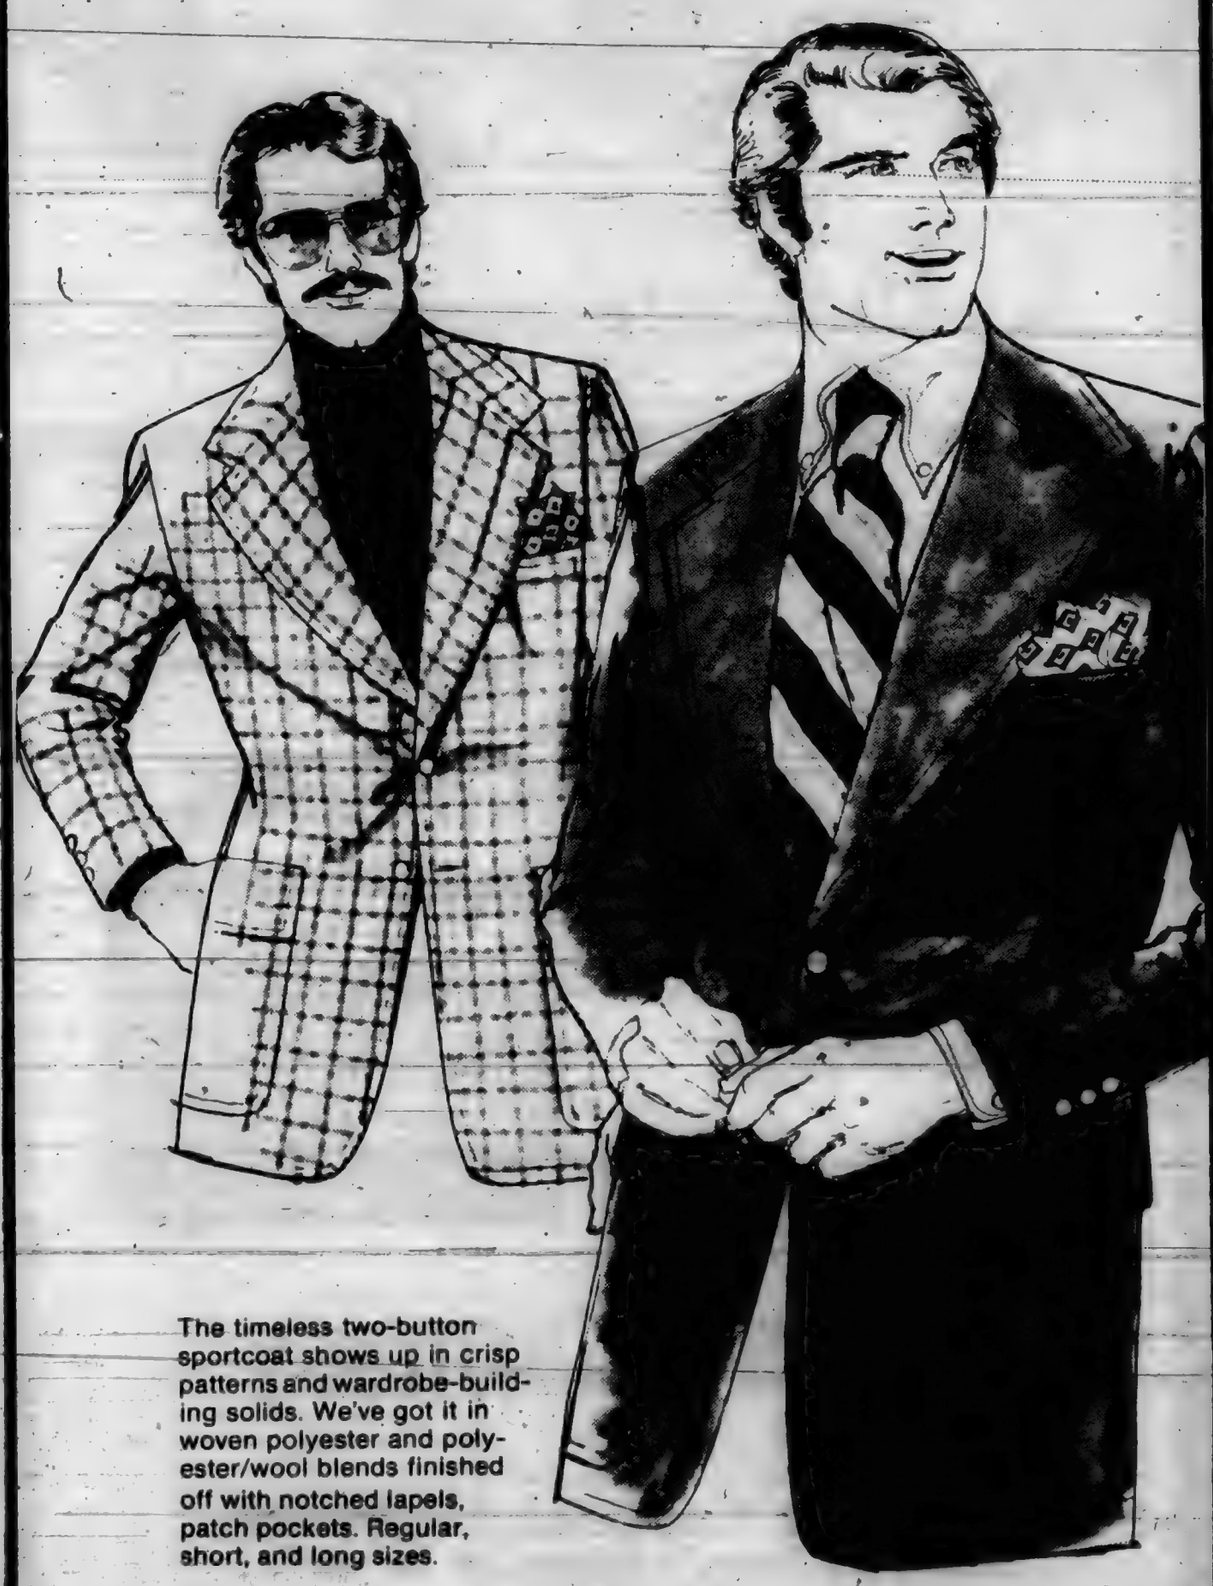
With the more patterned offensive game that Vermont plays, it is a shame that a player who has a background of fastbreak basketball has to endure it. Nocera has adjusted very well. "The style of ball at Vermont is a lot different than it was at Worcester. We play a controlled fast break here. At Worcester we played fast ball all the time." In Jim's mind, there is no doubt about what pace he excels at. "My game is suited to quickness with a lot of movement. Next year we may do more fast breaking, but we still have more speed too." Even with Nocera's contributions to UVM basketball, there are a few things that he wishes would change. "I think the students should show a lot more spirit than they do. I feel that if we were winning,the spirit would be there." Despite two winning seasons in the past three years, basketball still lags behind hockey in popularity. Nocera hopes to change this. His goals were quite clear. "I want to help put Vermont on the basketball map. Before I leave here I also want to get Vermont into the NCAA's."

Nocera conceded that there were many reasons for the Cats' inconsistent play of the past month. "We made a lot of basic mistakes this year. We played far too many 30 or 35 minute games. We would go through 5 or 10 minute stretches and do everything wrong." The result was several large defeats at the hands of Fairfield, Mississippi State and Florida.

The necessity to succeed is a burning desire for Nocera. When asked if he had been satisfied with his performance this year, he responded as any true perfectionist would. "I'm never really satisfied with the way I play. When we lose I always look back and remember the things that I did wrong and then practice them. I feel that I always can do better than what I have done."



Without question Vermont's freshmen recruits have performed well. Along with Nocera, the play of Dave Correll and Corey Wielgus has sparked the Cats. Nocera commented "Correll and Weilgus have excelled this year. I feel they will be even more confident next year. They play with so much heart it's unbelievable."

Vermont still needs to add several big men to make a strong run at next year's ECAC playoffs. UVM will lose three big men this year and will need help up front in order to compliment Mike Kern and Nocera. "We need a couple of big kids," remarked Nocera. "We also need another guard. A big guard would fill our needs perfectly."

Nocera has done about everything you can ask of a freshman. He has worked hard and earned a starting forward position. He began to blossom in the Vermont Classic. Nocera also was the Cat's lone representative on the All-Tournament team, a very surprising thing for a freshman. His biggest personal thrill was playing before 19,000 people in New Mexico. "I've never been so awed in my life," Nocera said. He continued, "The Ohio State game was a true spectacle. Even though I didn't play much, I could feel the tension and pressure on the bench. It was a great experience." Nocera is such a fine team player that he is willing to pay the price in order to achieve success.

Sports Roundup

Trackmen Squelch SLU

By Bernie Gagnon

Freshmen Joe McClallen, Charlie Claudio and captain Dick Emberley combined for 35 Vermont points as the University of Vermont Men's Track Team upset St. Lawrence 66 to 61 and knocked off Colgate 66-60 Saturday.

Emberley won the long jump (21'8") and placed second in the 440 (53.0) and triple jump (44'5"). He also took a fourth in the 60 yard high hurdles (8.0). McClallen won the 60 yard dash (6.3), the 300 yard run (33.5), and placed third in the long jump (21'4"). Claudio stole first in the high jump by allowing the fewest misses, as he and the other two remaining competitors failed to clear 6'8". He won the event at 6'6" and also placed first in the 35 lb. weight. In addition, Claudio placed fourth in the shot put.

Andy Voorhis placed third in the two-mile with a time of 9:36. Vermont clinched the meet with an outstanding team effort in the mile relay, in which UVM needed to take first or second in the event to win the overall meet. The relay team of John Looney, Kevin Hanlon, Larry Cunningham, and Jim Briand captured second place. Briand, running his first meet of the year, ran the anchor leg to hold off a quickly closing Colgate runner.

Eric Benson and Ryan Rickarby took first and second place in the pole vault while Ed Nemeth placed second in the 880, and Dwight Triblehorn captured third in the 1000.

The men's and women's track teams will host their last home meet of the season on Saturday, Feb. 11th. The men will face Plattsburgh and Albany State in a tri-meet, while the women take on UMass and Albany.

Huskies Nip Women Icers

By Melissa Brown

Donna Breneau's four goals and one assist paced the University of Connecticut Huskies past the University of Vermont Women's Ice Hockey Team 7-4 last Saturday at Leddy Park.

The game started out well for the Cats. Right wing Kim Nalen scored early in the first period assisted by center Heidi Winslow. Cathy Sagaser followed several minutes later with her first of two goals in the game, ably assisted by Paula Priestley. The Catamounts were unable to contain the scrappy and aggressive UConn team, however, as the Huskies retaliated with three quick goals to take a 3-2 lead at the end of the first period.

Eight seconds into the second period Cathy Sagaser scored on a pass from Paula Priestley. Sagaser skated in and took a low shot from outside which eluded the UConn goalie completely. The game remained deadlocked at 3-3 for much of the period with both teams having some excellent shots. Sagaser almost had her hat trick in the goal but the play was whistled dead and the goal discounted. UConn scored their fourth goal which put them out front for the remainder of the game. Several minutes later Bruneau picked up her second goal as the Huskies took a 5-3 lead.

Paula Priestley scored early in the third period when she skated in for an unassisted goal to put the Catamounts within range of the Huskies. The score remained 5-4 until UConn's Bruneau scored on a penalty shot, a result of right defense Amy Tutwiler covering the puck in the goalie crease. Bruneau skated in on goalie Ann Bartlett and took a hard shot which landed high in the right side of the goal. Several minutes later Bruneau scored unassisted to give the Huskies the 7-4 win.

UVM is now 4-5-1 and meets perennial rival New Hampshire February 11 at 5:15 at Gutterson.

Swimmers Splashed

A strong Dartmouth team set five Forbush Pool records in beating the University of Vermont's Women's Swim Team 104-26, while UVM bettered two team records.

Sue Connolly from UVM established a new team record in the 1,000 yard freestyle with a time of 14:28.6 and Kim Brown shattered the 200 backstroke record with a time of 2:34.9. Other outstanding performances for UVM included: Kim Brown placed second in both 100 backstroke and 200 backstroke with 1:11.0 and 2:34.9 times respectively. Sarah Moore placed first in the three-meter diving (175.80) and second one-meter diving 162.60. Cathy Forsberg took second in the 100 freestyle with a time of 1:01.05.

Five UVM swimmers produced their best times of the season: Lea Pardee, 200 Free (2:23.08) and the 500 Free (6:43.75); Trish Valicenti in 200 Butterfly with 3:03.1 and 3:46.035 respectively; and Capt. Polly Doyle, 100 Free 1:04.055.

Vermont is now 4-6, as the Cats close the dual meet season this week with a home meet against St. Michaels on Thursday, February 9 and an away trip to Keene State on Saturday, February 11. Several swimmers and divers will attend the New England championship meet at Boston College February 16-18.

Intramural Notes

The Ground Hogs, Med A and Sigma Nu are tied for first place in the A Division Hockey standings. In B Division League 1, Austin 4, Chitt and Topp Wills all have a perfect 1-0 record. Simpson leads the league with 2 wins in B Division League 2, while FIJI and Hotel Manor are both tied for second. Four teams are tied with one win apiece in Hockey's C Division. Jeanne Manco, Sabers, Marsh 4 and Davis all lead the puck.

The Mother Puckers and the Angels both lead the Women's Hockey A Division. In B Division ACO and Tri Delt both have perfect 1-0 records. Wilks and Slightly Off are tied for the lead in the Women's C Division.

In other intramural events, Bowling and Squash schedules start February 14th and the Arm Wrestling tournament begins sign ups on February 9. For more information call the Intramural Department in room 213 of Patrick Gym at 656-3070.

Vermont Hockey Weathers Northeastern's Attack

By Steven Larose

The defensive antics of Randy Koch and goalie Sylvain Turcotte reinforced the Cats' sagging corps and enabled the University of Vermont Hockey team to breeze through a seven minute Northeastern powerplay and collect a 5-3 victory in Boston Saturday afternoon.

Koch was hastily shoved back onto defense to cover for Vermont's loss of Bill McAlduff and Greg Wilkie, where he covered acrobatic Turcotte with the greatest of ease during a seven minute power play. The snuff-out squads of Bill Ford – Jim Duffy, Jim Murphy – Andy Halford and Bill Reber – Dave Otness clamped down on Northeastern, allowing Vermont to keep a 2-1 lead into the second period.

The Huskies pulled even at 2:06 of the third period, making it 3-3. The Cats then concentrated on Northeastern's goalie, and broke through to go ahead 4-3 with 17:16 left. On that goal, Craig Homola had scooped up the puck off the backboards to feed Louis Cote in the slot, but the pass bounced off a Huskie defenseman to Reber. He then fired a forehander inside the far post that put the Cats ahead.

Turcotte then smothered everything in sight to keep the Cats in the driver's seat while the clock ran down. Vermont then was able to add a bit of insurance, as Halford took a pass on wing from Chris Zimmerman. Halford then fired a low shot towards the nets, in hopes that Zimmerman would pick it up and tuck it away. As it turned out, Halford's shot slid in unaided and the Cats led 5-3 with 13:28 to go.

Turcotte wrapped up the win for the Cats by trapping a barrage of shots for the remainder of the game, and depriving Northeastern's forwards of any rebound shots. The win upped the Cats record to 12-11, and boosted them to sixth in Division I.

The Cats took a 1-0 lead at 7:20 of the first period when Jim Murphy put in a unassisted breakaway drive from the left wing faceoff circle. Later in the first period, Cote capitalized on a five-on-three powerplay when he scored from the inside right point.

Wilkie got into a shouting and shoving match in the first period, which evolved into illegal checking and a solid whack to Wilkie's face. When Wilkie retaliated, he was ejected from the game. That left Vermont's defense dangerously thin, and caused Koch to move to defense. The Cats survived the powerplay and then scored when Halford led a two on one break and Cote put away the rebound. However, Northeastern quickly tied it up with goals in the late second and early third periods. Just thirty-eight seconds later, Reber poked in the winning goal.

Earlier in the week, the Cats were clipped by Cornell 6-4. Vermont was ahead 3-0 in the second period, but Cornell blew the Cats off the ice with a three goal streak. Both Cornell Coach Dick Bertrand and Boston Coach Parker praised UVM for being aggressive and fighting to the finish.

HOCKEY PREVIEW

By Jim Fletcher

The Cats have the opportunity to climb back into the playoff race this week as Vermont faces two easy games and one tough one. If the Cats can win all three, then they'll need only two wins – possibly only one – in their last four games with Clarkson, UNH, BC and BU to make the playoffs, and may well have the necessary momentum to get them.

Those games don't look as bad as they used to. Clarkson has been unimpressive lately without leading scorer Kevin Zappia, who is out for the season with an injury. UNH's defense is still questionable, while BC's defense is in the same shape injury-wise as the Catamount defense. The Cats lost very narrow decisions while playing very well against BU 6-4 and Cornell 6-4. By comparison, BU crushed BC 12-5 while Cornell whalloped Dartmouth 12-2 in recent action.

But before worrying about the last four games, the Cats must win the next three. Saturday afternoon, Vermont makes their first appearance at Colgate. Colgate has the worst record (3-14), offense (3.00 gpg) and defense (7.35 gpg) in the league. They have played very well lately however (4-3 over RPI, 7-3 over Penn), so the Cats shouldn't be overconfident.

Tuesday, the Cats go for revenge at St. Lawrence. The Saints beat the Cats 6-3 in Gutterson back in November, but the Saints have gone 2-11 since then. SLU was 5-11 before their game with Colgate and had a 3.88 gpg offense and 5.88 gpg defense.

Thursday, red hot RPI, complete with imitation Martian space helmets, will visit Gutterson. A win here is mandatory if the Cats are going to make the playoffs. The Engineers swept the North Country road trip for the first time in their history with a slight upset of Clarkson 7-3 and a 4-1 win over SLU. Before that, the Engineers suffered narrow losses to BU (winning goal scored with 1:50 left), and BC (shorthanded goal in o.t.)

Unlike past RPI teams, this year's edition is a defensively oriented team. They have the fifth best defense in the league at 4.38 gpg while the offense is 11th at 4.31 gpg. The Cats won the first meeting in Troy in December, 3-2, in a hard-hitting contest.

THE CONTENDERS

Also competing for the bottom playoff spot is RPI, the top contender at the moment. They have nothing to lose and everything to gain this week with a game at BU tomorrow night and a game with Cornell on Tuesday. If they win either of these games, or beat the Cats, then they'll be in great shape with their last six games at home.

Northeastern was all but mathematically eliminated after the 5-3 loss to the Cats, and an overtime loss to Harvard in the Beanpot made things worse. The Huskies desperately need a win over Clarkson tomorrow night or an upset in the Beanpot consolation over BC to even start thinking about the playoffs.

Yale's defense couldn't hold off UNH as the Elis dropped a 6-3 decision to the Wildcats. Yale is three games below .500 and desperately needs a sweep at Princeton and Penn this weekend to keep their hopes alive.

Providence – The Friars are in a good position to challenge. Their Tuesday game with Dartmouth was postponed due to the snowstorm. A win in that game or a win over UNH on Wednesday would practically guarantee the Friars at least a .500 record. Most of their remaining games are at home so they should do well.

Dartmouth – The Big Green is in its annual late January – early February slump with a four game losing streak. Dartmouth needs at least one win this week in games with Providence and Cornell in order to stay alive in the race. The last week of the season will be their biggest obstacle with two games against Brown and one against Harvard.

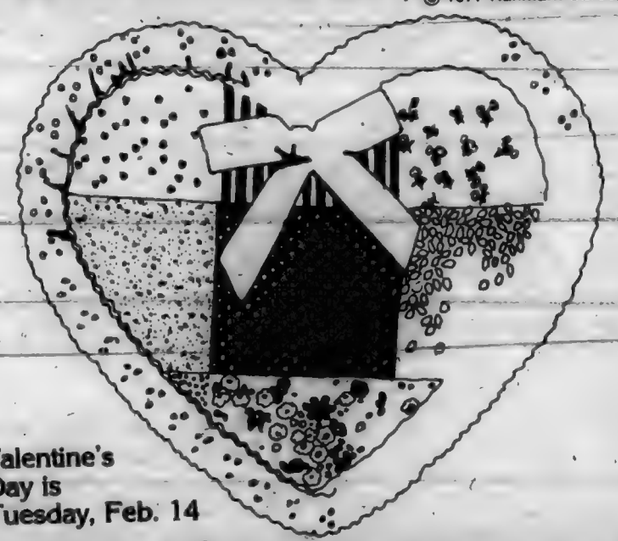
Once again, Middlebury showed its strength in the Giant Slalom, leaving three racers in the top ten. Sara McNeal won the event for Middlebury while Sara Hoyt and Tammy Hogarty finished third and fifth respectively for the Big Green. Dartmouth recorded sixty-six points, enough to take second place, by having racers in the number two and seven positions. UVM took third place as Liz Warner and Muffy Arnet finished eighth and eleventh for the Cats.



Williams won the regular slalom event with seventy-nine points against UVM's 64.5 and Middlebury's fifty-six. Dartmouth skier Debbie Tarinelli took first place but was unable to put anyone else on the top ten. Williams finished strongly, taking third, fourth and seventh positions. Gail Labaron led the Cats in fifth place, backed by Mellisa Papworth in the ninth spot.

When asked about his team's performance, Coach Perry Bland answered, "Dartmouth is the defending national champ and we've beaten them. We gave a solid performance but Middlebury is a very tough team."

Coach Bland is looking forward to the Dartmouth Carnival this weekend. The controyersy in the men's competition last weekend, Bland commented, will fire up Dartmouth to the point where they will be a tough squad to beat. "It's a prestigious carnival and we're ready for it." Reynolds, one of UVM's leading Alpine Skiers, has an injured hand but she should be able to race this weekend. So far this season, Middlebury had been the only team able to top the Cats and hopes are high that no other team will be able to obtain that goal this season.

ARTS/ENTERTAINMENT

Christopher Parkening

A Master of Technical Wizardry, But...

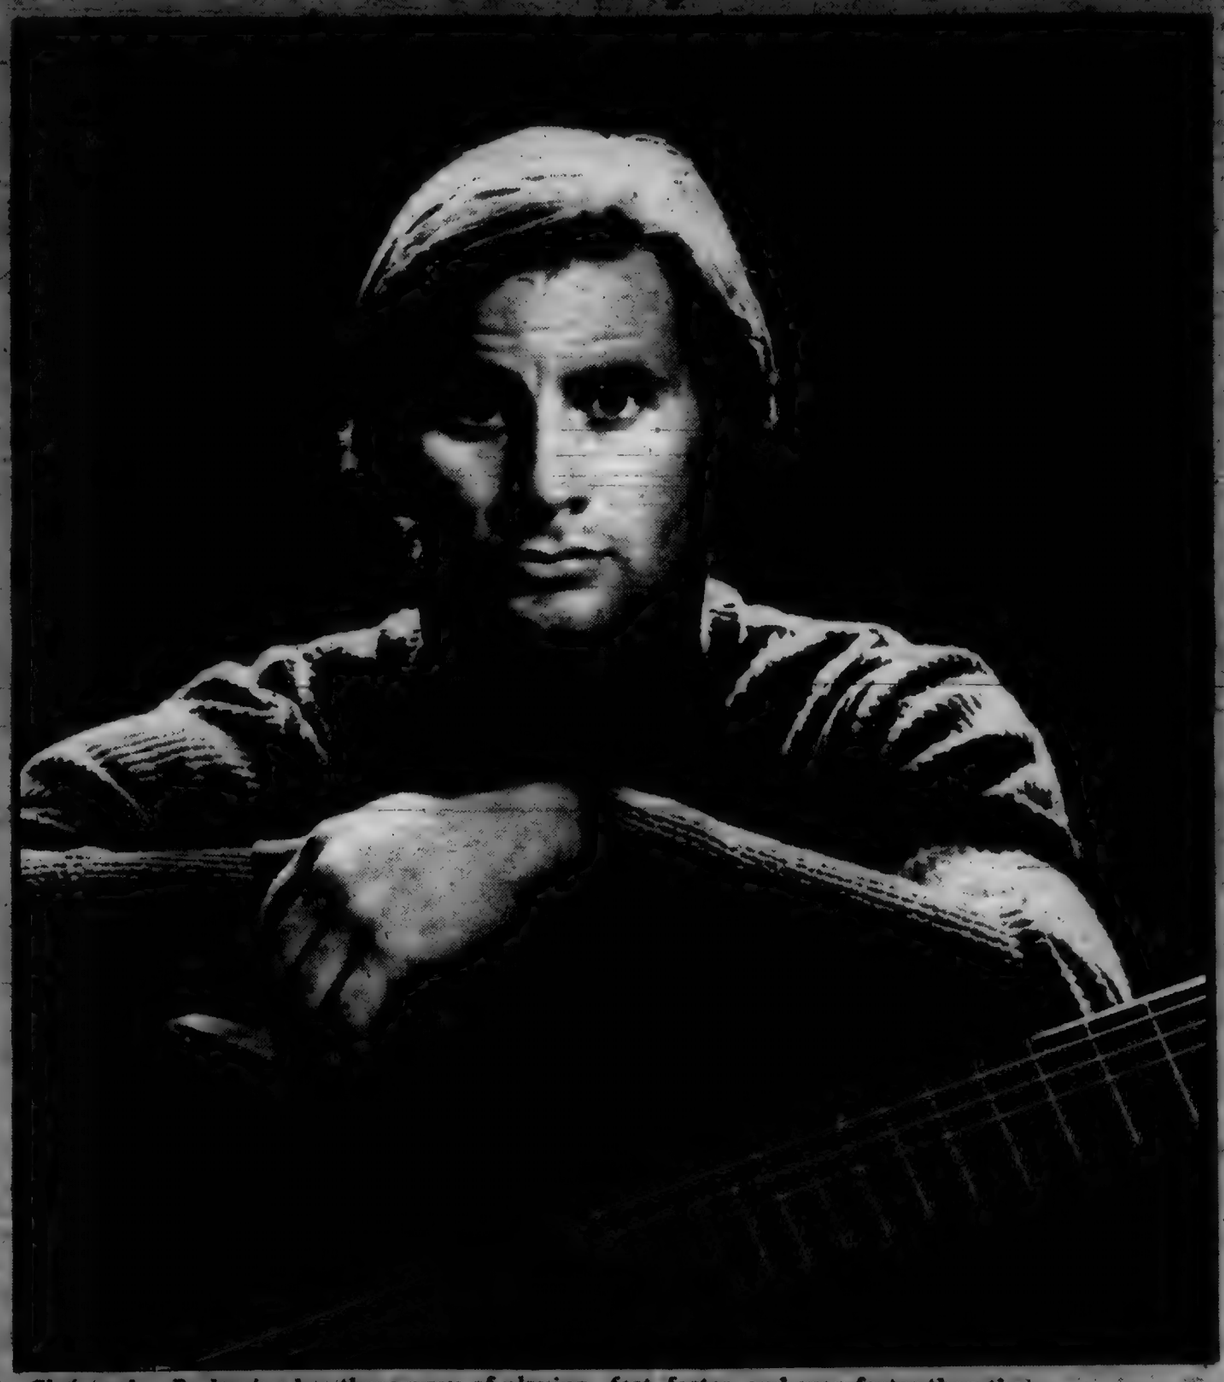
By Tricia John

Wind Christopher Parkening up and he plays. He comes in a brown turtle neck sweater, brown corduroys and carries a guitar. Christopher Parkening has three ways of playing: fast, faster, and even faster than that.

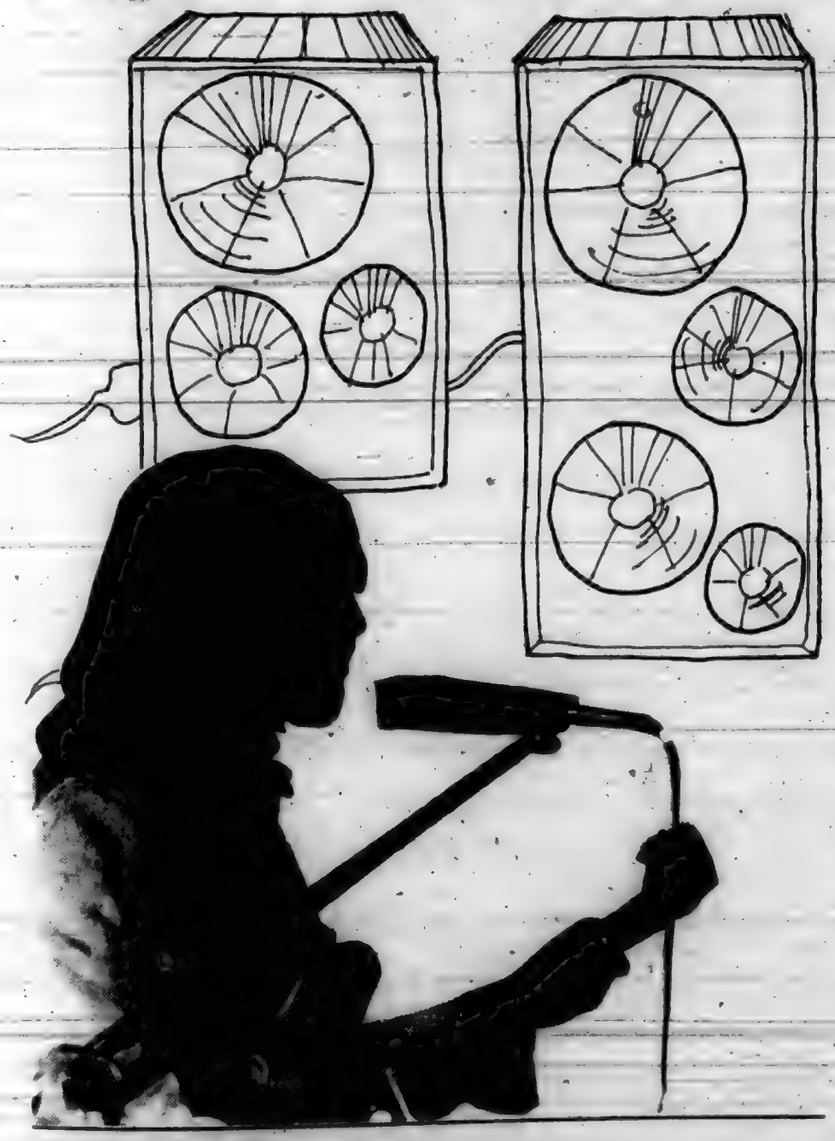


Christopher Parkening's Tuesday night concert was a musical embarrassment. I honestly cannot understand why he is so acclaimed – how he ever became an international star. Looks help – he is without question one of the most handsome international stars ever to walk into Memorial Auditorium. I saw this young Adonis for the first time when I was a freshman, and in my childish infatuation with his brown turtleneck and brown corduroys (the very same), I thought he played the guitar well too. But weathered music critics don't fall for looks alone. You need talent. And feeling. Parkening can only play the guitar quickly, or shall I say, in a hurry. In post haste he got us out of the Auditorium by 9:30 (the concert started after 8:00, and, as my date said, "the only good thing about this concert was that it was short." Indeed.)

In some ways we cannot blame the less than dapper Parkening for his less than adequate amount of inspiration. Playing in that place is much like playing into a brick wall – the music simply dissipates into the air and does not resound, but just dies altogether. The rich tones of the guitar are lost and the various subtle timbres are often not even heard. If the only way the Lane Series could afford him was to have him perform in Memorial Auditorium, he really shouldn't have come at all. This concert was clearly not worth the price of admission.

Parkening played the greater half of his concert with no emotion. Except for the encore there was no Bach, no large work or suite, nothing outside the ordinary competent guitarist's repertoire. Every piece was short, none lasted more than five minutes or so, and only in the two Villa-Lobos preludes and etude did he show any glimpse of passion for the music and instrument. In the Villa-Lobos the tempo was more varied and although the playing was rough in some places, he seemed to enjoy the music. His interpretations are always conservative, but in the Villa-Lobos he put a little more imagination into it than usual.

In Gulliani's Variations on a Theme of Handel, he actually had to start over again. Sure, this happens all the time in student recitals – we expect it and forget about it. But a false start from an international star? Not to mention the ten or twelve measures he left out in the Sor Allegro. He didn't mention them so neither shall I.



Parkening's musical problems saturated the performance, but the audience showed their undying admiration with a standing ovation. I was surprised that the crowd of earnest guitar lovers were this satisfied with the concert. I wasn't, and to alter slightly the wise remark of my friend – the only good thing about this review is that it is short. Indeed.

Christopher Parkening has three ways of playing - fast, faster, and even faster than that.

Watts Recording Studio

Sound Never Dies At Living Learning

By Suzanne Karkus

A thin, bearded man stands at a large control desk adjusting a multitude of black dials and switches. Inside his small glassed-in room the hiss of wind and water grows loud, echos and becomes full and vibrant as he turns a knob. Abruptly, he flicks a switch and the noise dies. He stands with his hands on his hips, smiling with satisfaction.

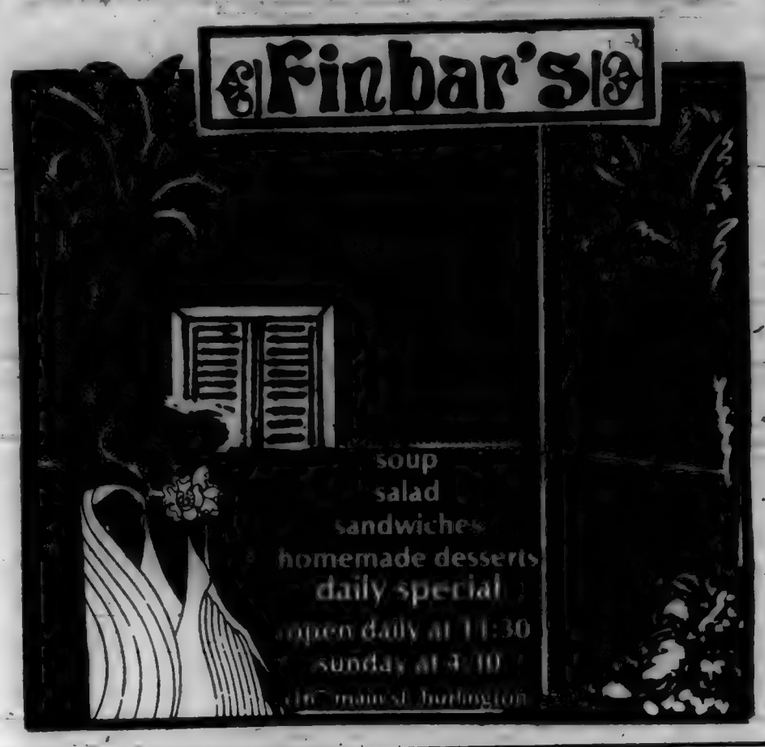
This small room is actually a recording studio located at the center of the Living/Learning labyrinth, and it has been the subject of persistent rumours since Bruce Nelson, the man at the controls, first arranged for its construction.

The studio is part of a student designed program where eleven L/L residents known as the Watt's Suite (under the supervision of Program Directors Bruce Nelson and George Sweet) learn how to use the taping equipment and eventually how to operate as sound engineers. It is also intended to provide local and on-campus musicians with inexpensive, high quality recording.

The rumour which began to circulate after the program was approved was that students were playing with thousands of dollars worth of equipment blindly handed over to them by school officials, and that they were using the studio solely for their own enjoyment.

Actually, the Watt's Suite was allocated more money than any other program in the Living/Learning Center, but most of the money was spent on the construction of the soundproof studio. According to Nelson, it came to well under the approximate budget of $2,500. The equipment is owned by Nelson and rented by the University for a nominal fee.

> " Inside his small glassed-in room the hiss of wind and water grows loud, echos, and becomes full and vibrant as he turns a knob."



"My investment in the studio is three to five times that of the Center," Nelson claims. "What the Center did spend was a loan, in a sense."

The studio has great potential as a profit-making organization, although it has gotten off to a slow start. The services it will offer are a bargain. For instance, musicians within Living/Learning can record a four-track tape of their music for $10 per hour. The same tape made at a professional studio could cost as much as $75 to $80, Nelson estimated. Other UVM students can record for $15 per hour; it costs local musicians $30 per hour.

The studio, which was set up at the start of the school year, has encountered several problems which have hampered its productivity. Initially, some of the equipment ordered didn't arrive until November. Nelson then had to reconstruct the sound system to fit the new studio's specifications. Instructing the rest of the students in the suite in how to use the equipment ensued, but progress was slowed as final exams began.

"But we are now ready for business," Nelson said. "The only thing stopping us at this point is getting the word around that we're offering these

Winkler's One Man Show

By Nancy Taggart

"There are two kinds of people in the world: people who put lamp shades on lamps and people who put lamp shades on their heads," the worn out manager tells aspiring young actor, Andy Schmidt. Belonging in the latter category of people, Andy will do anything, from dressing in absurd costumes to enduring great pain, if it will get him a laugh. Like its main character, The One and Only is a movie that goes to great length to get laughs and it often works.

Like the recent money-makers, such as Star Wars and Saturday Night Fever, The One and Only rates low in plot and high in likeability. It is a little movie, about a little person, who thinks he possesses the biggest talent in the world. Henry Winkler, who proved he could act in Heroes, firmly establishes his comic ability with his performance as the zany and egotistical Andy Schmidt. Winkler's character is a curious mixture of someone you know you should hate, but can't help liking. Kim Darby, who plays the long suffering romantic interest, keeps asking herself, "Why do I love him?" And so does the audience. Yet, in spite of his incredible self-centeredness, there is something appealing in Winkler's insecure and brash character. When confronted with a beautiful girl, he asks, in awe, "Do you ever pick your nose?" How can you hate someone so human?

Unfortunately, although Winkler's performance is energetic and pleasantly unpredictable, the plot is not.

The uninspired storyline follows the formula of: boy meets girl, boy gets girl, and boy loses girl, with very few imaginative twists. But The One and Only, destined to be an easily forgettable film, does provide some bright moments of comedy and a few thoroughly enjoyable performances.

The supporting cast consists of several colorful characters, both the ordinary and the unusual. Andy Schmidt's kinky co-workers include a gruff, seedy manager and a nymphomaniac midget. The stodgy in-laws, a pipe-smoking college man, and a pompous drama coach all provide stuffy contrasts foils for Winkler's off-the-wall character.

Like the recent money-makers, such as Star Wars and Saturday Night Fever, The One and Only rates low in plot and high in likeability.

The one disappointingly undeveloped character is the female lead played by Kim Darby. An actress with a fair amount of talent, Darby is given little to do in her colorless role of Winkler's admirer. She spends most of her time on the screen smiling indulgently at Winkler's antics, or looking at him with patient understanding. As bland as her part is, Darby almost manages to project a sense of strength and stability into her character. But unfortunately for the actress, her character's emotions linger quietly in the background and are easily overlooked due to Winkler's flashy and dominating presence.

But it is this constant presence and brash performance of Winkler that make The One and Only so lively. The film is, almost, a showcase for the actor's talents. Winkler sings, in a restaurant, to the embarrassment of his date Darby. Winkler acts, hamming it up in a college play. Winkler does impressions (his Peter Lorre is recognizable). And Winkler even wrestles in a stylish blond wig and pink tights. But, most important, without putting a lamp shade on his head, Winkler can make people laugh. And in the crowded confines of Merrills, there was frequent and hearty laughter last Friday night. (The one-and-only Andy Schmidt would be proud of Henry Winkler.)

Bodhran, Bouzouki, and Uillean Pipes

Traditional Irish musicians Patrick Sky, Mark Roberts, and Bill Crozier.

By Peter Relick

A miracle of sorts occurred in Room 115 of the Living/Learning Center recently. On Sunday night the Potshill Band transformed a morose group of survivors from the winter chill into a foot-stomping crowd with the enthusiasm of beach frolickers in the Bahamas.

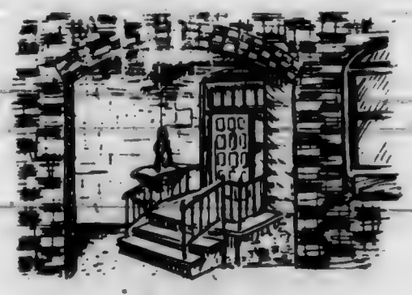
The exact time of the transformation is unimportant. Reports indicate that sometime between 7:00 and 9:30 Patrick Sky and his Potstill Band touched these people with the simple expressiveness of Irish Traditional Music.

The group of three musicians performed reels, jigs, and hornpipes (which is a dance, not an instrument, as band member Patrick Sky pointed out.) They incorporated an enthusiasm into their playing which was picked up by the audience, and even the most apprehensive were soon moving their bodies or tapping their fingers or toes to the beat.

Sky performed on the Uillean Pipes, whose tone resembles that of a bag-pipe, but the wind for the instrument is supplied by a small bellows which is pumped constantly by the right arm. The Uillean Pipes are a bit more mellow in sound than their more well-known cousins. Sky also played a bit of guitar, and took a try on the Tinwhistle.

Mark Roberts, the woodwind and percussion specialist of the group, dazzled the crowd with the hypnotizing movement of his fingers over the sound-holes of the Tinwhistle. During one of his solos, most of the audience had their eyes riveted to his lightning-fast movements as he glided over the instrument.

Bill Crozier focused his efforts on the Mandolin and Bouzouki. He showed real skill in his mandolin playing and served as a great addition to the group in both background and lead playing. At one point he and Mark Roberts pooled their talent and did a duet on the Tinwhistle. The result was fantastic. Both pipers sped through their routines with the nonchalance of someone reading the morning paper.



Roberts also did a short term with the Bodhran, which is a flat drum. This addition of a "rhythm section" made those selections irresistable.

Both Patrick Sky and Mark Roberts have visited Ireland where they picked up many of the tunes they now perform. They learned them directly from balladeers and minstrels and they gave the audience a good insight into the work which was involved in finding some of the pieces they performed.

Patrick Sky and his Potstill band are minstrels in the truest sense of the word. Moving from one performance to another, they play their music, having a good time doing it, and leaving a bit of unerasable joy in the hearts of the listeners.

A Touch of Class and A Lot of Music

By Tricia John

Evening jackets, red velvet bow ties and shiny patent leather shoes, are trademarks of the familiar Concord String Quartet, who seems to love Burlington as much as Burlington loves it. On January 31, the second date of their three appearances in this season's Lane Series, the Concord's playing once again left little to be desired – consistently spirited, imaginative and intelligent.

Subtlety has always been a part of the Concord's musical vocabulary. Their first piece was Haydn's Quartet in C Major, Op. 20, no. 2 – an energetic composition with intensely lyrical thematic material. The Concord presented the first three movements with little dynamic range, the music being kept alive by the even tempo and pristine phrasing of each player. There might have been some intonation trouble in the third movement, but this was easily compensated for in the finale, an emotional four subject fugue saturated in dynamic changes. The quartet is indeed beautifully written; its movements relate to each other in a way that is understandable to the listener first hearing the quartet. The Concord definitely contributed to my understanding of the music – their interpretation was warm, subdued and lyrical.

"Can music be silence? First we have to strip away some of our preconceptions of the definition."

The Quartet jumped a century and a half for the next piece to Ben Johnston's Crossings written from 1966 to 1974. I don't believe it would be incorrect to say that sometimes all of us have problems understanding and enjoying contemporary music – anything written past Ives or Copland. Dissonance, constantly changing rhythm, syncopation and brutal atonality leave us cold and uncomfortable most of time. "I certainly wouldn't go out and buy that," we say to lying nor do I know the composer but liked the piece each other during intermission. When someone actually confesses to like something modern we think it's either because that person is lying just to appear with the times or he knows the composer personally.

At intermission I admitted to liking Crossings and got dubious looks from my friends. I wasn't because it was tangible and the music approachable to my Romantic ears. The composition had three movements, and was described as an "angry, expressive triptych" by first violinist Mark Sokol. The piece captures a range of emotions, culminating grandly in the final movement.

I think what got everyone disillusioned was the second movement called "The Silence". For about two minutes (seemed eternity with the man next to me on the verge of giggling) the players and the audience were quiet – I'm sure all of us were doing multiplication tables or saying the Nicene Creed in our heads. I wish my silent experience could have been more profound. But what really were we to think about? The previous movement?

I think that this silence can only be effective to those who know what is to come. Mark Sokol describes the second movement as a "chasm one has to travel to get to the third movement." But without any knowledge of the energy and beauty of the finale, the silence has no meaning.

Can silence be music? First we have to strip away some preconceptions of our definition. I'm beginning to believe that music is merely any sound or absence of sound played (or not played) in a specific period of time, or a framework of time. Music must have a beginning and an end. Composer John Cage has of course toyed with this idea of music – music as space in time, c'est tout. The trick is using this extended idea of music effectively. In Crossings I question its significance.

The third movement – "Ascent" was a sumptuous theme and variations on the old American folk tune Amazing Grace. The performance was impeccable, the music dramatic and rich. One variation strayed quite far from the theme while creating a barren, hollow and eerily dissonant tone. Cellist Norman Fishcher delivered a beautiful solo (in a way his cello sounded like a harmonica) above the subtle fluttering line of the other three instruments. Indeed, all soli were graceful and faithful to the different tones of the variations. The Ives influence was unmistakable in many variations, culminating at the beginning of the final variation with a rich, luscious chord modulation that filled the hall in double forte. I was truly impressed with the Concord's execution of this marvelous third movement.

The final quartet performed was op. 161 in G Major by Franz Schubert. It was coincidentally Schubert's 181st birthday, and this performance was the finest of tributes to him. Only Beethoven's late quartets surpass the intensity of most of Schubert's chamber music – music which reached artistic perfection with the Cello Quintet in C. (They played this last December exquisitely.)

Op. 161 (written in ten days – his last work) is not the greatest of Schubert's quartets, but it's filled with lovely melodies underlaid with constant tension and restiveness. The Concord did a beautiful job of retaining this tension while simultaneously maintaining that melancholic sweetness that makes Schubert's music so emotional much of the time.

The performance was precise and transparent, each musician articulated clearly and remained in balance with the others (separate but equal?). Especially noteworthy were Norman Fischer's brilliant cello playing, as well as John Kochanowski's exceptional viola passages.

services."

However, word should travel quickly. Nelson says that Burlington is lacking in low-cost recording studios, and several musicians have already expressed an interest in the studio's services.

So it seems that UVM students will be hearing from the Watt's Suite, whether they are musicians or not. But if you hear strange echoes and moans while eating at Walter's Snack Bar in Living/learning, don't worry, it's only a couple of students experimenting with sound on eight tracks of tape.

An Incredible Evening

By Laura Bell

"And now I'm going to shoot this sound right through your bubbling voices," said Percussionist David Moss over an array of instruments ranging from Tibetan bell-gongs and Chinese zithers, to bertonia sonic sculptures and a room full of participant mouths babbling and grunting their primordial improvisations. Calling his act "non-connotative music," this magician loosened up the crowd at Living/Learning's "Evening of Incredibleness" last Friday night with a vast spectrum of percussion sounds and "vocal textures" which kept everyone wondering where they were really coming from.

Seated in stocking feet inside what once was a typical drum-set transformed into a cage of dangling gongs, bells, pot-covers, tom-toms, tubes, and whistles, Moss used his voice, feet, arms, and spontaneous musical sense to direct the performance. "Whenever I play, people laugh," said Moss. "I use the rhythm impulses of their giggling as an inspiration. What sounds like a rhythm once every four and a half hours is more structured than most think – I divide my music into fifty to sixty sound-stations. It's very storytelling. Soon the audience got into the act. A few uninhibited hams-at-heart got progressive," he laughs, "but if anyone can write it down, I'd love to have it." One highlight involved an ethiopian horn and whirling pool-hoses to create Moog-like tones; another by bending a long sheet of metal. Tunes entitled, "Gathering Momentum," "Rolling Sound," and "Drumsong" succeeded in taking the audience's "ears to a place where they can be happy."

"I'm not a purist mime," says Sandra Lewis, "I like to talk too much." Her unique style combines modern dance, personal poetry, and props. Sandra's mime workshop, "Massage", first exposed her new inventions to the Burlington crowd last fall; and her performances have been packed ever since. "To experience her tonight," said one, "really hits home; her spirit is refreshing." "I like to relate back to my childhood," says Lewis, "to recreate those fanciful wishes." Her first number, "Wishbone", included spoken poetry and repeated dance movements. "The Referee", a comical play on Ref signals, brilliantly captured the art of gesture and their chance to isolate, undulate, and exaggerate their gestures through mime. Sandra's finale blended the Indian sign language with the deaf sign language expanding them into dance. Behind this screen of fantasy Sandra Lewis perfected an imaginary world with a sharp wit and explosive expression.

********

The crowd thickened when Juggler George Sherwood began manipulating boxes, ,balls, and flaming torches in threes, fours, and fives, generally titled by Sherwood a 'kinetic art.' "It's not everyday you see a five-ball cascade," says Sherwood, "that takes a few more balls!" Formally a member of the "Celebration Mime Theater," Sherwood's gymnastic, magical, and juggling skills have drawn crowds from the shopping malls of downtown Burlington, to the out-door theaters of Boulder, Colorado. Sherwood says he likes the "oohs and ahhs" from the crowd, but believes juggling also develops coordination and becomes easy exercise for the mind as well as the body. "It's an addictive art that should be shared and taught to others," said George. Sherwood's act included three-ball variations, five-hoop showers, numbers juggling, balancing routines complete with Devil-Sticks and Diablo-Devices. He finished his juggling feats with flaming torches. Sherwood insists there isn't enough serious clowning-around in Burlington.

Controversial "Hearts and Minds" Moves Many

By Brad Hill

Half a decade has passed since the last American combat troops left Vietnam, in 1973. The typical college freshman of today was only in Junior High when formal U.S. military presence in Vietnam came to an end. Only a few short years ago, the war was the hottest, most emotional issue on college campuses across the nation. Today, many of the students who walk those same campuses have few significant memories of the war.

It was these same undergraduate students who composed a large proportion of the audience which turned out for Tuesday night's screening of Peter Davis' award winning Vietnam war documentary, Hearts and Minds. Understandably, many were emotionally moved by the film's content. Hearts and Minds revives in living (and dying) color, the nightmares of a terrible ordeal, and gropes for the reasons behind U.S. involvement. Davis' positioning of interviews and the newsreel footage is nothing less than a masterpiece.

One would have to be extremely insensitive not to be upset by sections of this film. We re-witness a famous scene in which a Vietcong prisoner is executed by an ARUN officer with a pistol in the streets of Saigon. We watch sixty-one amputees being fitted with artificial limbs. We see the muddy bags, and the burnt, peeling flesh of napalmal children. We meet an old Saigon man who makes his living by manufacturing children's coffins, he himself having lost seven children to the war.

Irony pervades this movie. In one part, William Westmoreland remarks that Orientals generally place a relatively small value on human life (in comparison with Americans, of course.) This sequence follows a funeral scene of a South Vietnamese soldier, in which his wailing wife and children try to throw themselves into his grave. Later, former airforce pilots describe the "thrill" of the countryside, oblivious to the death and destruction they are raining down upon the local peasantry. In another ironic segment an American Indian ex-marine describes how his officers conditioned him to "hate the Gooks", while simultaneously subjecting him to a constant barrage of racial prejudice.

The movie's most disturbing parts, however, are those which probe the national mentality leading to our involvement in Vietnam. The manipulation and deception practiced by our government becomes painfully obvious in the course of the film. Today, the film clips from old Hollywood propaganda war films seem almost laughable, until we hear Orientals referred to as "savage yellow beasts." Then, there are the old "Red-Scare" propaganda campaigns led by the American Legion, J. Edgar Hoover, and Joseph McCarthy. Today we laugh, but Americans of that era surely took them seriously. Equally thought-provoking are the scenes from a college football game – a coach violently inciting his team before

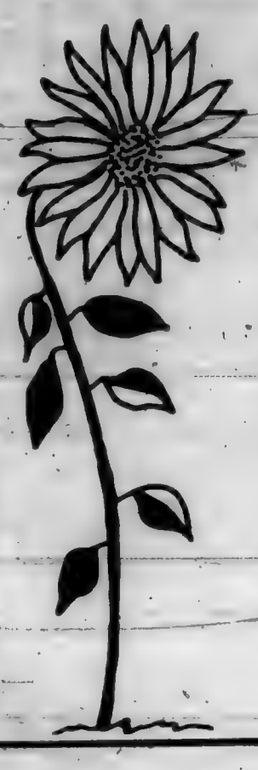
By Jim Wright

The book racks are glutted with grand classics from the Golden Age, all done up in new covers (and higher prices) and you don't need me to tell you that most of them are of interest only to historians, nostalgia buffs and English majors in need of a thesis. There is considerable debate about when the "Golden Age" of SF actually occurred, but it was sometime between 1930 and 1950 (who was it when asked when the Golden Age was, replied: "'thirteen"?) Most of those so-called classics read like the 1968 yellow pages. But, there are happy (nay, enjoyable) exceptions that one stumbles across from time to time. One such find is: War With the Newts (Berkley Books, 241 pp., $1.50) by Karel Capek.



Karel Capek was a Czech and thus wrote in Czechoslavakian, so most of us were not able to read this book when it first was published in 1936. Karel was widely read and even today his works are still being translated into several languages. But Karel is best known for one small contribution he made to language. He is the person who invented and first used the word "Robot."

War details the rise of the Newts, a rare species of salamander about 3½ meters in length and who have the unusual ability to imitate human speech. They are first discovered on a small tropical island by Captain Van Toch (a character who could very well be the Grandfather of Horatio Hornblower). Van Toch takes a liking to these strange, intelligent creatures and soon teaches them to talk and gives them weapons to defend themselves from sharks. The Captain sees them as a tool with which to gather pearls from the ocean's depths, but the Newts are soon doing other things since they are such excellent underwater workers. A whole industry develops around the Newts, an industry similar to that of the slave trade of olden days. But problems begin to arise as the Newts become more educated and as they increase in numbers. The population of the Newts is soon several thousand times that of the human population and suddenly the Newts are demanding more room. They start destroying coastlines, making more shallow waters for them to live in.

Karel writes with a dry, down to earth sense of humor and manages to harpoon everything from international politics and racism to intellectuals and everyday Czechs such as Povondra, the butler who feels responsible for all that had happened because he once had allowed Captain Van Toch in to see Mr. Bondy, a wealthy shipping merchant.

War is indeed, as the cover states, "a truly enduring classic of science fiction." It is also a comical look at humanity. Karel Capek had fun, he had gusto, and he had that rarest of talents – the capacity to make the reader think while laughing.

Drama Doesn't Always Need Words

By Karen Moore

St. Michael's McCarthy Arts presented the Eugene O'Neill Theater Center's National Theater for the Deaf to capacity crowds at St. Michael's Playhouse on February fifth and sixth.

Winners of the 1977 Tony Award for Theatrical Excellence, the company offers an "exuberant new medium – a theatre of visual language." Not only do the versatile actors and actresses relate the drama in sign language, but through ingenious pantomimes they create pictures with their bodies. Although I could not comprehend most of the sign language, it was quite graceful and added to the dance-like quality of the mime. One of the actors played as narrator, speaking as he signed. Sometimes, however, his hand movements were so expressive that his words were not necessary.

With no need for an intricate set, multiple props or fancy costumes, the cast cleverly related a fairy tale for a special children's performance Sunday afternoon. This division of the Theater, The Little Theater of the Deaf, also acted requests from the audience. This year's season performance is Alexander Dumas' The Three Musketeers, which was executed at 8:00 p.m. The group also gave four workshops, open to the public, on Monday.

The National Theater of the Deaf has existed for eleven years to promote the world's understanding and perception of, the deaf and they plan to return to New England again in their 1979 fall tour. In the United States, they have given 2,000 performances in forty-seven states. The company has also been invited to three continents including countries such as France, Yugoslavia, Israel, and Italy. A prolific cast and an enlightening show, The National Theater of the Deaf often appears on PBS television in addition to public performances.

RECENT CUTS

Hancock's Best... and Worst

By Tom Nuccio

On June 29, 1976 a Very Special One-time Performance featured a Quintet, Sextet and Funk Group which each shared one common element – Herbie Hancock, the foremost electronic jazz keyboardist. The diversity, excitement and creativity of these Hancock groups speak for themselves on V.S.O.P. – a double-record set recorded live at the 1976 Newport Jazz Festival.

The album, indeed a classic, is actually a retrospective look at Hancock's musical career. It traces the history of this multi-talented jazz artist from the sixties (playing with the Miles Davis Quintet), and the early seventies (with his own Sextet), to his mid-seventies electro-funk group. In the span of less than ten years, he has journeyed from the world of straight-ahead jazz to a culture of synthesized funk. Hancock's musical metamorphosis is one of the truly incredible, yet depressing, events in the history of American jazz.

"Hancock's musical metamorphosis is one of the truly incredible, yet depressing events in the history of American jazz."

Sides one and two possess the dynamic music of the Quintet (1962-1968). With the exception of trumpeter Freddie Hubbard, the other four musicians were members of the legendary Miles Davis group. While playing with the Quintet, Hancock extracted music from the past and employed it in a more contemporary mode. The most significant change within this group is Hancock himself. While playing with Miles in the sixties, he performed on an acoustic piano. In contrast, with the V.S.O.P. Quintet, Herbie played a Yamaha Electric Grand Piano which sounds like a cross between the standard acoustic and a Rhodes electric. This positively affects the color and tone of the music. The old standard songs are brightened up by the mildly resounding ring of this Electric Grand and the quintet is tight and well-balanced. Their improvisations are wildly free and their talents never-ending.

After leaving Miles Davis' group in 1968, Hancock organized his own group. The sextet, born 1969, deceased 1973, presents itself, on side three, as an under-rated yet very capable group of musicians. Hancock's keyboards have expanded outward to include a Rhodes Electric piano and a Hohner D6 Clavinet.

The sextet's music is progressive. On the tune "You'll Know When You Get There," the group breaks off into a sequence of freely improvisational soloing. This characteristic was not evident during the band's early seventies sessions. The tunes are extracted from a previous era, garnished with a spice of the avant garde and performed tastefully.

With the Sextet's dispersion in 1973 was born the third and final band – The Funk Group (1973–1977). This was Hancock's most radical experiment with music and possibly his worst. Their music is tasteless, repetitive and rudely obnoxious. One could place the stylus down on virtually any portion of the disk and hear the exact same musical trash. In addition to Hancock employing ten different types of synthesized keyboards, his guitarist "Wah Wah" Watson and reedman Mile Bennie Maupin use four others. This group probably uses synthesized toothbrushes before the concert. Their music sounds, at some points, like a voyage into outer space. Their spaced-out music, in my opinion, could serve but one purpose – background music for a sequel to Star Wars.

Despite Hancock's degeneration into funk, V.S.O.P. is a must for any serious jazz collector. It embodies almost every form of contemporary jazz resurrected with a progressive flair.

Heaven Help Bob Weir

By Shana Schwartzberg

I knew from the start I wouldn't like this album, I don't know how I got talked into doing this. Still, I tried to keep an open mind towards Bob Weir's new album Heaven Help the Fool. For those who like Weir because of his association with the Grateful Dead; forget it! Don't even listen to this record and for those who aren't familiar with Bob Weir, on any basis, this is a poor introduction. It's not that he's posed in doubleknit on the front cover in a Richard (expensive) Avedon photograph. It's not that he has a lot of unheard of studio musicians playing on the album. No, it's not even the music which tends to be unimaginative and sort of disco-plastic that I dislike so much. It's the part that contains all the subject matter, content, the lyrics, that really bother me. His words carry a tone of arrogant conceit. If all the world's a stage, Bob Weir got himself thinking that he's the star of the show.

" If all the world's a stage, Bob Weir got himself thinking that he's the star of the show."

The sad part is that Bob Weir has shown in the past that he is a fine musician/performer, and capable of writing decent lyrics.

It appears that Bob has simply become the victim of what he's singing about in his classic "rags to riches" life. When listening to Bob singing endlessly about commercial love, it becomes apparent just how jaded his perspective is. While he may have grown hard and semi-hitter in some ways throughout his career, he hasn't grown at all in others.

In about four words, his music sounds immature. This time he's the fool. It would be one thing if Weir was a rookie in the field, but he's not. He's been in the business for quite some time now.

It should be realized that a large part of the responsibility for this album falls on Keith Olsen and Pogologo productions who are bent on producing million sellers.

Documentary

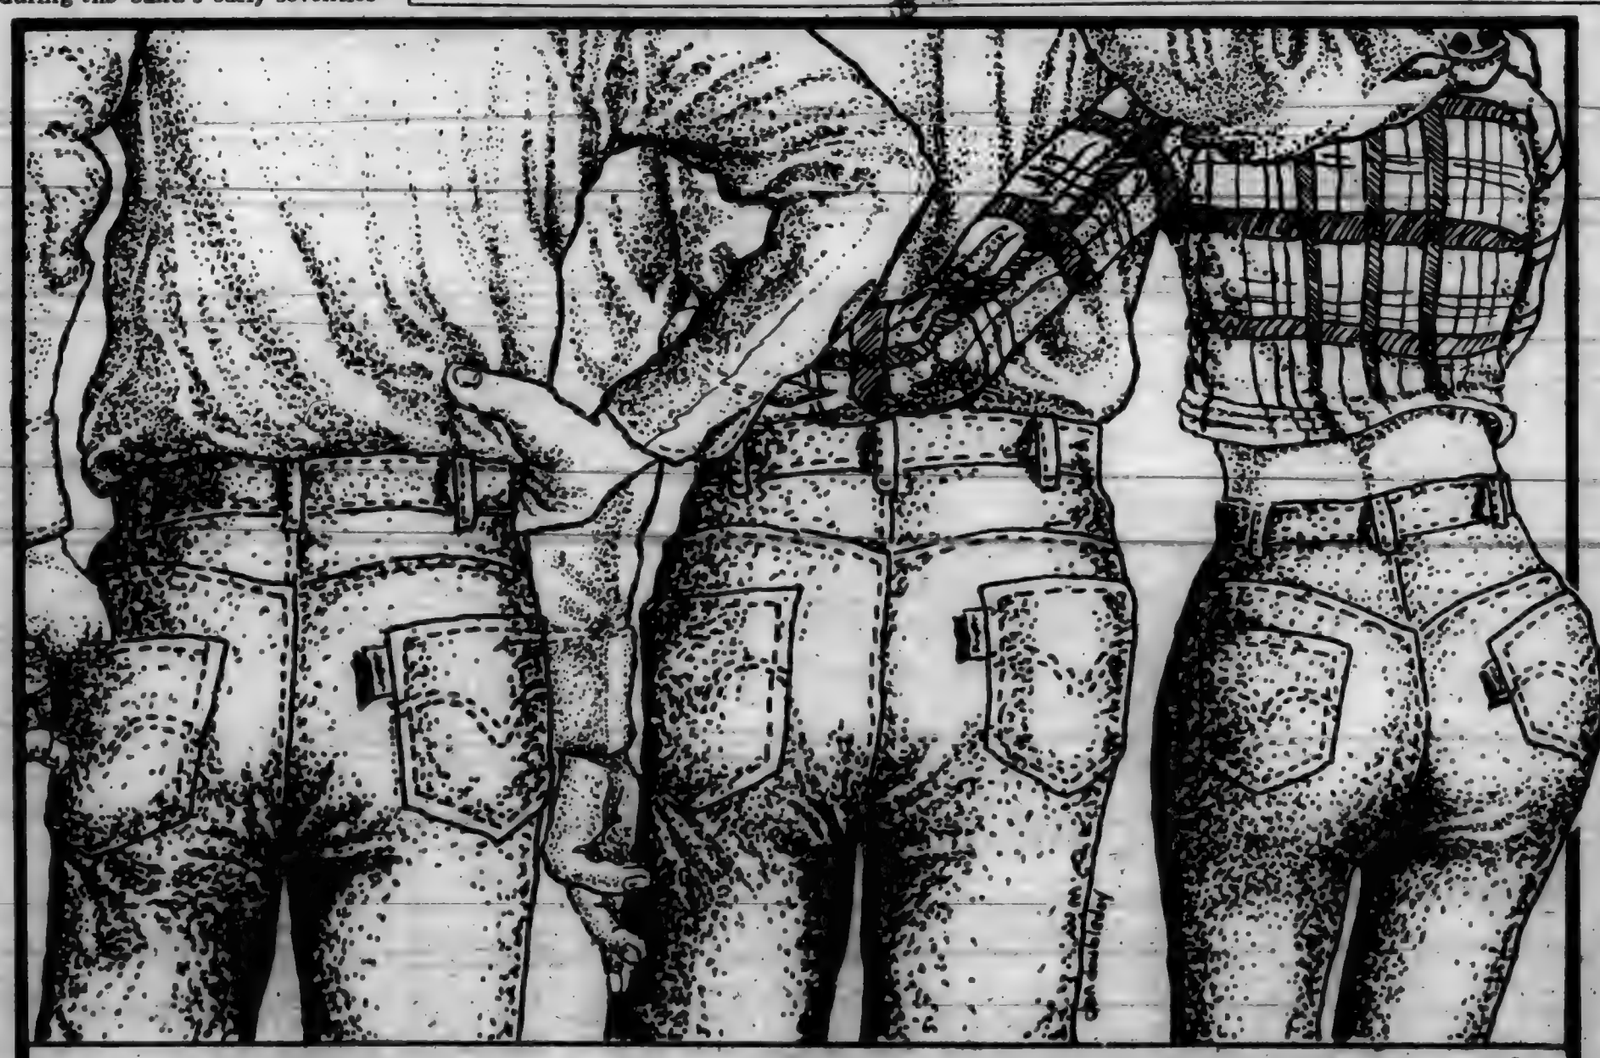
the game, the feverish enthusiasm of the crowd – even a pre-game prayer for victory, in a church before the game. It is all too easy to see how such behavior could be transferred from the sports stadium to the battlefield.



Apparently, the bitter memories of the Vietnam debacle are still fresh enough that a film like Hearts and Minds can move a college aged audience. But what about those, only a few years younger, who have no actual memories of the conflict whatsoever? Davis records one such group of fourth graders, listening to an ex-prisoner of war, who warns them that someday they will probably have to go to war too. The children look on with wide-eyed admiration and one has to wonder if the P.O.W. may not be correct. Are we destined to repeat the same mistakes again and again, as new generations come to power in our society, or will vivid media records like Hearts and Minds finally help us to actually learn something from history?

On Tuesday, Febrary 14, the Third World Cinema will present The Quiet American, the second in its series of four films dealing with the American experience in Vietnam. The showing will be at 7:30 p.m., in Room B106 Angell Lecture Center.

A 1958 production The Quiet American is directed by Joseph Mankiewicz, and is based on the novel by British author Graham Greene. The film is set in Saigon, in 1952 during the French-Vietnamese Colonial War.

For further information please call 656-3418.

The Lane Series regrets this cancellation.

Advising Referral Center

Jane has been having difficulty with one of her courses. She received a D on her mid-term exam. Afraid she will fail the course, she studies day and night for the final. After feeling she did well, she received a final grade of D. She wants to dispute the grade but doesn't know how or where to begin. Does she confront the professor? Approach her advisor? Or her Dean? Does she just accept it? If you have similar concerns but don't know what the appropriate procedure is, come to the Advising Referral Center. Let us help make the system work for you! We are located at 337 Waterman Building, X4174.

Hillel

On Sunday February 12, the UVM chapter of the Hillel Foundation will hold its monthly brunch. The brunch will be held in L/L cafeteria at 11:00 a.m. This month's speaker will be Prof. Sam Hand from the History Dept. All are welcome.

Plus on Monday February 13, the UVM chapter of the Hillel Foundation will sponsor a coffeehouse in L/L Commons 216 7:30 p.m. Ellen Canon will speak on her recent trip to Israel. All are welcome.

Elevator Keys

Keys for limited use elevators (Pedestrian Underpass, Lafayette Hall, Cook Building, Torrey Hall) may be obtained by handicapped persons upon certification of need by the University Health Services. Disabilities may be either permanent or temporary to qualify. Contact Marian Bickford, Acting Director, Architectural Barrier Control, 103 Security-Underpass Building. Phone 656-3474.

Student Advisors

The College of Education and Social Services is interviewing applicants for next year's student advisors. All sophomores and juniors are eligible, and will receive 2 credits per semester for participation. If you are interested, pick up application in 306 Waterman Building before Friday, February 10th. Applications must be completed by February 17th.

Psychology Colloquium

The Psychology Dept. will offer a colloquium on Friday, February 10 featuring Robert Barasch, Ph.D. and a discussion on the topic Interpretive Strategies in Psychotherapy. Dr. Barasch presently has a private in Plainfield, Vt. Bring your questions and ideas and stay alert. There will be future announcements on the upcoming events in this colloquium series.

Carnations for Valentines

Show someone how much you care – buy your cutie a carnation for Valentine's Day. Delta Delta Delta will be selling carnations in Billings Center Thursday February 9, Friday, February 10, and Monday, February 13, from 9 a.m. – 4 p.m. Carnations can be ordered at these times and will be delivered on Valentine's Day by Delta Delta Delta. Proceeds will go towards Tri-Delta's scholarship fund and philanthropy. Go for it!

Free Pap Test

There will be a free pap test, breast self-exam and blood pressure clinic sponsored by the Vermont Department of Health at the First United Methodist Church on South Winooski Ave. on Monday, February 13 from 1 – 5 p.m. Women who have not had a pap test in 18 months are especially encouraged to come. For an appointment call Lee Hovey at 862-5520 or just walk in. Appointments are given preference.

The Interviewing Process

The Undergraduate Business Society is sponsoring a panel discussion entitled "The Interviewing Process" Tuesday, February 14 at 7:00 p.m. in the Living Learning Center, 115 Commons. Representatives from Cooper Lybrand (a big eight-accounting firm), Lord & Taylor and the Chittenden Trust will be on hand for student questions. So come learn what the pros expect from today's students and improve your odds in the job market.

Financial AID

Any student wishing to be considered for financial aid for the 1978-79 academic year is advised to pick up the appropriate applications from the Financial Aid Office in 330 Waterman Bldg. and complete them as soon as possible. Although a student may submit an application for financial aid at any time, limited funds necessitate that priority will be given to those freshmen applications received before March 1st and upperclass and transfer applications received before May 1st.

Aid programs administered by UVM's Financial Aid Office fall into the general categories of federal and institutional grants, federal and institutional long-term loans, and the college work-study program. In addition, information concerning Vermont Student Assistance Corp. grants and federal or state insured student loans is available through this office.

It is extremely important that students apply early for financial aid, as available funds are limited. Students who submit their application after May 1st are advised that they may not be notified until well into the fall semester. This is due to the time it takes to process on-time applications and to determine what funds, if any, remain available. The acceptance of an application after May 1st should not be taken as assurance that any funds will be available, and such students should make plans accordingly.

Medical Education Program

Beginning this spring, the National Fund for Medical Education will sponsor a Medical Perspectives Fellowship Program, funded by a grant from the SmithKline Corporation. The program will enable students in medical and osteopathic schools to initiate and carry through creative projects that provide a learning experience not usually encountered in medical education.

"The objective of the Medical Perspectives Program," according to John G. Freymann, M.D., president of the National Fund, "is to offer medical students a chance to stretch their minds. We want to stimulate the student's imagination, originality and initiative, so guidelines are quite flexible. Students can work with local or state health departments, in rural health, environmental health or in health programs for minority groups. But these are only examples; students will undoubtedly develop their own projects."

To be eligible for the program, students must be enrolled in U.S. medical or osteopathic schools in programs leading to MD or DO degrees. Applicants must design a 10-week to one-year project that explores some aspect of clinical medicne or health care delivery. Applications should be available from participating U.S. medical schools, and must be returned to deans by March 1, 1978.

Each school may submit two applications to the 10-member selection committee, which will award 30-40 fellowships nationally in 1978-79. Students receive the grants through their schools, and academic credit for the experience is individually determined.

Operation Crossroads Africa

During the past 20 years, Operation Crossroads Africa, a non-profit, non-governmental volunteer community development organization, has sent more than 5000 American students to 34 English-speaking and French-speaking African countries to spend their summers living with and sharing in the daily lives of village communities.

Applications are now being accepted for Crossroads' Summer 1978 Workcamps in Africa. The deadline is February 15, 1978.

Assisting in self-help rural community development, the student volunteers build schools, health clinics, community centers and work in agricultural projects. Other projects involve archaeology, music, art, health education, journalism and media.

The Crossroads Workcamps serve as a vehicle for making a concrete contribution to local needs deemed vital by African village communities, and as a rare opportunity for cross-cultural contact and personal growth.

As a result of this intense educational and personal experience, crossroads volunteers find they are better prepared for careers in international relations, education and business. Many crossroads volunteers have found careers with the United Nations, UNESCO, UNICEF, the Foreign Service, Peace Corps, universities and corporations.

For more information, contact: Crossroads Africa, 150-5th Ave., NYC, NY 10011 (Phone: 212-242-8550) or The Advisor to International Students & Scholars, L/L, B-178, 656-4296.

Lane Office Moved

The Lane Series will move its Box Office and Administrative offices to 284 East Avenue (by the clover leaf) effective Wednesday, February 15 at 8:30 a.m.

Please note new telephone: Box Office only 656-3418. Administrative only 656-4455.

Special Swim Classes

Special swim classes for the handicapped will begin at the University of Vermont, February 16, and applications are now being received by the Physical Education Office at the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium.

The courses, designed for students from five years to senior citizens, will be set up for individualized instruction appropriate to a wide range of handicap conditions.

The classes, to be taught by Physical Education and Physical Therapy majors at UVM and under the supervision of Dr. Robert Gobin, Professor of Physical Education at UVM, will be held weekly for nine weeks.

Class days and times follow: Course 1 (Thursdays), 1 p.m. with the first class scheduled for Feb. 16; Course 2 (Fridays), 1 p.m., first class, February 17, and Course 3 (Mondays), 7:15 p.m., first class February 20.

Bus transportation will be available.

For further information and application forms, those interested may contact Mrs. Charlotte Leary at 656-3070. There is no charge for the swim program.

In-State Tuition Hike Appears Likely

By Robert J. Moore

Raising in-state tuition at the University of Vermont is among the measures President Lattie F. Coor and University officials are considering to alleviate a projected $1 million budget shortage in 1979.

In conferences last Thursday with the House and Senate Appropriation Committees, Coor explained the University's need for an extra appropriation for the fiscal year 1979. According to Coor, the University's expenditures will be approximately $3.8 million higher than its income. The University could cut the shortage to $1.014 million, Coor said, by raising out-of-state tuition by seven percent, by augmenting federal and private revenue, and by more temperate spending. The legislature has already appropriated UVM $13,669,100 for fiscal 1979; a figure which is $825,000 higher than that allotted the university for 1978.

Coor termed the increase of in-state tuition "a very real likelihood," but added that even if tuition is raised UVM will "have to make reductions anyway."

UVM's executive committee appealed to the state last October for $1.275 million to supplement their previous appropriation for 1979. In response to this request, Governor Richard A. Snelling proposed that $300,000 in additional funds be given to the school.

Coor described the committee's reaction during his hearings last Thursday as "favorable," and added that they "seemed to understand our needs." If the State does not appropriate more than the $300,000 recommended by the Governor, there are three courses of action that Coor has indicated the university will take. Equipment purchase and maintenance will be deferred, pay raises delayed, and in-state tuition possibly increased, he said. Coor termed the increase of in-state tuition a "very real likelihood," but added that even if tuition is raised, UVM will "have to make reductions anyway." Coor is, however, "hopeful" the state will allot UVM the funds.

In-state tuition is currently the highest in the nation, at approximately 1,300 dollars per year. UVM would be unaffordable to a large number of students if they weren't aided financially by the Vermont Student Assistance Corporation (VSAC). VSAC presently relegates about one-third of its funds to students of UVM.

Academic vice president Robert G. Arns singled out inflation as the "most important" cause of the $3.8 million shortage. According to Arns the cost of running UVM has risen fifteen percent every year in recent years. This is considerably higher than the rise in the Consumer Price Index (1974 – 11.5%; 1975 – 9%; 1976 – 6%), Arns added. This gap in inflation rates closed slightly in 1977 but spokesmen for UVM contend it will enlarge in the near future.

An eight percent salary hike for faculty and staff has also been called a prominent reason for the budget shortage. This increase includes a two percent raise intended to "repair" the results of inflation from the past. The increases in faculty and staff wages will total $1.893 million.

Arns said he was doubtful as to whether the University's present faculty would remain intact if the raises in salaries are postponed because of the projected budget shortage. UVM's ability to entice new professors would be damaged, he said. With the aid of statistics, Arns pointed out that UVM pays professors the second lowest salaries in the Yankee Conference. The only school below UVM, in this respect, is the University of Maine. The average Yankee Conference professor makes about $25,700 whereas a professor at UVM nets approximately $22,300.

President Coor noted that the University is somewhat helpless in the face of budget shortages. Concerning cutbacks, Coor said "I hope we don't have to lurch forward and lop off a program." "We will likely defer

U. S. Tries To Shove Vietnam Under the Rug

By David C. Greeff

An attempt is being made by the United States and other western industrialized nations to rewrite the history of the Vietnam War and the accompanying peace movement, "so that it will take on a form more suitable to the American ideological system," Noam Chomsky, a leader in the movement said Monday.

Professor Chomsky, an internationally known linguist and noted anti-war activist, spoke to a near capacity crowd at Ira Allen Chapel, as part of the Vermont Seminars Series on "U.S. Power and the Third World."

Chomsky stated that the war resistance movement of the 1960's was "intolerable to the 'secular priesthood' who serve the state and propagate the state religion." This religion, promulgated by not only the government, according to Chomsky, but the press as well, reduces heated ideological debate concerning moral and legal questions to simply whether or not the United States could have won the war.

The question of capability of victory was secondary to Professor Chomsky, who maintained that "the real issue is whether we even had the right to try." In his view international law clearly rules out the actions made by the U.S. in Indo China.

To support his claim Chomsky refetred to a New York Times editorial written after the end of the war in 1975, which, according to Chomsky, "insinuated that it was not necessary to ask moral or legal questions." He stated that the media posited the war in such a "narrow tactical framework" that there was no room for the peace movement. The Times' understanding of the "need to maintain ideological purity" was characteristic of "the entire press response to the war," Chomsky said.

The protest movement "constituted a threat to the system" because it refused to accept the "tacit assumption" that the United States had the right to be in Vietnam at all, Chomsky continued. It also, in Chomsky's view, was likely to erode necessary support for inevitable future interventions.

The M.I.T. professor said that the official government position relayed to the people during the war was a consistent barrage of untruths. The actual position has been since well revealed in the Pentagon Papers, published by the New York Times despite government opposition.

He showed with documented evidence that the state early on was fully cognizant that they were fighting "nationalist" and not invading North Vietnamese forces. As further proof he cited the fact that over 160,000 South Vietnamese were killed before the first northern Vietnamese troops were spotted below the 17th parallel.

Chomsky continued by saying that the United States completely fabricated the allegedly dominant influence of the Soviet Union and China on the actions of Ho Chi Minh and the North. "Since U.S. intelligence reports found no concrete evidence linking either China or Russia with the North, they concluded that Ho was such a slave, that no communication was necessary," said Chomsky.

After 1954 the U.S. was responsible for establishing a "brutally murderous regime" responsible for the deaths of thousands of Vietnamese in "its effort to suppress the anti-French resistance," Chomsky elaborated.

Returning to the protest movement, Chomsky said, was in reality quite "conservative," moreso, in fact, than the officials they were demonstrating against. The movement, he asserted, was simply trying to stop the United States government from waging an undeclared war, illegal under federal law.

Chomsky was also severely critical of the credit given by many, including noted economist J. Kenneth Galbraith, to democratic Senator Eugene McCarthy for ending U.S. involvement in the conflict. When all the major anti-war activities were building up "not a peep ever came out of McCarthy," Chomsky noted.

In conclusion, the linguist said that one of the "net effects" of the war was a "slight opening in the ideological spectrum which forms the basis for American action." However, he concluded that it is unlikely that this small opening will make any difference because of the concerted effort on the part of the "secular priesthood" to close it.

Towing:

What's the Story?

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

A common sight on the UVM campus is a tow\truck hauling away some unwitting motorist's car which was once parked illegally.

During the snow season, this event seems to become more prevalent as streets need to be cleared for snow removal, and when the distinction of what is, and what is not, a legal parking space becomes blurred.

Fire hydrants, usually illegal to park in front of, are no longer useable as they are frequently buried underneath snow banks, and "No Parking Here To Corner" signs are often ignored by a driver who wants to exit from a parking spot without having to summon help to be pushed off of some ice.

According to both UVM Security and the Burlington Police, any person at all can call up either department to have a car removed that has been spotted as being parked illegally. A spokesman for UVM Security, Officer Dean Kirby, said that when they receive a call or complaint from a person, they instruct that person to call up the Burlington Police in order to have the car (there may be more than one) removed. He stated explicitly that UVM Security members do not call up the police themselves. "We don't have any jurisdiction at all" on the city streets," Kirby said. The only places that UVM Security does have jurisdiction over are the parking lots and other such areas which are UVM-owned property, he explained.

Lieutenant Scott of the Burlington Police disagreed on this point by saying, "Anyone who wants" can call up the Police Department to request that cars be towed away, including UVM Security members, who Scott said do call on occasion. Scott did, however, say that towing is a "low priority" item and may be initiated by the Burlington police themselves, but "it depends on the work load."

A spokesman for Ed's Automotive Service on North Winooski Ave. concurred with Lieutenant Scott by explaining that it is UVM Security who sometimes initiates the towing done on the periphery of the campus by calling up the police, who in turn call Ed's – the only service station in town who can tow for the city since Charlesbois Garage on Riverside Ave had its city towing permit revoked last month.

The spokesman said, "They've been running a campaign now for five to six days" in reference to a crackdown last week by both UVM and the city on illegal parking around the campus. He said during last week, Ed's was towing in about eight to ten cars a day from around the campus and did acknowledge that the garage does keep all of the $15 towing charge for each car, but nevertheless complained, "I've got better things to do."

One complaint frequently voiced by students is the inconsistency with which cars are being towed. "I had been parking out in front of Royall Tyler for a week and my car was always there at the end of the day. Today it was gone," one student said. Officer Kirby said this inconsistency might possibly depend on "the officer who is on duty for the city police." Lt. Scott attributed it simply to the varying work load.

Much of the debate over the towing situation, especially in Burlington itself, has centered around a $10 increase in the towing fee which was in effect during the latter half of December and up until January 23. It was during this time period that a $25 towing charge was being levied as the result of an Aldermanic vote. The increased fee, however, proved to be an illegal one because of an overriding state statute which set the maximum that can be charged for a tow at $15.

The initial ordinance, which was adopted December 12, set the towing fee at a maximum of $25 and the maximum daily storage fee at $2. But a state law, adopted in 1961, set the maximum for a tow at $15. The law states: "Whenever a motor vehicle is parked on the highways... so as to interfere with the policing, construction or maintenance of highways, including but not limited to the removal of snow" the police department may tow the car at the owner's expense. On January 23, though, the Board of Aldermen reversed their December decision because of its unconstitutionality and engaged in some heated debate with representatives of Charlesbois Garage over lowering the fee.

During the January 23 meeting, Aldermen heard complaints of physical abuse, damage to cars, refusal to issue receipts or accept checks and unfair advantage taken of the storage fee all on the part of the Charlesbois operation. In fact, Alderman Brian Brennan had his car towed while he had been at a meeting the week before, and when he went down to Charlesbois to retrieve it, he was called a "bum" because he did not have the necessary $25 cash on hand. At the meeting, Charlesbois reacted to this comment by saying, "Anyone who doesn't carry cash around, well, you know." At that point, Alderman Joyce Desautels said that she had left her purse at home and only had a dollar with her and asked, "Am I a bum?"

The result was that the Aldermen ordered the city police not to contract with Charlesbois any more, and the fees were lowered to their original levels.

Burlington's towing charge may, however, climb back up to $25, only this time it will be legal because of a Senate Judiciary Committee approval of the increase. An amendment by Sen. David Gibson, R-Windham, would allow municipalities to enact local ordinances removing parking violations from state motor vehicle traffic laws. No further action has yet been taken.

Still, the Burlington Ordinance Committee is responsible for refunding $10 to each person whose car was towed during either December or January and who was charged $25. The committee has recommended that the Finance Board determine where the $4000 will come from. Police reported that during the period of increased rates, 371 cars were towed, 341 of which were hampering snow removal.

Student Legal Service Will Inform Students of Their Rights Under the Law

By Peter Drakos

As a result of Geoff Liggett's determination to fulfill a personal campaign conviction, the UVM Student Legal Service (SLS) will open its door on the second floor of the northwest corner of Billings on Monday, February 20. This marks the end of a long planning and formulating stage by co-founders Dawn Cobb, Peter Drakos and Randy Freedman, that started in early Summer, 1977.

The creation of a student legal service is not an original idea. College campuses all over the country have established similar services for students with the feeling that the law, as applied to everyone, should be accessible to everyone. The accepted axiom that "ignorance of the law is no excuse" is unjustified in light of the fact that the general public has no convenient way to become familiar with the law or aware of their rights. The UVM Student Legal Service has been created to combat this very problem – to inform UVM students of their legal rights so that they may be able to assert those rights when necessary.

The Spring 1978 SLS has been designed to provide students with legal information and reference, in an attempt to offer students an additional option for solving difficult problems. The legal system defines both rights and obligations, and the SLS will educate students in this regard. It will explain and define the legal terms and processes an individual may find himself/herself confronted with, and in this way allow students to enter a system which they have been left out of for such a long time.

Screwed Again?

Because there are sanctions against the unlawful practice of the law, the UVM SLS cannot act as a legal counsel for the student. Thus, the SLS cannot represent a student in the manner that a lawyer represents a client in court, or perform any similar representative function. As a result of the status of the SLS as a first year organization, we have devised the function of the service to provide basic and fundamental information in such areas as Family/Marital Law, Landlord/Tenant Problems, Consumer Problems, Contractual Law, Traffic/Misdemeanor-Criminal Law. However, areas of specialization may expand and broaden according to student demand. If students avail themselves of this service, the potential for expansion is great. It is only a matter of time before the SLS will hire its own lawyer to represent students in the usual unrestricted attorney-client relationship.

As for now, the SLS will strictly be an information and referral service, with the following office hours: Monday 12–4 p.m., Tuesday 7–10 p.m., Thursday 12–4 p.m. At all other times during the week, the SLS will have an answering service in operation. All matters referred to the SLS will be held in strict confidence. To facilitate this policy, it will be a requirement that students come to the office for any assistance.

It is the desire of the SLS that all students with any legal problems will stop by the office in Billings. A remedy may not always be offered, but at least the student will leave with an understanding of the laws and regulations that apply to his or her particular problem.

Ambiguity in Faculty Handbook Eliminated In New Version

By John Letteri

After a lengthy process, including two committees' work, many college and departmental meetings, and over fifty pages of input from faculty and administration members, a revision of the current Faculty Administration Officer's Handbook will come before the Faculty Senate in March for final modification and acceptance.

The initiative for the action came from UVM President Lattie Coor, who found the current handbook deficient in clarity of wording and organization. It was his understanding that the revision would provide a more easily understood definition of policies, procedures and responsibility for academic committees and members. Dr. William Meyer, Chairman of the Faculty Handbook Committee, said the revision "represents a comprehensive, thorough housecleaning of the handbook directed at focusing faculty administration's attention on their responsibilities, by creating a more easily understood handbook to follow." Dr. Meyers added that "there were no key points, per se, but the whole handbook has received revision in one way or another."

One of the major problems that Dr. Meyers and others cleared up was the ambiguity prevalent throughout the handbook. For example, when stating Presidential responsibilities, section 132.31 of the current handbook reads: "Selecting and appointing all of the University's officers and employees." As is, 132.31 implies that the President of the University is responsible for selecting all of "the University's officers and employees." In the revised edition 132.31 is deleted, and new section (132.30) is added which reads: "Appointing Deans and Directors and Assistants to the president and delegating to an appropriate Vice-President authority to appoint all other University officers and employees except those appointed by the trustees." The revised edition stipulates the President's responsibility more clearly.

Dr. Meyer also pointed out that the revision clears up some of the excess verbiage in the current handbook. For example, section 131.4 of the current handbook consists of seventy-six words, while in the revised edition, it contains only fifty. Dr. Meyer contends that revisions of the current Tenure and Appointment procedures are of great benefit stating that "you have to go looking from one end of the thing (current handbook) to the other to find what you need to understand about Tenure or Appointments. The revision, although changing policy somewhat, states criteria and procedure for tenure or appointment in an easily understood, step by step manner."

Although the revision represents a great deal of time and effort, Dr. Meyer said "this effort is still secondary to people paying attention to it. Part of the original defect lay within the current handbook itself, with its ambiguities and confusions. But part of the defect in carrying out procedures lay in faculty and academic persons involved with the procedures outlined in the handbook. It is my hope that with the handbook's defects cleared up, the various academic units and persons will be able to carry out and understand their abilities to a fuller extent." He also said that "there is a working list of ten proposals" that are not included in the current handbook because "they were either too minor or controversial."

One of those Dr. Meyer contends is more controversial is a Departmental Self-Assessment Program. "Students are evaluated many ways, through tests, writings and grades. Faculty must submit to evaluations by students, peers and superiors. Yet, Departmental self-evaluation, or evaluation of any kind, is treated casually." Dr. Meyer favors a more stringent Department Assessment process. He contends that a strong Department Assessment program will result in stronger departments. He adds, "And stronger departments mean a stronger university."

Dr. Meyer concluded by stating that revisions in the future will be part of an ongoing process, and (as Section 1030 stipulates) will be a truer voice of the entire faculty and administration. He further stated that the revision "has broad based support in the Senate and passage is likely."

Lt. Gov. Buckley Supports Funding For Gym Expansion

By Robert J. Moore

Lt. Governor T. Garry Buckley announced Friday that he will actively support UVM in their efforts to receive funding for gymnasium expansion this year. "I think if they are ever going to get their gym improvements, this is the year to get them," he said. The university has asked the legislature for approximately $1 million for enlarging the women's facilities at Patrick Gym.

According to Buckley, "It's not a frivolous request." "A first class university deserves a first class physical education facility," he added. Last year, the bill was rejected by the House of Representatives. House Speaker Timothy O'Connor (D — Brattleboro) declared earlier in the week that the bill could not come before the House again this year because of a house rule that prohibits a measure being considered twice in the same biennial session.

Buckley's solution was to try and include the proposal in the capital construction budget, which is to come before the Senate. In this way, he pointed out, the House will be forced to consider the gymnasium measure as a part of the larger bill, accepting or rejecting the construction budget in its entirety, instead of voting on it separately.

Buckley said he informed UVM President Lattie F. Coor Friday that if the House refused to consider the measure, it is likely the Senate would.

"If he wants to go with it, the House notwithstanding, the Senate can put it in and send it back to the House," Buckley stated. "I'm going to try to find him fifteen votes," he added. Fifteen is the fewest number of votes required to get a measure passed in the Senate.

Lt. Governor Buckley.

The expansion program is foremost among the university's plans and Buckley pointed out that equal-opportunity guidelines have made the expansion imperative.

Governor Richard A. Snelling contends that the expansion measure could properly be reconsidered by the House without violating any rules.

Business Majors Win $1000 Prize For Marketing Analysis

By Susan Jo Perkins

Seven Business Marketing majors won a $1000 second prize from Wickes Lumber Company for a marketing analysis they performed on the local Wickes outlet. The students are Janet Joseph '78, David Localio '78, Mike LaBerge '78, Lisa Wittner '79, Jay Pilcer '79, Mitch Selbiger '80, and Jim Antell '77. The Faculty Advisor was Assistant Professor of Marketing John Antil.

The students, who competed against eight other colleges, were given the task of surveying Wickes' audience to conclude how Wickes could improve their marketing.

First place winner was the State University of New York at Binghamton. According to Selbiger, the University of Vermont's entry was very close to winning. "There was a fine, fine line... Their presentation was more formal," he said. Selbiger said four judges evaluated the entries. Binghamton took a $2000 prize.

The $1000 prize was awarded to the students at the Sheraton Inn in Burlington on Wednesday, February 9, 1978. Two Wickes executives, Terry Wilson and Roseann Costanza of the Marketing Division, awarded the prizes over a $300 dinner. Also present were several business administration professors.

Four of the winning students are members of the marketing suite in Living/Learning. Joseph, LaBerge and Antell participated as part of a class project for one of Bob Kaplan's marketing classes.

The students hope to put the money toward building a case room, and Selbiger said the money has already been donated to the Business Department. The students have asked the Chairman of the Business Administration Department, Malcolm Severance, for a matching grant. The case room would allow students a place to study by the case method.

About the project, Selbiger said, "I thought it was an excellent opportunity to learn about marketing because it was a real-life project... not out of a textbook."

Burlington Electric Claims Bond Proposal Is An Energy Saver

By Rich Hyland

"I believe we can do something that other's can't do," said Robert Young in a discussion of Burlington Electric Dept.'s bond proposal at the Mills Building last Friday. Young, general manager of the municipally-owned utility, referred to the plan as a classic example of "Vermont ingenuity."

The energy proposal which Burlington voters will decide upon March 7, calls for the construction of a hydro-electric plant on the Winooski River, and wood-chip and trash-fired generation plants in the Intervale region. Young noted that revenue bonding from Burlington Electric's profits, not city taxes, will finance the construction of the hydro-electric and wood-chip plants. The trash-fired generator which will produce hot water for heating purposes will be financed by customers purchasing that product. Two potential customers of this system, Mr. Young revealed, are the University of Vermont and the MCHV.

Young also commented on the stabilizing effect the proposed facilities would have on electrical rates as more costly power from nuclear, coal, and oil-fired plants would not need to be purchased. Moreover, the Interval wood-fired generator would yield an additional 3 to 4 million dollars annual revenue for the city through payments by Burlington Electric Department revenues in lieu of taxes. This, the utility believes, could result in stable property taxes for years to come.

Young maintained that the most advantageous aspect of the proposal was the conservation of "energy dollars" it entailed. He asserted that buying wood (a renewable resource) instead of foreign fuels and out-of-state coal, would keep money spent on energy within the state, thus creating new jobs and opportunities for home industry.

Environmentally, Young indicated that the "Department has run into very little negative response and that the wood-chip generation concept has been endorsed by the State Department of Forests, Parks and Recreation. The harvesting or "weeding" of low quality waste wood for wood-chips would be beneficial in aiding the regeneration of Vermont's forests.

"We want to make sure it's right," Young concluded, "and as Vermonters we shouldn't have too much worry about that."

Two Representatives Introduce New Child Care Legislation

By Susan Heller

In cooperation with Chittenden County Legislators, the Church Street Center has been sponsoring seminars on pertinent legislative issues. Last Monday Children's Issues were discussed, with Representative Judy Stephany (D– Chittenden County) and Representative Gretchen Morse (R– Chittenden County) as featured speakers.

Representative Stephany began by summarizing the present laws pertaining to child custody cases, noting that it had always been the state's goal to keep children with their natural parents. But Stephany points out, "There has been a realization in recent years that there are just instances in which the family unit cannot be held together because it is not in the best interest of the child." She went on to describe the plight of children who are abandoned and shifted from foster home to foster home. "Children who are growing up in this manner are not thriving as children in a stable home situation." The issue which must be resolved is the state's right to remove the parental rights from the natural parent. This is a value judgement which Stephany acknowledges is difficult. "We all know instinctively what we think a good home is, what we think good parents are, and how to raise children well." The laws of the state encourage the family unit within the court system, trying to determine how the family can relate better to one another. The bill, which is co-sponsored by Representative Stephany, would give the state the right to free minor children from parental custody and have them permanently adopted. Stephany acknowledges that this is a controversial bill which she feels will not pass this year.

This bill is also supported by Rep. Morse who feels it will provide guidelines for social workers wishing to help the child in court. Along with the custody bill there is a bill which is presently in the House-Health and Welfare Committee regarding adoption. In essence, the bill would ban private adoptions in Vermont. The term 'private' implies an adoption without the intervention of a Social Service organization or a licensed child placing agency. Morse explains, "You could not just make a private arrangement between a doctor, a lawyer and an unwed mother." There is much opposition to this bill because many people wishing to adopt children object to investigations regarding their fitness as parents. When a child is old enough to make decisions, he is not put into a foster home against his wishes. Within the court, the mother has always been considered the parent most suited for parenthood, and according to Rep. Stephany, "this has been tradition for so long, it is difficult to breech."

"The child is really in the middle (of divorce) - whatever the child does, it is really a very delicate situation." —Rep. Stephany

Under the proposed bill the parents go into the proceedings as equal parents. The child may obtain an attorney, but often there are pressures from his divorced parents trying to win favor and turn their child against their former spouse. Rep. Stephany says, "The child is really in the middle – whatever the child does, it is really a very delicate situation." Concerning the bill's future, Rep. Stephany comments, "The bill itself is not going to be an easy one to get through the Vermont State Senate. It is considered much too novel."

Another issue raised at this meeting involved the Weeks School and a proposal by the federal government to turn it into a job corps program center.

The question was raised about what to do with a child who has committed a crime. Johannes Troost of the Governor's Committee on Children and Youth responded, "There are a number of alternatives; one is incarceration; take them right down to the Weeks School and place them there. Now what they're trying to develop is community based alternatives to detention in a secure facility." The problems with the juvenile defenders are two-fold. First, often the juvenile offender is not picked up, hence, he is not trapped in

Soviet Pilots in Cuba

United States intelligence officials said Monday that Soviet Air Force units had begun to assist in the air defense of Cuba, apparently to free Cuban pilots for combat in the Ethiopia-Somalia conflict in the Horn of Africa.

There was no estimate of how many Soviet airmen were involved in the operation, but some officials said Moscow might be in the process of taking over Cuba's entire air defense. Although the Soviet Union has provided Cuba with substantial military aid and training over the last 15 years, this is believed to be the first time since the 1962 missile crisis that Soviet military units have become involved in the island's defense.

Coal Strike Causing Problems

The first mandatory cutbacks in the use of electricity were ordered Monday in Indiana and West Virginia as a result of decreasing stocks of coal as the deadlocked coal strike reached the 70-day mark.

Pressure on Arnold R. Miller, the President of the United Mine Workers, to resign continued to mount in the aftermath of the mine union's rejection of the contract proposal.

The most critically hit area is presently southern Indiana where a 25% cutback was issued for utilities with less than a 40-day supply of coal. If the 30-day mark is reached, large industrial users will be ordered to reduce electricity consumption to "plant protection levels" which would certainly result in widespread layoffs.

Even if a settlement was reached, which does not seem probable in the near future, at least three weeks is required for ratification on a contract and to restart the mine operations.

Fighting Continues on the Horn

Ethiopian troops are pressing Somali forces back from the most heavily populated portion of central Ethiopia. The Ethiopian counteroffensive was accomplished with superior air power and a heavy reliance on Soviet arms. The advance represents the most significant turn in the seven month war since the Somalies moved into the Ethiopian highlands in September.

The Somalis, however, though outnumbered and outgunned, are dug in at strategic bunkers throughout the mountains and valleys.

Reports from Ethiopia indicate that morale is much higher in the Somali army unlike that of the Ethiopians who have in the past mutinied over the rigid policies of the governing Provisional Military Advisory Council.

Most correspondents at the front feel that both sides are equipped to hold their ground and are digging in for a long and bloody war.

Blumenthal Meets With Finance Ministers

Treasury Secretary W. Michael Blumenthal met in Paris on Monday with the Finance Ministers of Britain, France, West Germany, and Japan. Their confidential talks centered on the world's present economic problems. The present doldrums tha world economy is facing threatens to ruin the planned economic summit meeting to be held in West Germany in July.

The root cause of the exchange markets' current turbulence lies in the huge United States balance-of-payments deficit, which, is depressing the dollar, and the German and Japanese surpluses that are pushing up the mark and the yen.

Probe Into Movie Industry

David Begelman, a top officer of Columbia Pictures, resigned last week for the second time in four months. Begelman was forced to quit last October after he admittedly had embezzled $61,008 from Columbia. In December the company reinstated him but as allegations of a coverup continued, his dismissal seemed inevitable.

As a result of the Begelman affair, the Government has begun looking into the movie industry. Among the abuses being investigated: (1) "Product splitting" in which competing theaters agree not to show the same movie at the same time. (2) "Blind bidding" in which theaters must bid competitively for films that are not even completed. (3) "Block bidding" in which studios demand that theaters show less popular movies if they also want the hits.

U. S. to Supply Weapons to Egypt

In a major policy shift in the Middle East President Carter has approved the sale of war planes to Egypt, Israel, and Saudi Arabia. Although the measure must be accepted by the U.S. Congress, it marks the first time a President has offered to sell offensive weapons to Egypt.

The proposal calls for twice as many planes to be sold to Israel, planes that are also much faster. Saudi Arabia will also receive 60 of the faster F-15's. Egypt will get the smaller F5E's. The entire package is worth $4.8 billion.

Secretary of State Cyrus Vance said the proposed sales would mean "no shift in policy on the part of the United States." It should "improve the security of all parties concerned." Vance also said it would serve to advance the peace initiatives in that part of the world.

Israeli Prime Minister Menachim Begin is concerned that the decision to give F-15's to Saudi Arabia represents a giant leap forward in the Arab arsenal and thus serves to further reduce the precarious balance of power in the Middle East.

Some Israeli officials expressed the belief that the new weapons sales could lead to a preemptive strike policy that has plagued the Middle East since the first Arab/Israeli war in 1948.

Hello, my name is Mr. 1069

Saying that it would be "an offense to basic human dignity," a district court judge denied the request of a Minneapolis man who wanted his name changed to a number – 1069.

Michael Herbert Dengler cited philosophical reasons for seeking legalization of the name to 1069 which he claims he has used for the past four years.

Dangler said he has been discriminated against by potential employers, with one interviewer at a large corporation telling him: "You come in here with a name. We'll give you a number."

Although believing him to be sincere in his philosophical motives for the name change, the judge who handed down the decision said that he could not "in good conscience add to today's inhumanity by giving it the stamp of judicial approval."

White House Backing Down

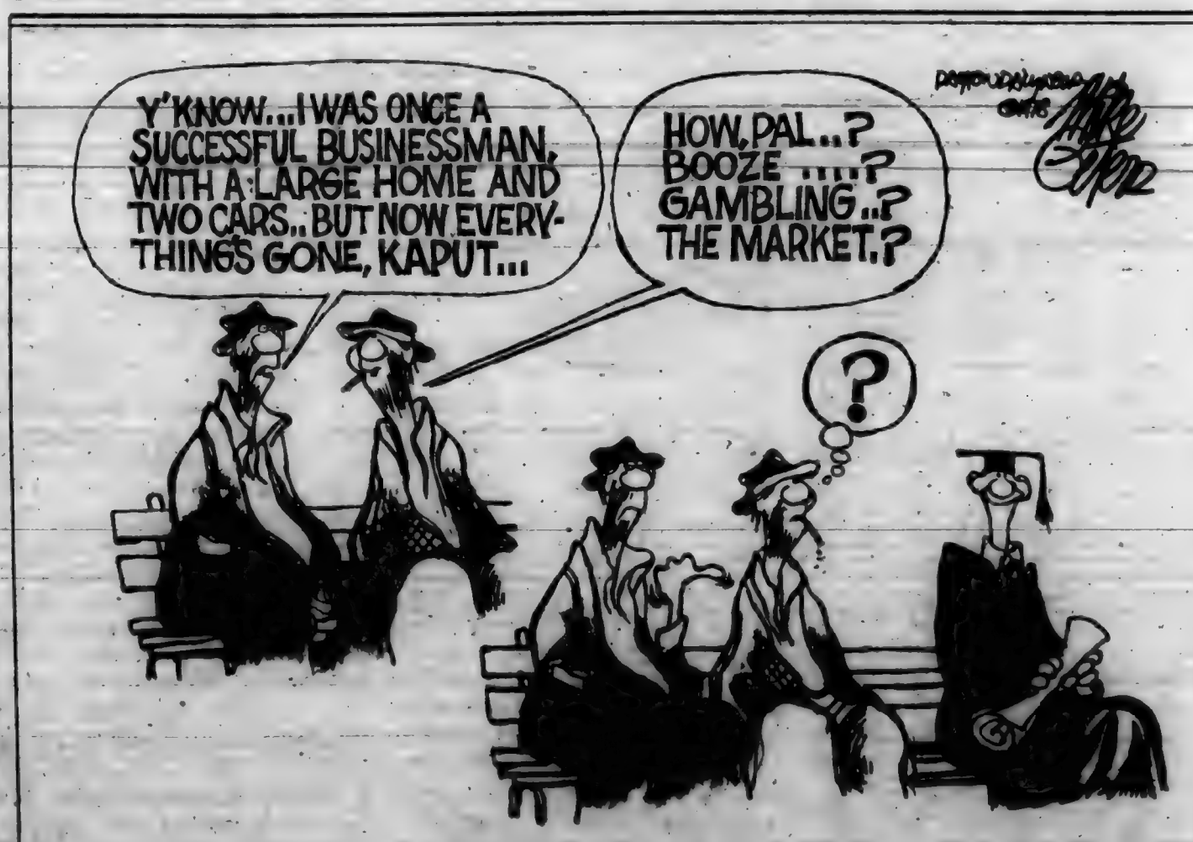
White House press secretary Jody Powell issued yet another administration statement saying the United States was still opposed to Israeli settlements in occupied Arab territory.

The White House statement appeared to be designed to call a halt to the arguments while leaving the issue itself unresolved. Powell ended his lecture by saying "It is not our desire to in any way further or prolong public debate over the settlements."

Although American and Israeli officials in Washington did not step back from their opposing views on the settlement issue, they seemed at pains to play down the dispute.

Non-White Named To South African Davis Cup Team

For the first time in its history South Africa has named a non-white, Peter Lamb, to its Davis Cup tennis team that will play the United States in Nashville, Tenn. next month.



Justice Blen L. Franklin, resident of the South African Tennis Union, denied that Lamb had been added to the team in an attempt to prevent South Africa's expulsion from Davis Cup competition.

After finding out about his selection Lamb told reporters, "I guess from a political standpoint this might be tokenism. But I consider myself a sportsman, and I won't pass up a chance like this to represent my country." Nevertheless, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said it would go through with its planned protest demonstration at Vanderbilt on March 18.

New Use For Old Drug

A study reported last week has shown that an old drug can halve the incidence of sudden deaths from second heart attacks. The drug is sulfinpyrazone, marketed as Anturane and used since 1959 to treat gout.

The research results, if borne out by general use, could represent one of the most significant medical advances in many decades. Heart disease is the leading cause of death in the United States. About 1.1 million Americans suffer first heart attacks every year, and of the 400,000 who survive initially, 12 percent die within a year from another attack.

The Female Undergraduate:

Either She Wins or She Wins

By Luke Albee

The feminist movement has gone far enough for the majority of females in America. Regardless of what is espoused by radical liberationists, American women now realize that they could never be in a better situation. Germaine Greer, in the article "The Stereotype," eagerly casts males and females on opposing sides in the fight for female equality. She depicts womankind as a non-thinking mass, programmed, influenced, and manipulated by their male adversaries. I find it difficult to accept this hypothesis. Ms. Greer fails to recognize the female intellect; and what a self-interested intellect it is! The current attitude of the majority of female undergraduates is a perfect example of the arrival of the self-interested female in America.

In their quest for equality, women are greatly concerned about changing their stereotyped identity as a sex object. It is said that men look at women as objects of lust and pleasure. "The Dream of the American Male," an article written by E. B. White, epitomizes the ideal male conception of a woman: beautiful, unashamed, and untroubled. This level of male mentality is unacceptable to women. What is acceptable is using males as a form of long-term security. Hypocrisy? The way females view men may not be on par with the sex objects stereotype, yet is important enough to merit recognition.

When discussing the similarities and differences between male and female undergraduates, subjects that immediately come to mind are the institution of marriage and career goals. The role of the American male has changed very little since the inception of the feminist movement. Men have always been expected by themselves and society to be financially self-sufficient and able to provide for their potential family. To a male success is not only desirable but mandatory. It is rare when a man admits he could passively accept a role where he is supported by his working wife. This is not the case with women. Until quite recently, the job of women in American society was to concentrate on domestic problems and raise children. Women who did work were usually given unrewarding, menial positions with little consideration given to their prior intellectual accomplishments. It was rare when the salary of a female equalled or exceeded that of her spouse's. Women once needed to get married in order to live a life of relative comfort.

This is no longer the situation. Females are now receiving equal educational opportunities and are attending colleges in record numbers. Supposed equality in the search for success has been attained. Finding a husband is theoretically no longer a prerequisite for comfortable living. Women now find it possible to plan and pursue their own career interests. This appears acceptable in theory; however, theory and reality are separate issues.

The attitude that many women bring in to college is one of having nothing to lose. The common denominator among men and women in college is their quest for some post-graduate goal. The alternatives available if these goals are not achieved are where the attitudes of males and females differ. Success is not obligatory for a female. She may go about her studies eagerly; she does her best to reach her full intellectual potential. Always in the back of her mind is the belief that if she does not succeed in her specific field of endeavor, she will still be able to find a husband who will support her. She is free to attempt to get into medical school, but still has alternatives if she does not get in. This is a difficult point for a woman to admit. I am not saying the sole reason women attend college is to find a husband. A family is just one possibility open to our newly liberated female.

My opinion may not go unchallenged. If my theory is wrong, it would be interesting to hear justification for many things one observes when viewing the interaction of males and females on the college campus. No matter what is written about modern day dating practices, most women still expect to be paid for when in the company of a male. When one realizes the similar financial status of most college students regardless of sex, this practice appears ludicrous. Although times may be changing, there still exists a definite double standard involving sexual activity. Girls who have frequent sexual encounters are generally looked down upon by their peers. Similar male activity is deemed natural and acceptable. What does all this mean? If males and females think of their own careers first, and marriage a distant second, explaining this double standard would be a formidable task. Realistically, females still feel they must appear relatively innocent and thereby continue to foster the myth that males are only attracted to the inexperienced bride.

The feminist movement has had a positive effect on the treatment of females in this country. But the changing of female ideologies has not been commensurate with the strides that have been taken to reduce job and salary discrimination. Our self-interested female sees no reason why it should.

By Nancy Powell

"I'm walking a tight wire, One side's ice and one is fire..." Leon Russell

Detecting a kind of vacant, dull look in people's eyes as I walk around this campus, I would like to attribute it to a general contentment, a pervasive feeling of purpose. The milling bodies create an atmosphere of happy intellectual pursuit; a pursuit of higher learning which is our reason and the University's for being here. But, I fear the glassy-eyed look is more a sign of disenchantment than of satisfaction. I suspect that a majority of students here are, like myself, vaguely aware that something is missing. That something is quality.

If someone surveyed the undergraduate body, and asked how many of us have a clear sense of purpose, of why we are here, the results would probably be depressing. I watch people drifting through their four years, as though they were serving time. There's nothing inherently wrong with drifting, but it's a pretty expensive drift. It is not just a question of the validity of what we are offered in the classroom. There are unquestionably many things to be taught and learned, and the traditional setting (of a University) is a secure, accepted and accredited means. Within the classroom, however, the spirit of inquiry and exchange seems largely to have died. A natural death? Inevitable in these tenuous times? Or are there specific contradictions within the system that negate the ideal of education as it should be?

Every institute of "higher learning" today abides by the concept of "publish or perish." It's accepted by most administrators and instructors that one's publications and research directly imply his or her qualifications for employment. And certainly it is one manifestation of academic worth – but it should not become, as it has, the sole criterion for being rehired or granted the golden apple of tenure. Teaching quality should be judged on much more than the simple number of articles a professor has published in a given time. Nor does a prolific writing ability necessarily imply competence as a teacher. Publish or perish is the sword of Damocles hanging over all our heads; and those who live by the sword...

The publish or perish concept detracts from the overall standard of the classroom. It forces faculty to concentrate on their private pursuits far too often in a kind of desperate race to accrue a maximum number of titles to their credit. It is production not for its own sake but for the sake of survival. The faculty I spoke with were unanimous in their negative feeling on the policy. Investigation and scholarship are devalued when the motivation is impure.

No department is free from the effects of this strategy. The absence of sharing, of a communion of ideas is evident to any outsider who walks the sepulchral halls and reads the foreboding signs on office doors. I fear that those in the sciences are especially vulnerable to the pressure to reap results, to make that crucial breakthrough. There is little sense of community, of academe as it is meant to be, as Aristotle posited it. People are driven...

And some of the best of them are being driven right out of the University. Gerry Swanson, oriental philosopher, accused of not teaching his subject properly (I had no complaints, and know of no student dissatisfaction) and told that there was no place for him here, sorry. Ross Brewer, admired and praised by students and colleagues, also has been "not rehired." Tim Bates, assistant professor of economics, with one of the most impressive lists of publications to his credit, was denied promotion (a usual indicator of whether tenure will be bestowed) when his case reached Robert Arns, Vice President of Academic Affairs. Arns, new this year, has final decision-making power over all academic departments. Bates was approved by his department, by the committee of Arts and Science members, the Dean, and the university-wide Committee of Faculty Affairs. He is appealing the decision.

The really disturbing thing about the publish or perish mentality is that it seems to be serving as a guise for the actual reasons behind firings, rehirings, promotions and the granting of tenure. Naturally, it does not come down to student consensus of an instructor's capacities. The faculty are hanging on tenderhooks and the situation is clearly reflected in the declining quality of education at UVM. For students and teachers alike, the result of the administrative attitude, of which "p or p" is just an overt manifestation, is a denial of intellectual freedom.

Anti-Nukes To Be Brought to Trial

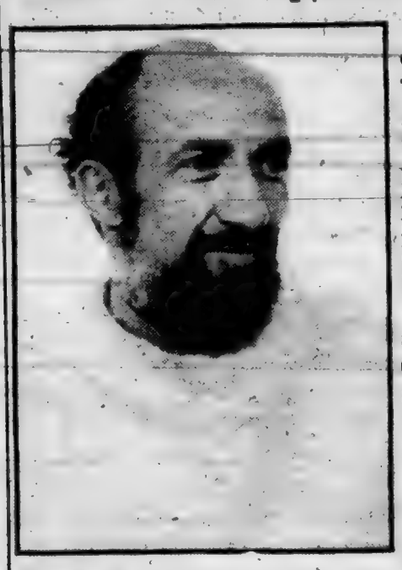
By Nancy Powell



Thirteen anti-nuke activists charged with trespassing at Vermont Yankee will be brought to trial on February 22 in Windham District Court. The defendants, who comprise the Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance, obstructed traffic at the gate to the nuclear power plant for approximately three hours on October 8, 1977.

According to a spokesperson for the group, that date was chosen because the plant was scheduled for refiring of its generators after having been shut down. Plant officials had prior knowledge of the anti-nuke plans, and, unknown to the demonstrators at the time, started Yankee operations at 1 a.m. that day.

The defendants will defend themselves jointly. Originally they planned to present a "Defense of Necessity," a legal clause by which trespassers claim the existence of an emergency situation which warrants minimal activity on private property. "Defense of Necessity" is applicable to cases in which crisis conditions require breaking of the law in order to avert further danger. The group felt that Vermont Yankee posed such a threat. Judge Costus denied their request at the pre-trial hearing on February 7. He explained that no such precedent had been set for a criminal case.

A sizeable show of support by opponents of nuclear power is expected at the trial. The Decommissioning Alliance and the larger Red Clover Alliance regard the trial as an opportunity to alert the public to the dangers of nuclear radiation and the record of malfunctions and breakdowns of the Vernon plant.

Falk To Speak On Vietnam

Richard Falk.

Richard Falk, an expert on international law, will speak Tuesday at 8 p.m. in Carpenter Auditorium, Given Building, and will meet with students and the public at an informal reception in Given Building following the lecture. He will discuss "Images of International Order and the Vietnam War.".

He will meet with students and the public again Wednesday (Feb. 22) from 10 to 11:45 a.m. at John Dewey Lounge and from 2 to 4 p.m. at the Fireplace Lounge, Living/Learning Center.

Falk is an Albert Milbank Professor of International Law at Princeton University and Acting Director of the Center for International Studies there.

the system. This, however, leads to the problem which social service agencies have in reaching this young person.

A third bill relating to juvenile defenders involves a reciprocal agreement between the education administrators of the offender's hometown, and the town in which he is living within a group home situation. "Many towns can't afford to educate children through their own tax dollars at the local level for a group home," says Rep. Morse.

Another aspect of children's issues which was dealt with was child abuse. One member of the audience commented, "I'm living in a situation right now where I think there is some degree of child abuse going on. I've been there over a month now and it's been consistent – I just hear them flying against the wall and landing." To report a case of child abuse, Rep. Morse recommends calling the Medical Center Abuse Teams, the State Rehabilitative Services, or the Visiting Nurse Association.

Johannes Troost made a concluding point which summarizes the attitude of the American public: "We have such a children's channel, that they're possessions, and if you go into the family system and you start to talk about raising the awareness of children, what's happening to them and their rights, you're breaking into the property system of America. It seems that if people can open their minds and remember that children are human beings with just a little less experience in living, perhaps the problems of the abandoned, the unwanted, the delinquent, and abuse of youth will have a chance to make it in this world."

maintenance and equipment purchases which we know full well will come back to haunt us," he added.

According to UVM spokesmen, the hike in non-resident tuition (seven percent) would bring in $981,000. Other alternatives to be utilized were said to be "our expectation that we can increase our income from federal and private sources by $346,000; the effect of the recommended state appropriation increase (300,000); and our plan to cut expenditures by $415,000."

—A world within itself

By Ginger Hinman

Imagine Vermont on the East Coast of Africa.

Lake Champlain is the Indian Ocean with 380 miles of coral beaches and coconut palms. The warmest month is January when the average temperature is a dry 95 and the water a relaxing 75.

Envision Mt. Mansfield, glacier capped and bisected by the equator at 11,000 feet. Fantasize about the rolling pasture lands as flat arid savannahs, giraffe, gazelle, elephants and lions roam freely over this unindustrialized domain...

Your imagination has travelled 7,600 miles to Kenya.

We often glance over our shoulder to picture a place where technology has not intruded; where people still depend entirely on the natural environment for their subsistence. Texas-sized Kenya is such a place.

Nairobi, its capital, comparable in size to Boston, is indeed a city of contrasts. Closely bordered by a national park where lions stalk and prey on antelope, Nairobi's skyscrapers provide a vivid diversity by housing some of the most fashionable shops and spirited discoteques a city can hope for. Although Nairobi is a modern, growing metropolis, it has distinct differences from its American counterparts. There are blind, disabled beggars on almost every street corner and determined policemen guard the local banks with machine guns tucked tightly underneath one arm. The streets are filled with people selling their hand-made crafts, doing anything to make a sale — except lower their prices.

THE TRIBES

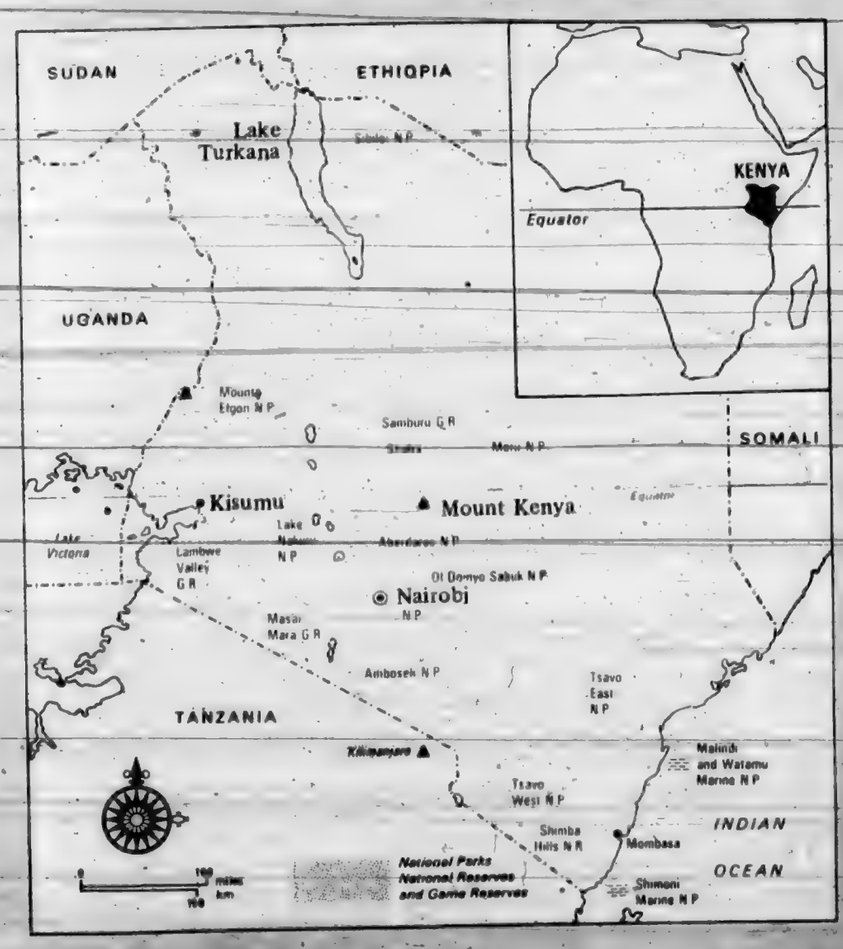
Aside from Kenya's topography, there are the people — a diverse group coming from over fifty different ethnic backgrounds each with their own language, tradition, and cultures.

The most powerful of all the tribal groups is the Kikuyu (Ki-ku-yu) from which comes the President of Kenya, Mzee Jomo Kenyatta. The Kikuyu, farmers harvesting primarily bananas, sugar cane, and coffee to be sold in the market places, inhabit the territory north of Nairobi. Many of their families own livestock, usually several cows, goats, and chickens (which are used at daily meals).

The Kikuyu live in small huts made from wood, mud, cow dung and water. In the huts there are usually three rooms: a dining and sitting room where the children attend to their evening chores by candlelight, and two bedrooms — one for the parents and the other for the children. The kitchen is separate from the rest of the house as it is the only room from which women are allowed to enter. Men never prepare the meals. Women do the slaughtering, cleaning, and preparation.



In the Kikuyu tribe, as in many others, the women do most of the work. They prepare the soil for planting, and care for the crop while it is maturing. Only during the harvest do the men lend a hand. One will notice a Kikuyu woman on the side of the road carrying two children (one of each hip) with sticks for a fire strapped to her back, and both arms filled with ten gallon containers of water. The man will be walking by her side with nothing in his arms or on his back; it is considered a sin for a man to engage in manual labor. If there is work for him to do, he will rise early, finish his work by mid-morning, and then be off to visit friends.

Due to this distribution of labor, children play an important economic role in Kenyan society. The Kikuyu measure their wealth by the number of children they have. Most Kenyan children are given responsibility very early in life. Girls of eight tend to their younger brothers and sisters and are often responsible for taking the farm produce to the market. Young boys are usually responsible for herding the family livestock. Children are encouraged to be responsible through love and devotion, not discipline. Young children are constantly being hugged and held; they do their chores out of love, not because they are forced to.

Vitamins Prevent Cancer?

By Peter Millard

Cancer is neither one of the most painful nor one of the most commonly fatal diseases known to mankind, but the emotional significance surrounding it gives cancer great meaning today. Modern medicine has had very little success in defining and treating it, much less in preventing it, because cancer is not a disease that arises from a single, definable cause from outside the body.

It is not caused by a readily definable bacterium or virus like tuberculosis or the common cold, and it manifests itself differently depending on the organ where it is found. Cancer is most frightening because it is a disease in which the cells of our own body multiply uncontrollably, engulf and destroy the healthy tissue. Sometimes it can be removed surgically and sometimes slowed by drugs or radiation, but the real hope for the future may lie in preventing cancer before it starts.

There is currently a great deal of cancer research being done in this country and, interestingly enough, vitamin A and vitamin C are two of the most promising substances being studied to prevent it. This research is not new, but what makes it unusual is that it is not based on claims by "crackpots" but on research conducted by the National Cancer Institute, Johns Hopkins University, and many leading medical institutions.

Led by Dr. Linus Pauling, a group of researchers in California reports to have found cancer cures using vitamin C. However, because Pauling has been virtually black-balled by the scientific community for his stand on vitamin C and the common cold, his research has not been published in the scientific literature. Several studies have been published, however, linking vitamin C to the prevention of intestinal cancer which is second only to lung cancer in mortality. These studies are gaining acceptance even among conservatives.

Several years ago it was reported in the press that nitrites used as preservative in bacon and other meats are known to cause cancer. Nitrites and other similar chemicals commonly ingested do not in themselves cause cancer but are converted to other, cancer-causing chemicals during cooking or in the process of digestion. The value of vitamin C is that it prevents the formation of the cancer-causing substances. To quote from the influential medical journal Lancet (8/17/77) "we have shown that a fish eaten in Japan, where the incidence of gastric cancer is high, yields a mutagen when treated with nitrite, but this mutagen is not formed in the presence of vitamin C. This finding accords with the evidence that gastric cancer is lower in populations consuming lettuce, green vegetables, and other sources of vitamin C."

Many more research studies have been conducted since the early 1970's on the prevention of cancer by vitamin A and by man-made substances (retinoids) which closely resemble the vitamin. There has been some concern over use of the natural vitamin because it is known to be toxic in high doses, which doesn't seem to be the case with the synthetic retinoids. The RDA for the natural vitamin A, for example, is 5,000 units and doses taken in excess of 50,000 units for several months cause toxicity. In practice, cases of vitamin A toxicity are rarely found, and it is more likely that there is a deficit of vitamin A in many diets lacking in fresh vegetables and fruits.

Vitamin A, like vitamin C, is implicated in detoxification of harmful chemicals but it also helps repair living cells from the damage already done by cancer-causing substances (Federation Proceedings 5/1975). Vitamin A has its beneficial effect, though, only on organs containing epithelial tissue like the lungs, stomach and intestines, uterus, kidney and bladder, prostate, and skin. Cancer in these organs accounts for well over half the total primary cancer in both men and women.

It is impossible to say at this time that vitamin A and C irrefutably prevent cancer, but it is very probable that they help. In any case, changing your diet to include more yellow and green vegetables such as spinach, lettuce, and carrots and plenty of fresh fruit will certainly not be harmful, will ensure that you get enough of these important nutrients, and will probably benefit you in other ways as well!

fish with harpoons in crocodile infested waters, consistently striking their target. They catch primarily Nile perch, Kingfish, and turtles whose shells are used as water containers.

The Elmolo construct their homes from the branches of the Doum palm, allowing cool breezes to blow through their home. The women don't help in the construction, but they do weave baskets and ropes, and mend the fishing nets when the men come home from a fishing expedition.

Unfortunately the Elmolo territory, previously untouched by western technology, has changed drastically since the introduction of tourism in 1974. Many of their traditions have fallen by the wayside because of the influx of Western ideas.

THE MASAI

The Masai, a tribe inhabiting the territory south of Nairobi, are genetically a very tall, slender people. Because the Masai are nomadic and continuously following herds of cattle, their homes are constructed from randomly found bushes, grasses and trees. They remain in an area for approximately one month and then move on when the area is fully grazed.

The Masai traditionally do not kill wild animals, but rather coexist harmoniously with them in the park. It is quite common to see young men herding their cattle alongside gazelle, giraffe and wildebeest. Like the Kikuyu, young boys assume responsibility for the family herd from an early age. While herding, they are traditionally not allowed to turn from lions stalking their cattle. They must charge and kill their predator and, if successful, they will be considered by the rest of the tribe to have achieved manhood.

As other tribal groups, young men of the Masai are the only ones allowed to wear long hair. Everyone else, including the women, shave their heads. The Masai,

The "red elephant" sprays himself for protection against bugs. Below appear a female ostrich and a giraffe. Pictures are from David Keith Jones' Faces of Kenya.

who customarily dress in red cloth, can be recognized by their extensive use of jewelry, which is handmade by sewing beads onto cowhide. Both sexes wear necklaces and earrings. Since their jewelry is so heavy, the earlobes on most Masai is slit which results in their lobes hanging frequently below their chins. (See front cover.)

THE ANIMALS AND NATIONAL PARKS

Kenya has set aside over 13,000 square miles for national parks and reserves abundant with all types of wild animals. The largest of these parks, Tsavo, is bisected by the main road between Nairobi and Mombasa – Kenya's two largest cities. Tsavo, 8,034 square miles of land, is the home of more elephants than any other park in the country. The elephants in the park are known as the "red elephants." When they are hot and irritated by bugs they inhale the red dust into their trunks, and spray it over their bodies creating a permanent red tint for protection.

In all national parks, there can be found the "big game" (lions, elephants, giraffes, etc.). The leopards, however, hunt only at night and therefore are not easily spotted. The cheetah has a serious problem as it needs large areas of open land in which to hunt. Even in the parks they are often disturbed during their hunt by tourists who move vehicles in too close to see everything. They are the fastest animals on earth, but once they catch their prey they can not expect more than one good gulp before another predator will steal the kill.

Although the hippopotamus could never win any beauty contest, this animal is amazingly graceful underwater taking long, strong, slow strides. They feed chiefly on grass, and will often wander several miles away from water at night to search for food. During the days, however, the hippotomae stay near water because they overheat in the sun.

There are two types of giraffe and zebra in Kenya. The Masai giraffe and Burchelle's zebra are both prevalent in and out of the parks. The Reticulated giraffe (uniformly patterned) and the Grevy's zebra can only be found in small areas of Kenya, and because of their scarcity have been poached in great numbers for their hides.

Big game in Kenya are exciting to see, but there are other species equally as fascinating. The Wildebeest, for example, migrates during November from Masai Mara to the Serengeti in Tanzania, covering an area with such density that the ground is barely visible. The Wildebeest, when on the move, appears to be in parade because of the way one follows the other in single file.

Kenya has adopted the nickname "beauty and the beast," and after arriving in the Amboseli game reserve, there was no question as to why. The national parks are situated in the most picturesque landscapes of the country. The animals are free to come and go, and do so according to the rainfall. Zebra, gazelle, wildebeest, topi, and ostrich can be seen in every corner of the country. A day in Kenya's national parks is stimulating indeed. It is the earth's most beautiful painting on canvas, her greatest play, her most magnificent symphony.

MOUNT KENYA

North of Nairobi rise the twin peaks of Mount Kenya – 17,058 majestic feet above sea level. These, however, are not the highest in Africa; Kilimanjaro rises 19,340 feet. Mount Kenya, a dormant volcano, is said to be one of the most difficult climbs in the world. At one time the mountain rose 23,000 feet, but over the years the remaining lava has been eaten away.

The climb up Mount Kenya commences at 10,000 feet in a dark, lush rain-forest where the going is easy and pleasant. The ascent up Kenya in the middle of the short rains (November), makes the going tougher than usual. After the beauty of the rain forest, the next 4,000 feet are spent in a vertical bog, in which the climbers sink up to their thighs making each step slow and strenuous. Once out of the bog the climb becomes easier as it descends slightly into a valley with cool breezes and cold, clear glacier fed streams. The floor of the valley is rugged from the remains of the lava from the mountains last eruption. Camp is made at the near end of the Teleki valley with the mountain peaks in the background.

The climb must be initiated before sunrise because by late afternoon the peaks are engulfed with heavy snow-filled clouds. The twin peaks are impossible to reach without the use of technical equipment, but most climbers reach point Lemena at 16,260 feet without any special gear. Although the climb up Mount Kenya is difficult and grueling, it is well worth the effort. It is truly a beautiful sculpturesque mountain.

THE COAST

From the coast of Mount Kenya, it is a pleasant ascent to the warm waters of the Indian Ocean. Although the country is bisected by the equator, the entire coast lies below it. The largest coast city is Mombasa with a population of a quarter of a million. Mombasa, an island, is one of the largest ports on the East African Coast. For snow white beaches and clear water, one must either travel north or south of the city. The coast is dotted with expensive hotels, but this never crowds the beaches; they are always nearly empty and many times quite lonely. The coastal people are comprised mostly of Moslems. The women are not allowed to show any part of their body other than their eyes in public. They dress in black cloth, draping it over their entire body. The coastal people are friendly and very tourist-oriented. Most visitors come from Germany and Britain spending their time in the sun by the Indian Ocean. The entire coast is protected by a coral reef allowing safe bathing at high tide and revealing beautiful shallow lagoons filled with colorful marine life at low tide. Walking on them and examining the sea life is an education within itself.

Lamu is a small island on the Lamu – Bolo northern section of the Coast, which has some of the most beautiful beaches and customs in all of Kenya. There are no cars in Lamu, only horse-drawn carts. One can stand in the middle of the main street, raise arms to shoulder height, and touch the building on either side. Moslem in tradition, Lamu has existed on its present site for over six hundred years. The Jahazias, or sailing ship, is still the main mode of transportation to the mainland..

A typical day spent on the coast is lounging under the swaying palms with an occasional dip in the Indian Ocean. One might buy a hand-made basket from a local Bantu craftsman, or just sit and watch the camels stroll by. Camels which abound on the coast are used as a means of transportation or in place of donkeys for carrying goats.

Kenya is a country full of beautiful cultures and people, many of which have been untouched by modern civilization. The wildlife is uncomparable ranging from the not so attractive warthog to the majestic and graceful cheetah. With the twin peaks of Mount Kenya, the savanahhs, the South with its warm and luscious coast, the country of Kenya is indeed a world within itself.

Recycling Re-Initiated

The UVM recycling program is being re-initiated under the supervision of Jon Pace, a resident of Robinson Hall. In an attempt to expand upon last year's resources, Pace hopes to collect paper from University Services, and containers normally discarded by SAGA, in addition to the normal round-up of campus newspapers.

During an environmental group meeting earlier this month, Pace examined many of the factors involved in organizing this project. Determination of the group's goal was one of the primary discussion topics as well as collection sites, transportation, and Residential Life, security and fire codes.

"I'm very happy with the cooperation I've received from the University," said Pace. In a later interview, he expressed enthusiasm about coordinating the recycling program with the Burlington Community. Steve Lang, the organizer of the recycling workshop at the Church Street Center, has been working with Pace, but Pace sees problems in a campus-community linkage because of the lack of students to pull the program through the summer.

However, collection around the University has already begun and the efforts of a few have been surmounting tons of recyclable material. Anyone interested in volunteering towards this common goal of ecological awareness is encouraged to contact Jon Pace at twenty-six Robinson Hall or call 656-3084.

Jon Pace recently re-initiated the recycling program and is seeking help in the form of volunteers and observance of the collection points for recyclables.

The Masquerade of Mardi Gras

By Curtis Haynes

"If it's crazy, it's worth doing."

Dr. Gonzo

Is your Christmas vacation tan peeling? Tired of snow, Finbar's and Mad River? (Not to mention classes!) Obviously, you need a vacation whether you know it or not. After all, what are the first few weeks of the semester besides looking for a new man or woman, smoking lots of reefer and drinking too much keg beer? Next year at this time, do yourself a favor. Pile into a car, or go in a convoy (put that CB to good use) and head SSW for thirty hours. Chances are you'll wind up in New Orleans (pronounced Noo Awlins, honey).

Mardi Gras – Fat Tuesday or Shrove Tuesday – is traditionally the last day of gaiety and revelry before 40 days of fasting leading up to Easter. But Mardi Gras is more than an annual one day, one shot celebration. The two weeks before Mardi Gras are filled with parades and parties both day and night, and do not stop until everyone finally passes out on Fat Tuesday.

Doug Walton, a stout, beer guzzling Texan, explained, "Mardi Gras is unique. It's a lotta people and a lotta beer, and a lotta wild times."

"I've lost track of the days," Walton continued. "It seems like one day is three because you party three times a day – in the morning, afternoon, and at night: this is serious partying! What you did 24 hours ago seems like last year."

No small wonder New Orleans is known as The-City-That-Care-Forgot. But you have to go there to believe it...

Debauchery occurs anytime, anywhere; but most of it happens in the French Quarter, centered on famous Bourbon Street. Bourbon Street is packed with civil disobedience, jazz, strip shows, and alcohol fumes powerful enough to ruin a bloodhound's nose. The Quarter rowdiness builds to a crescendo on Sunday night, then levels off. This happens every year – THE MADNESS peaks too soon, so that by the arrival of Mardi Gras itself, the folks who have come to town for a wild time (college kids, freaks, and general transients) are sleeping in the gutters and missing the good stuff.

The rest of the country, which knows little about the Mardi Gras social order (it's all a High Society put-on), thinks it's all stars and TV specials. This year's stars included Ed McMahon of Johnny Carson fame, and Cheryl Ladd, Charlie's newest Angel. But as Walton said, downing a Dixie beer, "the real stars of Mardi Gras are the people."

Schoolteachers decked out as bellydancers, walking tubes of Preparation-H, strange agents of the apocalypse, hallucinations of the gaudiest sort – all blend into the most colorful, insane crowd in America! Parades, pageants, and processions endlessly troop by to the sound of Dixieland Jazz. Floats carrying masked merry-makers spew thousands of cheap plastic beads and coins. The throngs pinch, stomp, and bite to collect as many as possible of these worthless trinkets. But the struggles are all in good fun: drinks, jokes, and good times are robustly (if not madly) enjoyed by all.

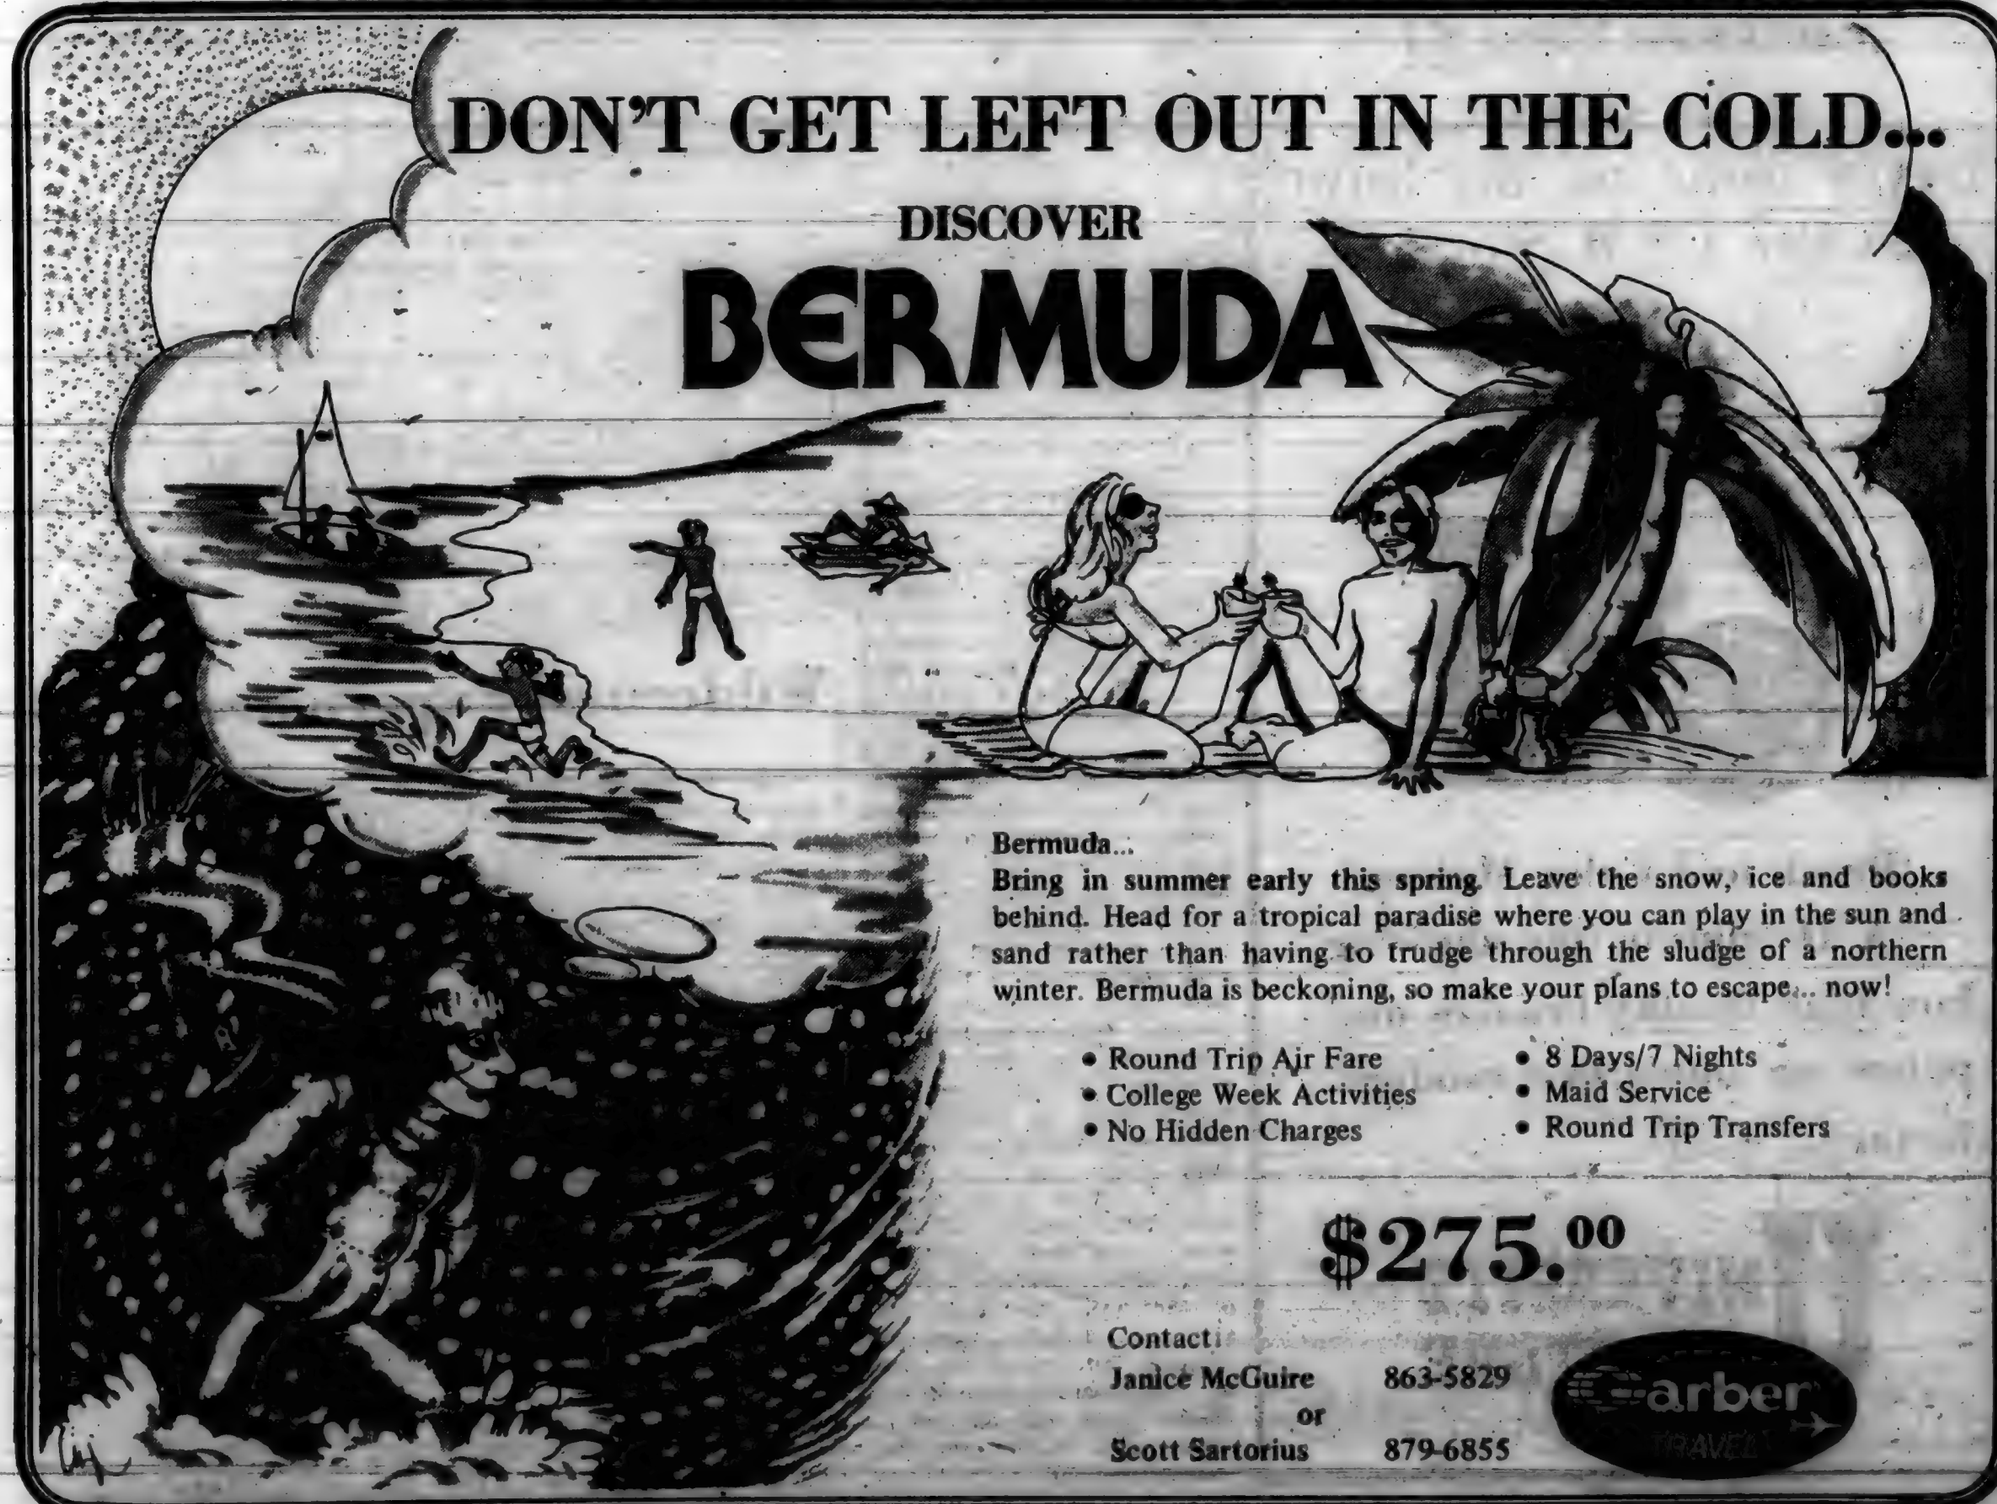
Violence is minimal – a tribute in part to the local police who frequently work 16-hour days during the Carnival. And the police are strict: carrying a knife in the French Quarter (even if it's an eating utensil) will get you arrested. Public drinking (a lot of it too) must be done from paper cups, as cans and bottles have been outlawed.

"You might lose a few brain cells," Walton chortled, polishing off a Coors. "But it's all for a good cause. Mardi Gras is when people act like God intended them to – crazy, Crazy, CRAZY!"

It's impossible to plan what to do for Mardi Gras, but it's a good idea to have a pre-arranged place to stay, even if it's on the floor. Invariably, most of the one million visitors end up sleeping in their cars. But be forewarned that New Orleans in February is chilly.

New Orleans has always been a town for those seeking a good time, and is reason alone for the journey. New Orleans is the First City of the South and the Southern flavor is brought to life in graceful pillared mansions, delicate grillwork, and the broad boulevards of Uptown. The local food – featuring Red Beans and Rice and Gumbo – is delectable. Within a few hours, you'll find yourself taking on that soft Southern drawl... Its claim to be America's most interesting city is undeniable.

So next year, wherever you are, Don't HESITATE! Go for it!



The drive down isn't hard: get on I-87 in New York and it's interstate all the way. With the strength of youth, you and your friends can live on adrenaline, caffeine, and other drugs for a day and a half. And there is some spectacular scenery along the way.

On the return trip north, you will need stamina and large eyeballs – the true Red-Eye Express. Whether or not you make straight for dear ol' UVM, you will surely wonder why your parents, scholarships and loans won't pay you to travel around the USA and partake of life as it really is, or should be.

The Myth of Winter Ducks

By Timothy Traver

"Pearl Street injects me with an overdose of rational plasma. It is there that I realize you must feel that you are going somewhere."

There is a pool of water down behind Burlington City Lights on the shore of Champlain that stays open all winter because it is warmed by the outflow from the plant. Bob Spear, who wrote the Birds of Vermont, told me I could find ducks there, sometimes ten different species. So this morning I decided, being unemployed and taking only one course at the University in uplands wildlife ecology, to walk down Pearl Street and have a look.

Used to being a student, I suffer from schedulosis, an addiction to activity, and a compulsion to be always on the move. Going somewhere. "This is what vacation is for," my mother would say "To unwind." But even she would raise an eyebrow about being willfully unemployed, it being one step above welfare.

Binoculars wrapped in an old shirt, then stuffed into a pack, wool coat, sorrels on, I crunch down the stairs, survey the daily dog wreckage of neighbors garbage, turn the corner of the garage to clamber over Benlises fallen icicles, and walk out onto Orchard Terrace. I tell myself that some of the best work comes out of being "unemployed" because you only have yourself to contend with. There is a poet on this street who, while living for several years on welfare, produced poems that are too beautiful for description.

Pearl Street injects me with an overdose of rational plasma. It is there that I realize that you must feel that you are going somewhere. I embrace my destination whole-heartedly, and take it upon myself to look around me with the eyes of a naturalist viewing an unknown world.

A Black Label bottle cap and a band-aid are under translucent ice and on top a greasy tear of green cloth beside a twist of bright red yarn. Forbidden flowers. I pick up a button; these and paper clips I stop for always. Tarnished pennies, rim leads, metal that reflect light, and an impetuous proclivity to stare absent-mindedly draw me away from the winter birds, however, as a naturalist I feel it is my responsibility to examine all objects of interest.

But it is a cold day. The old women hold bright slashes of scarves over their mouths and move with slow determination over the ice, that is really good, clear ice, and hard. A long-coated man with head thrust out, no hat, and black frayed rubbers seems to have drawn a bead on the wine cooler behind Hargreaves' window, and now goes there with the dizzy look of desire and an innate dignity about him. He's doing it with aim and intention, and so I, with the eyes of a naturalist, look up to the spires of the churches along lower Pearl, and marvel at their heavy-handed translation of man's needs. The architecture of worship has gotten so elaborate, and is so far away.

Pearl Street meets Battery with a perpendicular, and if you want to get down to the lake front without walking way out of the way, you must walk straight across, past the fountain, and down the steep hill that separates the railyards, Pessco feeds, the oil and gas tanks and various slouching warehouses, and the lake from the rest of the city. There is a strip of forest that runs all along the steep bank, giving the impression of an ecological zone of transition, or ecotone, not to be crossed by adults because of its formidable steepness, and snow caused slipperiness, but children and animals cross and recross it all the time and have created a maze of secret and summer hidden paths, one of which I choose for my passage.

Seedpods, prickly straw thin cases, with empty slots where seeds were. Carpels gone. From almond to tongue-sized hollow fruits. Thistles on stem still. I climb over the logs and follow the branch-littered path down through the catbriar no-man's-land to the railyard. Cross the tracks, a flock of pigeons settle down on a box car roof, and a car bumps out of the salvage yard's dirt drive and zooms away.

A good naturalist would be delighted with the apparent lack of living things in the vicinity of the salvage yard-waterworks-electric lights plant, because he would be able to bend down as if in prayer, closer and closer to the ground, and there would find the transfixed and petrified, as well as recently warm, signs of life. "Even here," he would exclaim with a smile, knowing all along that life slips "like a dream" into the smallest fertile crack.

But I am satisfied with the inhuman sounds of bells ringing, metal scraping metal, whirring fan, steam. I am not proud that we in our need can justify squeezing life into only the cracks, but I think it is only just that when we visit these places we experience them as they really are, and appreciate them for that. The sibilance of machines is our music of the spheres. The naturalist's findings are necessary. But those seeds, that life transfixed, are for another generation of men, not us.

Through a passage between brick walls, and finally to the shore of the lake. Ice heaved up along the metal retainer makes walking difficult, but I can see the edge of open water where the pool must be. Breaking through snow, standing on a piling, then balancing on a piece of driftwood, I can barely see over the sheet metal fence channeling water into the plant. On the other side is the outflow pool. Welling up as if from some central pipe beneath the dark pool, the water flows out towards the edges in smooth but turbulent sheets, and disappears beneath the ice. There are no ducks today.

Wilderness Experience Trips

The Wilderness Experience program, featured in last week's Cynic, is offering a variety of courses this semester. Topics of travel and navigation, mountain safety, shelter construction, and equipment use will be dealt with.

Standard courses are two day one night snowshoeing trips open to anyone regardless of experience. Scheduled dates for the standard courses are March 18-19 and April 15-16.

In addition to these, Wilderness Experience (W.E.) is offering alternative design weekends. On March 11-12 a skiing expedition will take an overnight tour, open to anyone with experience on x-country skiis (no winter camping experience necessary).

Town Meeting Weekend, March 4-6, a two night-three day intermediate level course is open to anyone with winter camping experience. Emphasis will be placed on advanced navigational skills on more difficult (and spectacular) terrain, and improvizational shelter construction.

An advanced course is offered the weekend of April 7-9 highlighted by an introduction to technical winter climbing in either the Adirondacks or the White Mountains, depending upon snow conditions.

The cost for the standard courses is $15 and $21 for the intermediate and advanced courses. A transferable non-refundable deposit of half the cost is due ten days in advance. Anyone interested in any of these courses can call Jeff Keller at W.E. in the Student Activities Office (x-2060), or stop up on any afternoon except Thursday.

Resource Deprivation

By Sue Harvey Kashanski

Read this word. CONSERVATION. Now think about it. Does your civilized, socialized mind conjure up images of frigid rooms, darkened hallways, and nights without a T.V. or stereo? If so, then you're not alone. Too many Americans continue to connect the word conservation with deprivation; they associate lower energy and resource consumption with lower standards of living. Somewhere in the history of affluent America, the main themes of U.S. development became More, Bigger, and Faster. Amidst the frenzy of the great American dream of prosperity we left behind the ideas of conservation, frugality, and long-term planning. We used and abused our resources at such an accelerated rate that the land of plenty, which should be able to support human societies for many centuries, is suddenly facing serious shortages of renewable and non-renewable resources after only two centuries of American dominion.

We are at a crucial point in American history. Our actions now will determine the fate of American civilizations to come, and all of us living in the U.S. are a critical part of the decision making process we are now facing. It is at this point that we must decide: Are we going to continue our theme of people against nature? Or can we put aside our possessive, conquering instincts and regain the healthy relationship of people with nature? Are we going to assume that technology, once again will bail us out of our energy and resource depletion dilemma? Or are we going to start conserving now while investigating long-term plans for meeting future energy and resource needs? These questions must be answered and a path must be chosen. As Harvey Cox once said, "Not to decide is to decide." Considering the options available to us, virtually that of surviving or not surviving as a culture, I think it is apparent that the themes of the present will have to change from more and faster to less and slower. Conservation will be our preservation.

People Can Make the Difference

Because an effort of the proportions needed cannot be launched without the active support of individuals, each of us can make a big difference in the pending success of the conservation ethic. But we have to act now. As we start our new semester with individual resolutions to read our Psych I every night or to study Botany on Friday nights instead of going to the Bone for chili, we also need to make a common resolution. We have to try to conserve wherever possible in our own lives. This means becoming aware of wasteful habits and correcting them. It means becoming aware of the fact that our resources are limited so we must, in turn, limit wasteful activities while expanding our lifestyles so that they include thoughts of our responsibility to the whole of society. For too many decades now, Americans have been caught up in the selfish and self-centered attitudes that our consumption patterns won't affect our neighbors. But it does. As students we can easily see the results of our energy and resource intensive habits. Food waste, high electric bills, and the high cost of providing water for this campus are all part of the escalating cost of attending UVM. But the drain of resources and the economic burdens don't stop at the edge of the campus. Burlington must also plan for campus growth and increased resource consumption. We as students and individuals are an integral part of an intricate web. It is time we assumed our share of responsibility as caretakers of our community, society and earth. Look around you. The time to act is now.

A Call for Cutbacks

President Coor's trek to Montpelier last week may well mark the beginning of a long hard road for this university and its students. A $3.8 million deficit has been predicted for fiscal 1979, and the means to alleviate it include raising both in and out-of-state tuitions, delaying faculty pay raises, deferring new equipment purchases, and requesting a larger state appropriation.

Out-of-state tuition will most certainly be hiked 7%, the rate of inflation, leaving a shortfall of $1.014 million. Here it is where the state will play its most decisive role. Last October, Coor asked Governor Snelling for an additional $1.275 million above the already approved $13,669,100 appropriation. Snelling responded by saying that the state could supply only an additional $300,000, leaving a considerable difference.

Last week, Coor addressed the House and Senate appropriations committees reiterating UVM's financial woes — while stressing that a potential in-state tuition increase would be "regrettable." He said essentially that if the state did not respond favorably, cutbacks would have to be made and pay raises would not be realized for the faculty. Coor spoke of his unwillingness to make these cutbacks, though: "I hope we don't have to lurch forward and lop off a program," while Vice-President Arns chimed in with his "grave concern" that if pay raises and salary adjustments are not made, UVM will have trouble hanging on to and recruiting new, high caliber faculty members.

The scenario they were setting for the legislators was that without more state support, one or more of the highly undesirable alternative courses of action would have to be followed. Clearly, it is essential to maintain high quality faculty members and it is equally as important to keep in-state tuition at a low level.

But the reality of the situation, without all the moans and groans, is this: Vermont is a comparatively poor state in terms of its income — the state house can't afford to dole out any more money, but neither can its residents. Moreover, legislators feel that because UVM maintains only 50% of its enrollment as in-staters, they are helping support "rich" out-of-staters each time they grant more money. Thus, Coor's Montpelier visit will not create any significant dollar increases flowing into UVM from the state for 1979.

For UVM to protect its own integrity as a competent university, it must do three things: (1) It must keep in-state tuition level so that "all qualified Vermonters" are able to attend; (2) It must grant faculty pay raises, but only where they are merited, to ensure its students they are receiving the education they are paying for; and (3) It must begin determining where cutbacks can be made — and then it must make them.

Most certainly, someone's toes would get stepped on and there would be a tremendous amount of disagreement and dissent, but to do otherwise questions the very concept this university was founded upon.

To the Editor

The Cynic Editorial Board is quite pleased with the abundance of letters we have been receiving from interested students and Burlington community residents. Because we feel that the Cynic is the only outlet through which students can air their views publicly, we fully encourage continued response from our readers. During the last two weeks we have devoted the last page of the first section, in addition to the normally alloted area on the Editorial page for letters, and will gladly continue to do so if the response remains strong.

Quite disturbing however is the fact that we have received several unsigned letters. The Board wishes to inform the readership that we will no longer publish letters devoid of full name and address, unless this information is listed in the student directory. We feel that if someone wishes to express an opinion he or she should be willing to assume credit for the statement. Unsigned letters indicate indifference and lack of credibility.

On The S. A.

Unfair Representation

To the Editor:

As a student who has been associated with the Student Association one way or another over the last three years, I would like to make a few comments regarding last week's article and editorial in the Cynic. The S.A. has always suffered from a lack of exposure and criticism about its purpose and its attempts to achieve that purpose. Hopefully, this exposure and criticism will continue and not just surface at election time, as it has in the past.

Several instances suggest that something else was intended, however, by last week's Cynic. The cover, while graphically nice, presents unfair, unsubstantiated, and in my opinion untrue representation of the present style of the S.A. The last two paragraphs of the editorial, that otherwise contains interesting comments on the state of student activism, consists of unsubstantiated generalizations ("unavailability, slowness, ineptitude, and indifference... irresponsibility... misdirected..."). My experience has been different. I hope this is not indicative of the journalistic style of the new editorial staff. To claim one person responsible may be nice when trying to place blame, but to achieve solutions we must realize that we as students and the leaders of the diversified student groups, are responsible. Perhaps the Cynic should take note of its own by-line: "There is nothing more frightening than ignorance in action."

The more legitimate criticism of the present S.A. seems directed at their apparent inability to provide effective leadership and a "purpose." The general purpose of the S.A. is to administor funds to, and provide support for, the student organizations and activities and to represent student interests in a university that too often makes decisions without regard to student educational needs.

To fulfill this purpose is not easy. The attitudes among students and within the university are not necessarily conducive to its fulfillment. Comments were made about the lack of a single purpose. Beyond the general purpose, issues become diversified and tedious. A single issue may be nice but too often it would be false. S.A. has no single direct purpose. Attempts to impose one would not face up to reality. To effect real change one has to work day to day on problems and issues that take time to resolve. It is a slow process with few dramatic achievements. Do we want leadership that tries to achiev substantial accomplishments or one that relies on public relations "issues"?

Like all of us, the present S.A. leadership could probably be doing a better job. What is needed is constructive criticism, that, I hope, the Cynic can help provide.

Injustice

To the Editor:

I feel you have done the Student Association a great injustice in your recent "examination" of their activities. It would appear that you chose quotes and examples that served your purposes in casting an unfavorable light on the Ligget and Purdy administration. To say that Geoff has a tough act to follow from the Cioffi administration is an understatement and to fail to give both Geoff and Linda credit for the enormous amounts of quality work they have done this year is an injustice.

To get back to the point of your quotes, certainly Sen. Rostad's views are worth printing, but then so are the views of the other 36 Senators. Certainly a more thorough questioning of the Senators couldn't have been made if you had to resort to quoting Sen. Rostad three times. Although you did include some favorable input, it was only token at best. Why not be professional and take a poll, not just of 6 or 7 Senators, but of the entire Senate.

If you won't give Geoff and Linda a fair shake, then don't even bother to write an article like "Going... Going... Where?! Come on Cynic, stop trying to sell newspapers; if UVM students want that kind of paper, they can read the New York Daily News or the National Inquirer!

Sincerely,
Randy Gridley

Overdue Assessment

To the Editor:

Last week's feature "The Student Association, Going... Going... Where?!" was an overdue assessment of that organization. The whole question of the capabilities of an organization have got to be evaluated if that group is going to improve. An outside, unbiased, and objective examination is necessary periodically to keep a check on any organization.

There is a fundamental problem with any organization or group, leadership. The people who end up in the leadership positions have been raised in an atmosphere which stresses respect for their elders. However, student leaders, especially at the collegiate level, have to go where their needs and interests lie, and not remain under the tutelage of the University bureaucracy. A feeling of freedom of action has got to be instilled, not stifled for fear of administrative displeasure if the group is to remain effective.

Student elections usually produce a person with some experience, dynamism, and purpose. However, when confronted with the awesome university bureaucracy with all its reverence, many leaders fade into postures which call for them to reorganize the purported structural (in-house) defects they "inherited" while they ride out their terms of office. Despite their sharp perceptions, good intuitions, and leadership capabilities, many students cannot lead effectively past certain levels of responsibility.

There are several ways for a student organization to work effectively. The most fundamental, and important of these factors is accessibility. The present motto "Stop up anytime you have a question" is, at best, artificial. There is no association member there to help you. To the contrary, there is an overworked secretary, and if you are lucky, several "important and busy" association members who are not interested in aiding anyone. A group will attain

On the Christopher Parkening Review

Parkening Persecuted

To the Editor:

I am writing with reference to a review in the Feb. 9 issue, written by Tricia John about the Christopher Parkening concert.

Miss John's article is not likely to damage Parkening's reputation very seriously, but I take exception to the tone of the review. To suggest that Parkening's success is a function of his sex appeal is more than a mistake: it reflects the musical acumen of an inner tube.

I did not attend the concert. It is possible that Parkening gave a mediocre performance; but a mediocre performance by Parkening merits a standing ovation. I venture, moreover, that Parkening's mediocrity does not irritate the nostrils as does Miss John's.

It is often amusing to read harsh reviews, but I sense that Miss John would be happier covering rock concerts or movies. Or geeks and mud wrestlers. While I am willing to read a disparaging review, to indulge a negative opinion, it seems only fair that the author have some passing acquaintance with the medium and artist.

In an attempt to conjure some kind of sympathetic understanding of Miss John's point of view, I have convinced myself that she is in fact that millionth. chimpanzee, pushing the keys in guileless tranquility, chawing sleepily at a banana, and producing, miraculously, a nearly-literate article. How the article found its way to press is something else again.

W. Daniel Tisdale

Excellence

To the Editor:

Congratulations, Tricia John. Your review of the uninspired guitarist Parkening's performance was excellent. You hit it right on the head, which is more than I can say of any of the other local reviews.

Grades And Enrollment

An Unfortunate Relationship

By Dan Adams

There is a subtle yet very real connection between the grades students can expect from a particular professor and the resultant rate of enrollment in his courses. A direct result of this connection is a way for professors to increase or maintain enrollment in their classes simply by handing out more higher grades. The indirect results are less discernable yet no doubt detrimental to UVM's academic community.

Hidden behind a shroud of educational ideals are the unpleasant realities of interdepartmental struggles for pieces of the dwindling University budget pie, and the competition among faculty members for tenure assignments. Indeed, students are sure to feed the fire. A professor's reputation as a difficult or laxed grader has come to play a critical role in course selection each semester. How critical is difficult to document, yet it is certain that programs with flexible requirements (i.e. of the Arts and Sciences College) lend themselves to this more so that those with strict requirements (i.e. Engineering).

One can hardly blame the students, especially those whose academic objectives include graduate school and who are thus at the mercy of those school's reliance upon the GPA and various achievement examinations. The connection between students supporting a faculty member's easy grading standards (by using such standards as critical criteria in course selection) and the resultant detrimental trends is not readily evident to the casual observer.

OPINION

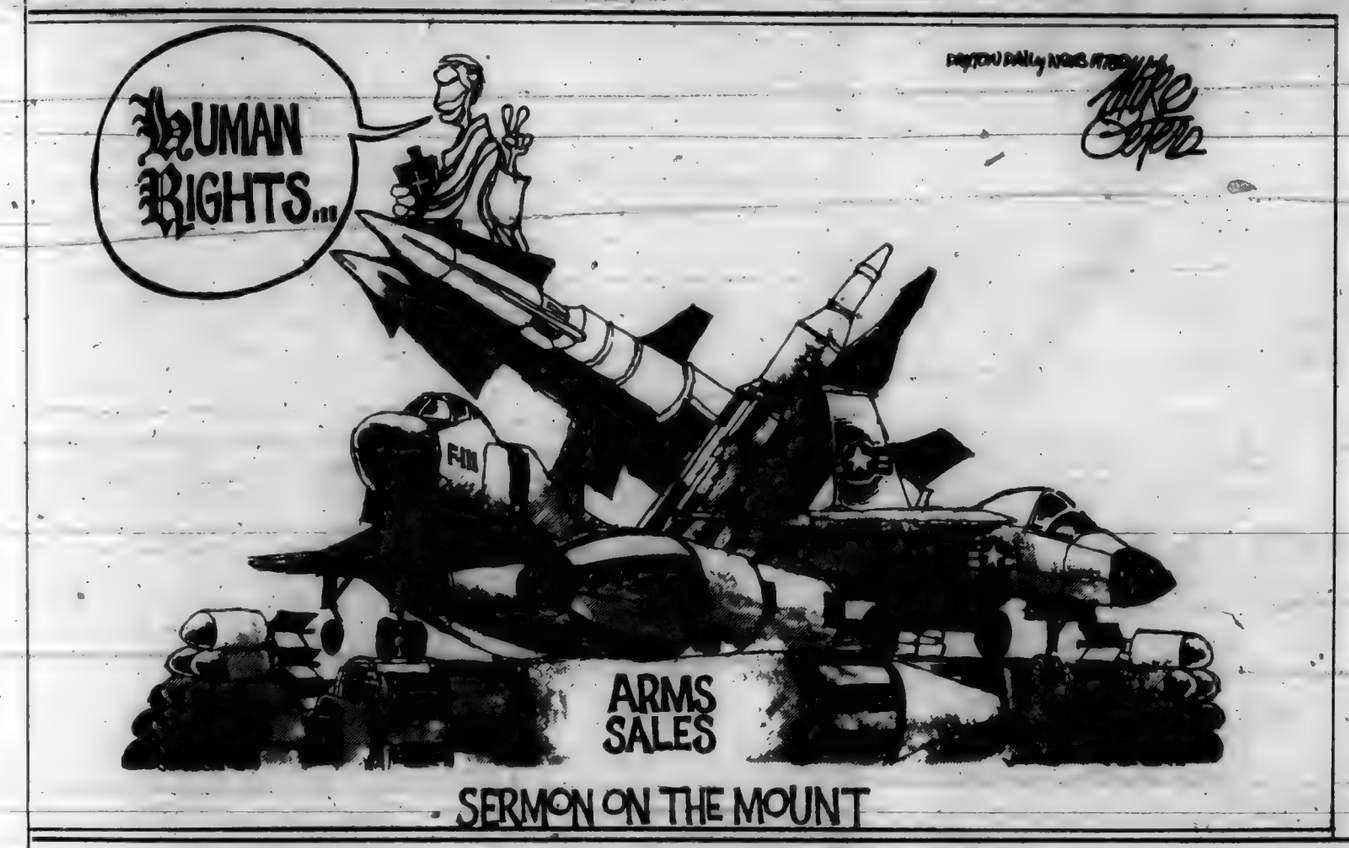
Yet the connection is very real indeed. Many faculty members are quite outspoken as to the difficult decisions all professors – and especially those who are now tenured – must make concerning his or her grading procedure. Especially in those programs with but general requirements, being stingy in serving up A's and B's can scare students away come enrollment time – the UVM student grapevine is of acknowledged efficiency. This poses problems for the professor who seeks to use grades as something more than a means of communicating with a student's potential employers or potential graduate schools – who desires that grades be used to properly motivate students or accurately evaluate their performance in terms of their own effort and growth. New professors at UVM are quick to learn that, whereas their grading procedure may be from the heart, there is little reward if it doesn't attract customers.



By doing their best to rack up a high GPA come graduation, students are unflinchingly providing any interested professor with an easy way to increase enrollment. How many professors butt into this option? Such is a difficult question. One might view the University's long term grade inflation movement away from a mode of 2.0 as partial testimony supporting this observation. The GPA for the University for the Fall '77 semester – an average that somewhere near half of all students exceeded – was a smarting 2.84.

This sad reality hurts students and the University in at least three ways. First, it gives many professors a strong incentive to put the demands of their department and the University for high or maintained enrollment above the critical practices of motivating students, and accurately evaluating their performances. Second, it undoubtedly increases grade inflation, as there is a good pay-off for the easy marker. The resultant effect is critically detrimental to students looking towards graduate school, as UVM's reputation declines in the minds of graduate school admission boards. Finally, it makes what should ideally be of minor significance in the educational experience – the grading procedure – a primary concern for students selecting courses.

The persistence of students in presurring venerable faculty members into offering an excess of high and inaccurate grades to their students is reflective – good or bad – of the interests and priorities of the majority of students across campus. That some faculty members can avoid giving in to these pressures, as well as to the demands from their department and the University, is testimony to their strong will and interest as educators. Concerning the priorities of UVM students as a whole, President Coor's Inaugural Committee on Undergraduate Education (Spring '77) summarized the views of the faculty members they interviewed with these words:

"Students are generally considered suited for college level work in terms of ability but there is some concern with respect to commitment to learning and seriousness of work habits."

Our behavior does not go unnoticed.

An African Indochina

By Eric Pollard

There exists today, in the Horn of Africa, a situation which carries all the earmarkings of a global confrontation such as the Korean Conflict and the Vietnamese incident. It pits, at least on the surface, the sovereign nations of Ethiopia and Somalia in a simple border dispute over a large chunk of Ethiopian territory known as the Ogaden, a desert area peopled by nomadic Somali tribesmen.

This in and of itself is of little or no interest to most foreigners, but an important dimension has been added which boosts the conflict of these traditional rivals to the level of international importance. The presence of Soviet advisors and Cuban advisors and troops in Ethiopia have created a great deal of concern about the Soviet Union's intentions in the area. The Soviet Union has shipped approximately one billion dollars worth of military equipment to the Ethiopian government and has something on the order of 1,500 military personnel involved in the training of the their army in the use of the most modern conventional equipment available, including missiles and MiG-23 fighters. Cuba has 4,000 military personnel stationed in Ethiopia, doing everything from protecting Ethiopian strongman Mengistu Haile Mariam to flying the Soviet MiG-23's.

The role the United States is to play in this drama is not easily discernable. The natural reaction would be to support the Somalis in their effort to combat the Soviet-supplied Ethiopians (et al). This option is not viable at the present time because it was Somalia and not Ethiopia that first instigated combat, and it is Somalia that is invading the sovereign territory of its neighbor. Furthermore, Ethiopia had been, until the ascent to power of Mengistu in 1975, the client of the United States and, as such, received huge amounts of American military and economic aid. The Somali's, on the other hand, have been under the control of a Marxist government led by Siad Barre and have been, until last fall, the recipients of Soviet aid, including two modern air and naval facilities. The result is a confusing combination of former clients fighting one another with equipment that their contemporary sources cannot repair, but which must be replaced either with new weaponry or with weapons captured from the other side. The question the United States must answer is can the American government justify the support of a Marxist regime which is the obvious aggressor in a struggle against a former client who is seen as betraying the "cause" and going over to the other side.

INSIGHT

To date, the government's answer to this question has, in fact, been no answer at all. While this may seem sufficient in the short run, the long range effect of this policy may place the United States in a position from which movement will be impossible when such movement is necessary. It is certainly a peculiar situation; the traditional bad guys coming to the rescue of the beleaguered folk, while the traditional good guys are looking for some way in which to input their money's worth where all the white-hat roles have been taken. Barre is pleading that the United States act to protect its national interest and, in light of the American commitment to doing what is perceived to be right, there is nothing the government can do but wait and hope that enough aid comes to the Somalis from other sources to at least tie the Soviets into a prolonged war of attrition. The United States cannot act and the Soviets are aware of this fact. Their goal is to push against the soft tissue of American foreign policy and expand their influence until they hit the hard skeleton of American determination. Because of the reputation the American government has achieved in its recent efforts to deal with the growth of "communism," that of being a bungling, interfering bully, the Soviets can move with impunity. They do not have a Vietnam to contend with.

The fundamental question that faces the United States in relation to the situation in the Horn, as well as the rest of the African continent, is what is the opponent, communism or the Soviet Union? This question can only be answered in terms of perceived threat and at present, it is the Soviet Union and not the spectre of world communism that sets itself in opposition to the United States. Eventually, American aid will begin to flow to the Somalis, who at present have their act far more on the ball than do the Ethiopians. Siad Barre is the Ho Chi Minh of the Later Age and will prove the most formidable foe against whom the Soviets have committed their resources. By utilizing discreet connections in Saudi Arabia and Egypt, the United States will supply the Somalis with the materials necessary to continue the struggle for "the liberation of the Ogaden" in return for guarantees of the territorial integrity of Kenya, a long-time American ally in the area. The conflict in Africa provides an opportunity for the United States to develop new links with the so-called Third World based on real politic rather than the nebulous western ideal that has been waved by successive generations of Americans, links that will stand the test of Soviet aid and hegemony.

Nocera's Fast Break

To the Editor:

Your Sports Profile on Jim Nocera was excellent. I'm happy to see homage paid to this young man who has been one of the few bright spots of this season. It's too bad that such an exciting player has to play in a set-it-up and shoot system. In my opinion, if Vermont wants to put itself on the basketball map, it will have to start playing fast break ball. To do this successfully, we must attract kids from Boston and New York and their suburbs. Maybe Patrick Gym wouldn't seem like a morgue if we cut this rural basketball and came up with a lineup that didn't look like the Russian Olympic team. With players like Mr. Nocera who bend their knees and have vertical jumps high enough to qualify as "skyers," perhaps someday Vermont basketball will arrive.

Sincerely,
Brian McCracken

Rough Roads

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to an article in the February 2nd issue entitled "A Rougher Road" by Henry Chamberlain. The conditions described in the article that were an impediment to Tim, i.e. extremely snowy places and slippery parts outraged me. Those conditions are bad even for the non-handicapped. Tim said that on certain days he had to miss school because he couldn't get to class. He was seriously thinking of moving South and even said that all his physically handicapped friends around his home in Vermont went to institutions further South because of the accessibility problems caused by climate. The author wrote too that severe weather conditions in the North dictate that many of its physically handicapped residents will seek their education in the South. Not true! Sidewalks can be cleared; UVM maintainance has several snow shovels. The city of Burlington has responsibility for some of the sidewalks that students use to get to classes. I am disgusted that neither the university nor the city of Burlington is fulfilling their responsibilities. And to the degree that accessibility problems caused by climate discourage the physically handicapped from coming here, UVM is discriminating against people on the basis of physical characteristics alone.

Sincerely,
Jane Hendley

Labor Logic

To the Editor:

I would like to bring the reader's attention to an inconsistency in labor leaders' logic by examining the historical picture.

When the labor movement was in its fledgling years, joining a union was grounds for immediate dismissal. "Yellow Dog" contracts, then very popular, gave employers the right to fire a worker if they joined a union. Strikes were illegal and broken up by police.

Eventually this unfair situation was corrected — "Yellow Dog" contracts were outlawed. Everyone was allowed to choose whether or not to belong to a union.

But as the unions gained power, they instituted Yellow Dog contracts of their own that reversed the tables – union shop contracts. Now, REFUSING to join a union is grounds for dismissal.

If it was wrong to be forced to stay out of the union before, then isn't it an equal injustice to be forced to belong to a union now?

Albeit unions have helped the working man's situation. Nevertheless, doesn't that person have the right to work regardless of whether he or she supports a union?

I hope the state legislators will realize that S214, the Right to Work bill, is only correcting an abuse that 20 other states have already corrected — the abuse of compulsory unionism.

Sincerely,
E. H. Kuehn

Student Association

acceptability only if students see it as representative of them and not by a clique of junior politicians.

If an air of legitimacy can be created along with the elimination of inherent association intimidation, many more students will feel comfortable at participating in projects. With a broader base of support and interest, the organization thrives, becomes more powerful with regards to the bureaucracy. For, with a unified student voice, the administration cannot ignore you – it must listen.

Next, the attitude that I (leader) will deal with a problem because you (group member) do not have an adequate grasp of the situation is a misconception. All students at a university have the capabilities, once informed, to aid in the rendition of results. Unless the whole group is included, individual members gradually become alienated and withdraw.

Finally, some leaders feel that students do not need a definite purpose for the group to function because of time limitations. If a purpose was evident, chairmen would be amazed at how much faster objectives were reached. When associations know what they are trying to do, who is involved, and what areas need to be dealt with, then, and only then, can that association be effective.

In conclusion, there are four basic areas which must be realized and resolved before an organization can function at a level comparable to its potential. The leader must (1) assume an independent posture from the university bureaucracy, (2) make the organization really accessible to students, (3) instill group coordination, and (4) create a purpose for his administration. These are things the leader is clearly responsible for. The time has come for our Student Association to resolve its situation.

Sincerely,
Henry Chambelain

UVM Skiers Capture Dartmouth Carnival

Jerry McNealus races to beat the clock Photo by Fritz Wehl

By Rich Chalmers

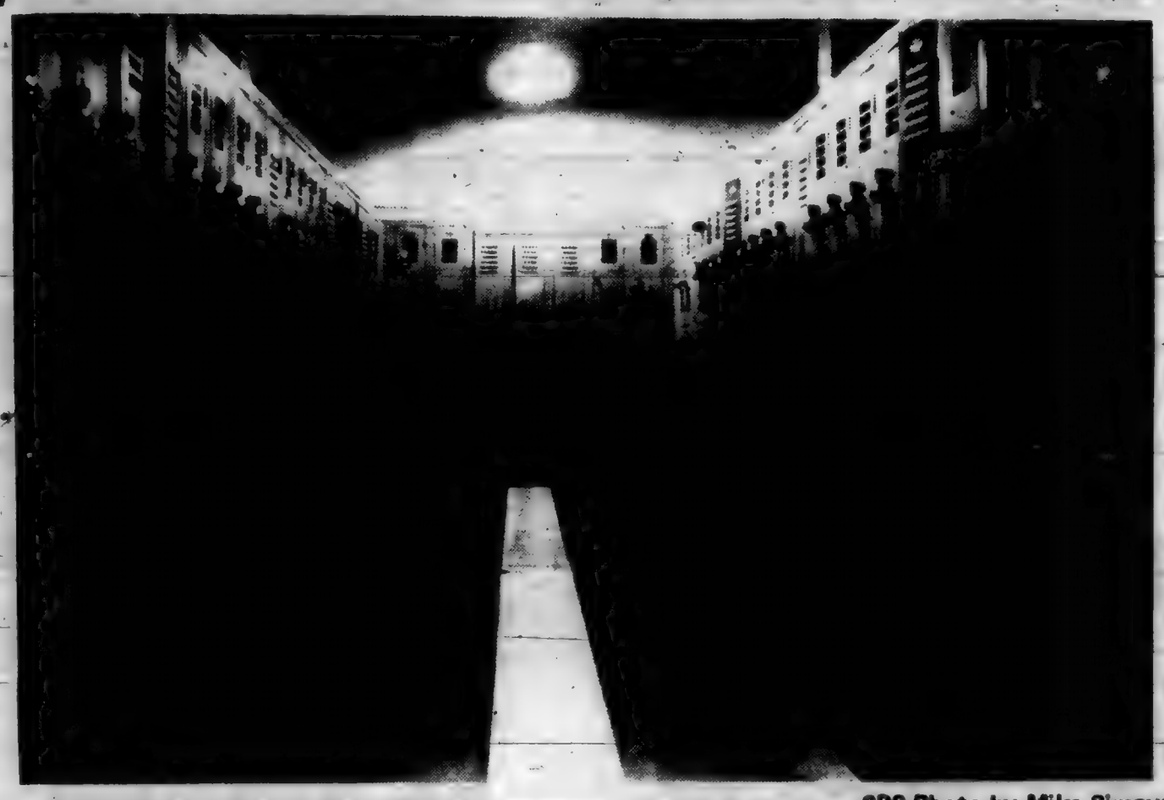
The University of Vermont's Men's Ski Team lengthened its winning streak to fourteen with a 318.5 -- 296 victory over Dartmouth in the Dartmouth Ski Carnival held last weekend. Middlebury finished third with 218.5 followed by New Hampshire with 196.

The key to the victory lay in the Giant Slalom, in which Vermont took the first three places to put the carnival out of reach. Jerry McNealus led the Cats; followed by Doug Bruce and Scott Light. John Macomber placed fourth for the Big Green backed by Dartmouth skiers in the eighth, ninth and tenth positions. Middlebury's Mark Carter and Rich Ross finished sixth and seventh respectively.

The Cats also took first place in the jumping event in which Roger Holden led the pack in fourth place. Kare Herje and Dave Larson finished sixth and seventh respectively, backed by Denis Lambert in tenth. Dartmouth ended strongly, with seventy-three points, seizing first and second while Middlebury took third and ninth in the competition to tally sixty-seven points.

Mark Wagner continued his winning streak by finishing first in the cross-country event, but Dartmouth ripped the Cats 80-75. Whit Johnson of Dartmouth placed second, fourteen seconds behind Wagner. Three Big Green runners crossed the finish line in fourth, sixth and tenth. Karsten Midtvedt finished fifth for the Cats.

Ross boosted Middlebury to an 81-80 edge over Vermont in the slalom event as he won it for the Panthers with a time of 100.11. UVM finished strongly as Light placed second with a time of 100.14. Jeff Darrow came in fourth and Kent Belden finished seventh. The Cats showed depth with McNealus and Bruce at ninth and tenth respectively. Middlebury's Peter Kenny and John Jacobs placed fifth and sixth.



Coach Chip Lacasse commented, "We swept the Giant Slalom," something no team has done for over a year. Before the season, the slalom was expected to be our weakest area, but Doug Bruce's recovery has made a crucial difference in our strength."

When asked if last week's controversial UVM Carnival had any effect in Hanover, Lacasse answered, "Yes, without a doubt. Dartmouth was fired up to beat us. You could feel it in the air."

"Mark Wagner is probably the toughest runner in the college circuit," Lacasse added concerning his cross-country squad. "And Mark Quinlan will be returning to action against Williams, so we should be in excellent shape for next weekend's Carnival in Williamstown."

UVM Athletic Facilities

The "Patrick Gym Squeeze" Could Become A Crush

By Robert McGee

Athletics are a necessary and integral part of the process of higher education at any university. Yet too often students are deprived of the opportunity for personal growth through athletics because administrators either do not realize its potential or fail to fund these programs adequately. Unfortunately, the University of Vermont is one of those institutions that has been forced to demote athletics to secondary status because of financial limitations imposed by school administrators and the state legislature.

When the Patrick-Forbush-Gutterson athletic complex was first built in 1962, it was hailed as one of the finest facilities of its kind in New England; and it adequately met the needs of the 4400 enrolled students at that time. It should be noted, however, that the complex was designed primarily as a men's physical education facility. The women decided not to get involved with the planning of the complex since they had the use of Southwick Gym to themselves. It was anticipated that the women would use the new complex only for swimming and skating, and thus only limited locker facilities were provided for them.

If UVM's request for funds is denied by the Legislature the present lockerroom might be divided in half by a brick wall

Yet over the years there has been a growing popularity in athletics at all levels, including physical education, and intramural and varsity competition. This, in combination with the fact that the student enrollment has almost doubled since the construction of the university's athletic facilities, makes it obvious that this once sufficient complex is now badly overtaxed.

To further complicate matters, the women have lost most of Southwick to the music department, and consequently have been forced to rely more heavily on the existing athletic complex for classes and offices. This presents a problem because of recent Title IX legislation which requires schools to provide "equal opportunity" for women. The existing complex is obviously inadequate for them in terms of locker space and facilities. Thus the university will be required by law to expand the complex in the near future.

The University of Vermont is cognizant of the need to expand its athletic facilities, but because of financial limitations, it has been unable to provide the necessary funding itself. In 1976 the school developed a comprehensive six million dollar facility expansion proposal which included a fifty-meter swimming pool; tennis, squash, and racketball courts; locker facilities; gymnastic and wrestling rooms; office space, and a multi-purpose building which could be used for a number of different sports depending on the needs and wishes of the students.

Later that year UVM unsuccessfully appealed to the state legislature for partial funding of their proposal. At the time of the request the legislature felt they had to be conservative with their appropriations. There was no indication that there would be the twenty million dollar surplus that now exists. Thus, the school's proposal had to be weighed equally with all other requests. Since the state legislature had already approved appropriations for the library, the facilities request was denied. Sadly, an underlying factor in the overall decision was the ungrounded fear that UVM would turn into a playground for the rich if they passed the comprehensive facilities request. For these two reasons, the representatives were able to justify delaying facilities expansion.

This rejection has put the University of Vermont in a precarious position. In order to meet Title IX regulations, the school must receive the necessary funding by July and should be ready to start construction shortly thereafter. Accordingly, the school has presented yet another proposal to the state legislature, this time asking only for internal renovations within the existing structure, including a new women's locker room, team and training rooms, as well as classroom and office space.

Despite the urgency behind the school's 1978 proposal, the University of Vermont might once again have failed in its quest for financial assistance. Timothy O'Conner, the Speaker of the House, has indicated that under house rules, a proposal cannot be voted on twice during the same legislature session, and the legislature has not convened since UVM put forth its last facilities request. Thus, it is conceivable that the university's new proposal might not even reach the floor for a vote.

If this happens, the school's only solution may be to restructure the already over-taxed locker room facilities. One proposal put forth is to section off part of the men's locker room to increase the women's locker facilities. This measure is financially feasible and would allow the school to comply with Title IX, but it is by no means a solution to the problem. However, a poor situation will only be changed into an intolerable one.

It is ironic that Vermont, a state well known for its beauty and recreational opportunities, should have a university with so little to offer in terms of athletic facilities. Sadly, the student population thus far has not felt the need to speak out on the subject. For two years now the students have silently watched the state legislature flatly turn away the school's proposals for expansion, giving fiscal conservatism as the sole reason for the action. It sometimes makes one wonder what the purpose of education is. Must the cost of a program always be the sole determinant of its educational value?

As students, we are all aware of the need for facility expansion, and the educational value of athletics. If the situation here at the university is to be changed, the impetus must come from the student body. As was shown through the Student Trustees bill, the state legislature is willing to listen to the student body; all it takes is a politically active student association that is willing to take the time to fight for what they believe in.

I only hope it doesn't take a brick wall down the middle of the men's locker room to make us realize something has to be done.

Basketball Report

UNH Snips UVM Hoopsters

By Randy Briggs

Led by the clutch direction of guard Ron Layne, the University of New Hampshire men's basketball team edged the University of Vermont 57-54 last week at the Patrick Gymnasium. Despite Layne's meager five point contribution, it was his ability to penetrate the Vermont defense that led to the Wildcat victory.

From the start, New Hampshire found UVM's 1-3-1 defense quite easy to penetrate and took full advantage of every opening as the Wildcats jumped to a 14-8 lead. UNH shot 57% in the first half with most of the baskets coming on easy layups.

The Cats battled back to trail by only two points as Freshman Jim Nocera's twelve points in the first half paced the Cats to a 30-32 half-time score. New Hampshire's ability to control the tempo of the contest was a constant thorn in the Cats' sides. The Wildcats refused to be drawn into a racehorse game with Vermont and their offensive patience was rewarded with a number of easy inside shots against the porous Cat defense.

The second half began shakily for Vermont. Led by lightening-quick guard Keith Dickson, the Wildcats quickly bolted to a 44-34 lead with 15:41 left in the game. After a time-out to regroup, Nocera led the Cats back to the attack with three quick baskets. A short jumper, a layup off a steal, and a basket off a rebound tied the contest at 46 apiece with nine minutes to play.

Vermont then took a brief 50-48 lead on a Corey Wielgus jumper, and it appeared as if the Cats might pull away. By this time, Vermont had switched to a full-court man-to-man defense, but it was to no avail as Layne and Dickson continued to direct the UNH offense smoothly despite the pressure.

The Cats continued to claw, and re-tied the contest at 54 apiece on a hoop by Nocera. With almost two minutes to go, the Wildcats decided to go for the last shot. Vermont's Dave Carrell fouled Layne with twenty-six seconds left and Layne calmly sank both foul shots. UNH led 56-54.

The Cats brought the ball back up court, but turned it over, only to have the favor returned. With less than eight seconds left, Nocera drove for the lane but was called for offensive charging. Dickson then iced over the contest with a free throw to end it 57-54.

Coach Salzberg commented, "We did a poor job defensively on their guards. We just didn't use enough pressure. We played good defense at times but it wasn't consistent enough."

The key to the contest was Vermont's inability to stop Leskaris and Van Deventer from getting easy hoops from underneath. They combined for 34 points.

After commenting that the refereeing left a lot to be desired, UNH Coach Gerry Friel added, "We have lost so many close games this year, it feels good to come out a winner for a change. Brendan VanDeventer had an excellent game. He is an unpredictable type of player. He's either really good or really flat. Ron Layne was crucial for us. He ran the show from the start out there."

In the final analysis it was UNH's use of their game plan to the utmost that overcame the Cats. Vermont showed a lack of consistency in that they played well at times but fell prey to mysterious lags in momentum. The Cats were led by Nocera's twenty points and Mike Kern's twelve.

Cat Rally Drops Colgate Cagers

By Steve Larose

A new act was added to the University of Vermont Men's Basketball team's roadshow, as the Cats rallied back from a halftime deficit to defeat Colgate, 58-55 Saturday night in Hamilton, New York.

Until Saturday's contest, Vermont had fallen into the pattern of losing if they were behind at intermission, and winning if they were ahead at the break.

Vermont trailed 26-22 at halftime Saturday, then went ahead briefly, only to be pinned under a 12-0 Colgate streak.

The outlook was bleak as the Cats trailed by eleven with fifteen minutes left. The Catamounts used Mike Kern, Jim Nocera and Kevin Kelly to pop in twelve points and cut Colgate's lead to 44-41 with nine minutes left. Vermont then moved the ball inside and knotted the contest at 50-50 with five minutes to play.

Jim Nocera put Vermont out front when he connected an outside shot and added two free throws to send the Cats ahead. Mark Sobolewski then added two more to make the score 56-53 with 2:30 left in the game.

Vermont went into a four corner stall using all but thirty-four seconds. But Dane Correll lost the ball and Colgate went in for the final shot. The jump shot from the left corner missed and Tom Perrier grabbed the rebound, being fouled on the play. Perrin calmly sank the two shots for the come-from-behind victory.

"I don't care what the percentages say, I thought we played with a lot of heart tonight," exclaimed Vermont Coach Peter Salzberg.

Kern had sixteen points for Vermont, while Nocera notched fifteen markers. Vermont is now 9-12 on the season and will face Connecticut away on Saturday.

Hockey Cats Raid Colgate

By Rich Chalmers

The University of Vermont kept its playoff hopes flickering Saturday as it defeated Colgate 5-3 in a must-win situation.

The Cats began the contest strongly, seizing a 3-1 lead, but faltered during the second period as Colgate tied up the score 3-3 in the final stanza. Randy Koch and Dave Otness pulled through for the Cats, turning the momentum around, with a goal apiece to put the game out of reach.

The first period of play was heavily dominated by the Green and Gold as the Cats jumped to a 2-0 lead after twelve minutes of scoreless hockey. Craig Homola and Bill Reber set up Dave Otness who opened the scoring for Vermont with a slapshot from the right side.

Ben Lord scored the second goal for the Cats at 10:39 in a one man down situation as UVM's Chris Zimmerman had been sent to the penalty box for roughing. Louis Cote assisted on the play.

The Red Raiders scored only a minute later as the puck bounced out of control in front of the Cats' net after hitting a crack in the boards. Colgate's Mike Rowley slipped the puck past UVM goalie Sylvain Turcotte to slice the lead down to 2-1.

The combination of Gordie MacFarlane, Koch and Greg Wilkie combined to recapture Vermont's two-point lead as Wilkie fired the puck past the Colgate Goalie at the 18:25 mark in the first period.

The Cats sagged in the second stanza as Colgate began to slow up UVM's momentum with choppy play. Before the Cats could recover, the lead had diminished to 3-2 on a slapshot goal by Colgate's Ken Decock at the 18:41 mark.

Colgate came on stronger, as they evened up the game just thirty-three seconds into the third period. Gary Trahan recorded the goal for the Red Raiders.

Koch scored the winning goal for the Cats as he slipped a low shot into the Colgate net with seventeen minutes left in the game. The Raiders came back to put heavy pressure on Turcotte but Vermont held Colgate scoreless. The victory was then completed at 16:57 as Otness recorded his second goal of the night on assists from Reber and Homola.

The win placed Vermont at 13-12 overall and 7-10 in Division I. Turcotte recorded thirty-four saves for the evening.

Middlebury Tops Women Skiers

By Rich Chalmers

The Middlebury Women's Ski team captured first place over Dartmouth and the University of Vermont at the Dartmouth Ski Carnival held last Saturday. The sagging Middlebury squad was just able to fend off a last minute attack by Dartmouth to secure a tight victory of 241-235. Vermont placed third with 170 points.

Debbie Tarinelli won the slalom event for the second week in a row for Dartmouth backed by teammates Cathy Lewis in third and Sara Pendleton in fourth. Gail Labaron finished fifth for UVM, leading the Cat attack. Sara McNealus landed second for Middlebury followed by Robin Putnam and Ellen Hall in ninth and tenth for the Panthers.

Tarinelli won the Giant Slalom for Dartmouth with a time of 67.34 but Middlebury took the event 82-79 over the Big Green. UVM placed fourth with fifty-two, under Maine. The Panthers showed their strength as they captured second, fourth, fifth and ninth. Gail Labaron once again represented the Green and Gold, finishing tenth.

Liz Carey led the Panthers on a romp through the women's cross-country event and an 87-71 victory over Dartmouth as Middlebury seized first, second, third, fifth and eighth place. Dartmouth's Harriott Meyer and Carolin Cogeshall finished sixth and seventh respectively. Vermont's Janet Reynolds placed tenth as UVM compiled sixty-six points.

Coach Perry Bland commented, "Dartmouth had a strong advantage competing on their own ground and Middlebury was as strong as usual. We're in the top four or five teams and we're definitely in contention for the nationals."

When asked about his teammembers, Coach Bland responded, "Gail Labaron has been a consistent performer for UVM. She's our strongest Alpine skier and she's done an excellent job this season. She's consistently a good finisher."

Wildcats Slash Women Icers

By Melissa Brown

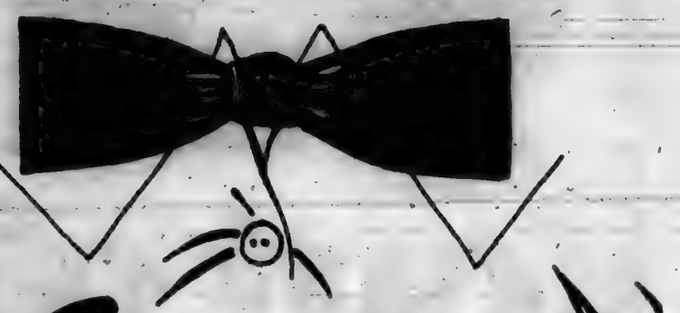
The University of New Hampshire women's ice hockey team skated to a 6-2 win over the University of Vermont last Saturday in a game which was closer than the score indicates.

With the exception of a lapse in the second period, the Catamounts played an even game of hockey against the physically strong and talented Wildcats.

In the first stanza, New Hampshire's left wing Melissa White scored on a pass from in close to put the Wildcats out front 1-0. Center Gail Griffith scored several minutes later for New Hampshire on a play virtually identical to the one preceding it. UVM retaliated with a fine goal by Sara Dougherty however, as she tipped in a centering pass from right wing Wendy Pirtle.

Early into the second period, New Hampshire enjoyed a four goal scoring rampage in less than three minutes to put them decisively ahead 6-1. For the remaining ten minutes of the period, UVM's defensive momentum picked up and held the Wildcats scoreless.

UVM's best efforts were exhibited during the third period as the Catamounts outscored New Hampshire 1-0. Less than one minute into the final period, Cathy Sagaser and Doris Bonner set up center Paula Priestley for her fifth goal of the season. New Hampshire outshot UVM in the period by the narrow margin of 9-8 as UVM goalie Ann Bartlett finished the game with thirty-three saves.



Catamount coaches Greg Marston, John MacDonald and Roger Weig commented that each of UVM's three lines played a very respectable fine game. The defensive effort led by Amy Tutwiler and Pamela Cheeseman was equally noteworthy. The New Hampshire coach commented that the UVM team was the most formidable challenge they'd had to face all year.

The loss dropped UVM to 4-6-1 for the season. On Saturday, the Catamounts will take on John Abbott Junior College at 5:15 at Gutterson.

Years Of Training Pay Off In The Big Race

By Kimberly Honza

Often the well-seasoned athlete reaches a point in his/her career when it is impossible to improve upon perfection. What then?

The shot from the starter's pistol had long since reverberated against the walls of the gallery, and I had exploded off the block before the sound of the gun had reached the ears of the spectators.

"Good starts and good turns are what win races. Work on them," had been drilled into my brain. So I worked on them. Day in and day out, I devoted an hour a day to my starts and turns. How many hours total was it?...

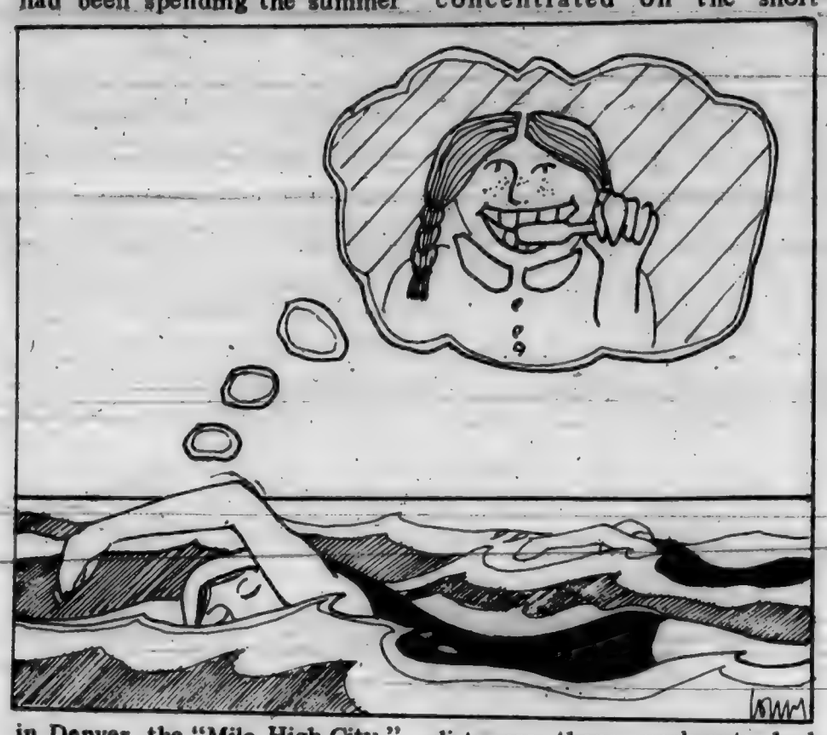
...Enough, I decided after coming out of my turn. It was perfection. "Follow your stroke to your toes." No sudden movements, just smooth and simple. Only 29 more turns to go. I loved turns, and wished for a 25 meter pool; but this was big league, so we used bigger pools.

Another turn. I was amazed at how automatic and precise it was. An "X" marked the ideal spot to "hit" the turn. I was dead center.

Everything was automatic. I automatically awakened at 5 a.m. every morning to practice for two hours. Seven days a week from 5:30 to 7:30 a.m., I always swam distance in the morning. It was always the same scenery – one black line down the center of the lane.

My strokes lengthened and deepened. I felt good. I never thought about it, but I knew I was taking five strokes, a breath to the right, five more strokes, and a breath to the left. Alternate side breathing they called it. I would take nine breaths a lap for the first 1300 meters, then seven breaths during the last 200 meters as I picked up the pace.

Today was the "big race. Fifteen months ago, when I began to train for distance swimming, this had been my ultimate goal. It was the sole driving force propelling me through the water. Not the kick, not the arm pull, not the perfection of my starts and turns, but this race. The others were mere by-products of attaining my goal.



I would win today, and I would set a record doing it. It might only be a pool record, but I had the potential of setting a national or world record.

The spectators would be filing out now. This was a boring race to watch until the final 200 meters. The competitors were littered across the lanes. I had lapped the girl in lane 8 long ago. Her day would come. Today was mine.

The pace clock put me well in contention for a record. Halfway there, thirteen laps and 750 meters gone after another perfect turn, I was five seconds ahead of my best time. And predictably, my second half was five seconds faster than the first. I had gained ten seconds.

It was total sensory deprivation. I thought of things of minor importance, like brushing my teeth after every meal. The race was automatic, everything was. I was actually relieved that this was the end of the road.

Everything had gone into training for this race. The last leg had been spending the summer in Denver, the "Mile High City." While all my high school chums had gone to Europe for their graduation presents, I headed for the high altitudes, to build up my wind. Swimming in that atmosphere automatically forced greater lung capacity. It had worked. It forced my time down by four seconds. A monumental improvement.

My mind was suddenly flooded with memories. My first race, and the buck-toothed, bow-legged little girl clutching her first ribbon; it had been a third place. That was ten years ago, I had only been eight, but the seed of desire to win had been planted. I wanted more. I concentrated on the short distances then; work-outs had been short and hard. Many times the water surrounding me had turned pink, then blood-red from over-exertion. But I never passed out – that would mean defeat, I worked harder.

The switch to the longer distances had come at the end of a long road of sprinting. Races became a matter of luck, not skill. I needed an outlet. And today, I had no more outlets. I could not improve any more over today's effort. There was no place to go.

I turned into the last 200 meters. I disregarded the breath after the turn without a second thought. Only seven breaths this last leg. I checked the pace clock and did some quick mental calculations. I was still ahead. A breath to the right – no competition in sight, the same on the left.

The time clock clicked off as I touched the wall. I had no desire to check the time or my competition. I already knew the outcome. It was a different world. The arms and legs that pulled me out of the water were my own. Coaches and teammates crowded around to offer their congratulations.

I collected my medal and shook hands with the other place finishers. I felt old. Their thirteen years seemed incredibly young to my eighteen. They had many roads to conquer, the pair would both break my record within two years time. They too would swim in their big race. There was nothing I could say to them, no words of advice.

In the locker room, I packed away my gear and thought about what lay ahead. In some respects that road was more difficult than the one I had just left. I had been a master of my trade, now I had no trade to follow. I had to develop new roads.

I felt better, younger than a few minutes earlier. As I left the locker room, I didn't look back.

Ice Fishing: Fun For All On Lake Champlain

By Lesley Wassmuth

Once a thick layer of ice covers Lake Champlain, ice fishermen begin setting up their shanties and baiting their hooks. A number of fishermen at lakeside last week were eager to share their feelings on the sport.

Luke Jakes, a congenial man from Barre, has been ice fishing for approximately ten years. He considers Lake Champlain to be one of the best areas in Vermont. When asked if he thought ice fishing was becoming popular, he responded, "Yes, but not at all like cross-country skiing."

The fish most commonly caught on the lake is smelt, a silvery fish averaging five to six inches in length. At first glance they don't appear to be very appetizing, but every fisherman interviewed considered these small fish to be gems. They are sweet-tasting and require little cleaning because of their size. Even their bones can be digested. Smelt seem to be the most favored fish, and perch are second.

Ice fishing is probably one of the few outdoor activities which has avoided becoming uncontrollably commercial. When asked if they thought commerciality was a threat to ice fishing, the fishermen said no – unless large companies come in with nets and clear out the whole area. It was also agreed that the shanty population had not increased overwhelmingly within the last few years.

"See I got bad fingers now". But Tom replied "That don't ail him, he can still catch 'em."

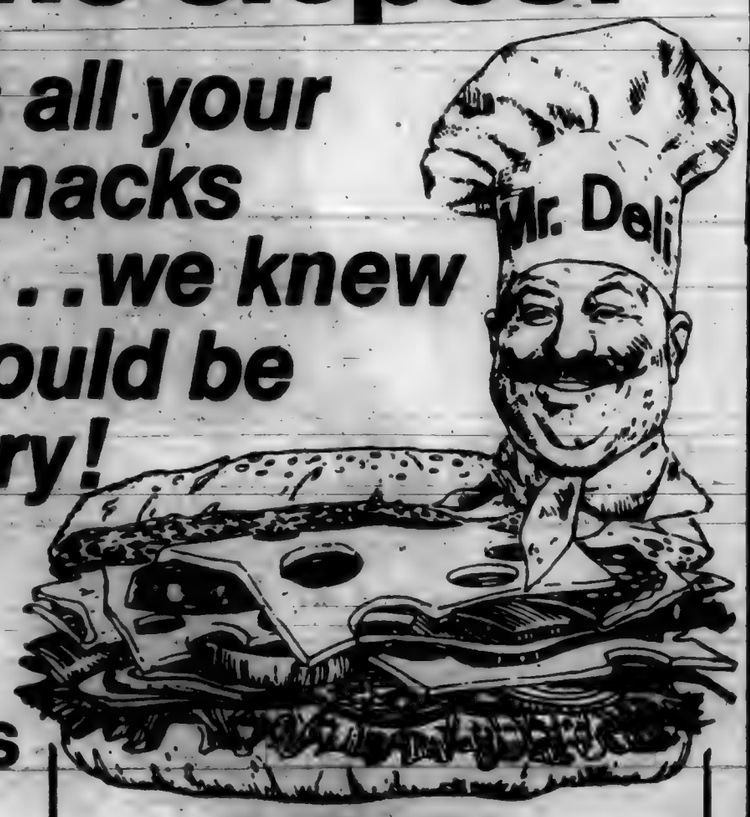
Ice fishing can be as cheap or expensive as the individual makes it. A person can go from a chiseled hole in the ice beside his parked car to a good-sized shanty with a tiny kerosene or propane stove. Tom Michaud, a beeming young man who operates a grocery store in Burlington, owns one such shanty. Beside him was his grandfather, Bill Brown, who proudly confessed to be eighty-four years old. Bill was the epitome of a story-telling, native Vermonter. His round, wrinkled face sported a permanent smile, which was framed by specks of gray whiskers.

Both grandfather and son spoke of ice fishing with unquestionable knowledge and experience. They agreed they mainly fished for the sport, although the advantage of fishing in the winter was the smelt. Tom was enthusiastic as he spoke of the smelt, saying they are difficult to catch in hot weather. They like cold water, staying deep in the summer and near the surface in the winter. The men went on to talk of other fish common to Lake Champlain such as Black Bass and Walleyed Pike, both most accessible in the summer.

Tom and Bill spoke of the Fish and Game Department in Montpelier favorably, commenting that the department did a good job while getting little state and no federal aid. For example, the department stocked Lake Champlain with Michigan Steel Head trout near the East Kingdom around Willoughby and Crystal Lake.

As the men fished, they explained they hoped a school of fish would swim by to increase the odds of catching several at a time. The shanty in which they kept warm was just tall enough for an adult to stand in, and just as wide. There were four holes cut in the floor board which had been covered with linoleum. The tiny kerosene stove threw off enough heat to make the interior at least thirty degrees warmer. Because of the lack of glare, it was possible to see any fish just below the ice, an important advantage. With such a comfortable abode, the prospect of ice fishing seemed quite conceivable.



A good day's catch would average ten to fifteen pounds of smelt, enough to fill a regular size pail halfway.

At one point, Bill explained why he was having trouble with the fish line. "See, I got bad fingers now, that's what ails me." To this, Tom immediately replied, "That don't ail him, he can still catch 'em." At that point, Bill felt a tug on his line and pulled up two fish on one hook.

Aquacats Dunked

The University of Massachusetts' Swimming Team narrowly defeated the UVM Aquacats, 61-52, in a Yankee Conference swim meet held Saturday at the Forbush Natatorium. The win was the Minutemen's first victory over UVM in 15 years of dual meet competition.

The Minutemen were led by senior Captain Russ Yarworth. Yarworth recorded a time of 2:01.6 in the 200 yard Individual Medley, and a time of 2:03.4 in the 200 yard Butterfly. Both times set new UVM pool records.

The Aquacats, however, garnished their share of victory laurels. Junior Mark Kinne, UVM's talented freestyler — Butterflyer, stroked his way to wins in the 1000 and 500 yard freestyles, with times of 10:36.6 and 5:08.9, respectively. In addition, Kinne, in finishing second to UMass's Yarworth in the 200 Butterfly, broke his school record of 2:06.5 set in Tuesday's win over St. Mike's, with a time of 2:06.2. Senior Captain Peter Gelhaar was a triple winner, as he powered his way to victories in the 50 and 100 yard freestyles. His time of 22.6 in the 50 was his best time ever. Gelhaar also swam a leg on the winning 400 yard Freestyle Relay. Sophomore Steven Levy finished second to Yarworth in the 200 Individual Medley but in doing so, clocked a time of 2:04.3 to break the school record of 2:05.5 set by him last year in the win over URI. Levy also won the 200 yard Backstroke in 2:05.2 to break the UVM standard of 2:07.3 set back in 1973.

The Aquacats, now 2-4, face an improved University of Rhode Island team, Saturday, February 18 at the Forbush Natatorium. Last year, UVM won the meet in the final event. The final dual meet of the year is Tuesday, February 21 versus Dartmouth. The Cats will culminate their season March 2, 3, 4 when they participate in the New England Championships to be held at Springfield College.

Women Gymnasts Fall

The University of Vermont's Women Gymnastics team defeated Keene State but was overtaken by Southern Connecticut in competition held Saturday. Southern Connecticut tallied 123 points to win the meet, followed by UVM at 117 and Keene with 110.

Lisa Duff captured first place on the balance beam with a score of 7.95 followed by Kris Costello in the third place position. Janet Lynch of UVM and Chysteri Burke of Southern Connecticut tied for first in the floor exercises with a score of 8.55. Costello and Anne Berry finished second and third in the all-around competition with scores of 30.4 and 28.65 respectively.

Coach Debbie Kosciusko commented "The UVM women are capable of scoring well above 120, and this is what we aim to do this weekend against Cortland and Cornell at Cortland."

Women Swimmers Triumph

The University of Vermont women's Swim Team was paced by Polly Doyle and Sue Montague to an 82-49 win over St. Mike's team on Thursday, February 9, and a 79-50 triumph over Keene State at Keene on Saturday February 11.

Linda Hill had three first place finishes for UVM against St. Mike's in the 100 yard butterfly (1:07.55), one hundred yard individual medley (1:08.99), and the fifty yard Butterfly (30.06). Kathleen Leahy placed first in the fifty yard breaststroke (37.86) and 100 yard breaststroke (1:21.57). Also fueling the Aquacats was Cathy Forsberg, with a first in the 200 yard freestyle (2:15.78) and second one hundred yard freestyle (1:00.50). Kim Brown took first in the fifty yard backstroke (33.09), and second one hundred yard backstroke (1:11.22). Sarah Moore captured first in the three meter diving (178.55), and second one meter diving (161.35). Other second place finishes were recorded by Lea Pardee, two hundred Freestyle (2:24.53); Molly Mason, fifty yard butterfly (31.33) and fifty yard freestyle (28.1); Bonnie Dix, one-hundred breaststroke (1:23.67); Sue Connolly, 200 I-M (2:46.09); Lisa Chesler, fifty yard breaststroke (38.73).

At Keene, UVM recorded ten first place finishes: 200 medley relay (Brown, Dix, Hill Forsberg); one hundred free, Cathy Forsberg; fifty and one hundred backstroke, Kim Brown; fifty and one hundred breaststroke, Kathleen Leahy; one hundred butterfly, Linda Hill (1:06.2 — New Varsity Record); one-meter and three meter diving, Sarah Moore; one hundred I-M, Linda Hill. Placing second for UVM were: Lea Pardee, 200 and 500 Freestyle; Polly Doyle, fifty yard Freestyle; Bonnie Dix, fifty and one hundred breaststroke; Missy Dempf, one and three meter diving; and Molly Mason, fifty Butterfly.

Seven UVM women swimmers will be attending the New England Championships February 16-18 at Boston College.

Women Cagers Stomped

By Amanda Miller

Margaret Considine popped in 21 points for the University of Vermont Women's Basketball team, but the University of New Hampshire Wildcats stomped to an 88-56 win over the Cats Saturday in Durham, N.H.

Belinda Emerson added 10 points to UVM's total, New Hampshire jumped to a 52-22 lead at the half, then coasted in for the victory.

Vermont also took a 70-51 loss at the hands of the University of Maine on Friday.

SPORTS PROFILE

Mark Wagner:
Dedicated Cross Country Ski Racer

By Jack Hart

Mark Wagner, UVM Cross Country Ski Team Captain and U.S. ski team member, has led Vermont to eleven consecutive winter carnival titles, plus two Eastern Division I Championships. Shortly before the start of the UVM Winter Carnival held at Stowe this last weekend, this reporter had the chance to chat with Wagner about the Carnival and cross-country skiing in general.

Wagner called training and skiing a "full time job." After the snow melts, he only rests for a couple weeks, as in late April he starts roller skiing (x-c skis with wheels on them) and runs daily. He also lifts weights three times a week. The same routine continues throughout the summer, becoming more intense as the start of school draws closer. In the fall he reaches his peak, with his time equally divided between roller skiing and running. "After Thanksgiving I do a lot of LSD (long slow distance) type of skiing, about fifty kilometers. I try to build up a base of 400-500 kilometers (250 miles) before the racing season starts."

This grueling schedule paid off last year, as Wagner won four carnivals, a feat never before accomplished, and also was the first American in the NCAA's national championship at Colorado to place fifth, behind a field filled with Norwegian contenders. While at the national championships, few people realize that Wagner passed out mid-way downhill. Wagner commented, "We were at an altitude of 14,000 feet and I put my head down almost between my legs to build up speed and hyperventilated, consequently causing me to pass out." Luckily, the fall only cost Wagner thirty seconds, but in national competition, one slip-up can cost a skier the race.

When asked about American schools importing foreign athletes, Wagner remarked, "I'm glad that they're here and I hope that more come. They are coming over for educational reasons and without the Norwegians in the NCAA's the quality level would drop."

When questioned on UVM's inability to capture a high position in the National Championships, Wagner remarked, "In the NCAA's we never seem to put it together. There is no real reason; it's just that the NCAA's are a one shot deal and there are a lot of variables involved. The team that is up on that day can win. This year we won't quite dominate the carnivals, but we'll be ready for the NCAA's and do well. This year we are going to work hard on the circuit and concentrate on the National Championships."

AN EARLY START

Wagner reflected on his road to the top of cross-country skiing. "I started to ski when I was about one and a half years old. I skied mostly downhill until I was in high school. You couldn't ski on my high school team unless you skied three events (downhill, cross-country and jumping). When I was a sophomore in high school, I was a much better alpine skier than cross-country. By my junior year I started to put more time into cross-country skiing and went on to qualify for the Junior Nationals. When I qualified in my senior year, I didn't win a single event, but I had the best all-around results. That summer after graduation I was named to the U.S. Ski Team, as a part of the Blue Team." (The U.S. Ski Team has three squads: red, white and blue.)

Wagner also commented on UVM Ski Coach, Chip LaCasse. "I have a lot of respect for Chip, he's done a lot for me and the other team members. He's not really a coach in the technical sense. He's got a broad knowledge of cross-country skiing and points out my good and bad characteristics. Chip is one of the main reasons I'm at UVM. He's an excellent coordinator, he gets us where we want to go, and he makes sure everything is ready so all we have to do is concentrate on racing. I wouldn't want to be anywhere else. But overall I really don't have a coach. I do a lot of reading, I keep notebooks, I listen and take in a lot of information. I try out what is best for me and work with that."

CONCENTRATE ON RACING

Wagner talked about what goes on in his mind during a race. "I try to analyze my skiing as I race so that I can concentrate on going as fast as possible. Sometimes your mind wanders but you have to try to concentrate all the time. Towards the end of the race your fatigue level gets to the point that you just can't comprehend what's going on around you."

Shortly before the race, previously lively conversation died out between the Vermont skiers. Wagner later explained, "There really isn't any pressure at all. We are all good friends. But we are competitive against each other in a race and want to beat the other guy. Cross-country skiing is not really a team effort; everyone is for himself. The only pressure we have is what we put on ourselves."

Wagner closed by stating, "It was definitely an honor to be elected a tri-captain. There is some responsibility, but not a lot. Personally, I would not choose to do it. Not because I don't want to, but I like to practice and train when I want to and with whom I want to. I'm a little cynical about training. I enjoy it but I want to do it at odd times. I hardly ever train with the team. I have nothing against them, it's just that I've found out what's best for me. However, I do think that I should make myself more available."

Serge Lablanc Decides To Remain At UVM

By John Cunavelis

Serge Leblanc, the heralded UVM freshman, is out for the year, but he has made up his mind that he will skate four years for the Catamounts while enrolling in the five year electrical engineering program.

"I came to UVM for engineering, so I'm happy to be in the five year program. This way, I can carry an easier load my first year and work hard on my English."

Serge had full scholarship offers from eight U.S. colleges last year (BU and Notre Dame contacted him when he was only 15) and he couldn't be happier that he chose UVM. "The Canadiens' scout said if I was going to college, then UVM was the best place for me. They have a good coach and I could reach my potential here."

"This place is unbelievable. You will never see the people, the enthusiasm, the cheering for the players, the atmosphere for hockey anywhere that you do at UVM. My friends from Montreal come here to see a game, and they say it's unbelievable. I played three times in the Forum, and there is no comparison. Here it is tops. It's the best place in the world, I think, for hockey atmosphere."

Serge recently received a full-page writeup in Journal de Montreal, a huge French-language tabloid and one of the most widely-circulated in Quebec Province (400,000). In it, Serge extolls the virtues of playing hockey at the University of Vermont. "UVM is very well known now throughout Quebec. All the hockey players see the article. My friend Yves St. Jean (who helps place Montreal players in college) received many phone calls the next day from hockey players asking about UVM."

"It was very difficult for me here at the beginning, but I made up my mind to stay"

---Serge Lablanc

"It was very difficult for me here at the beginning. Very difficult. I almost went back home. First, I lose my roommate George Tames who went back to Montreal. Then I was injured, and could not play with the team. School was hard and English was hard. But, I just made up my mind to stay. Now, I am very happy I did."

Serge's room on the third floor of Marsh Hall is covered with photographs of the Montreal Canadiens, with CHOM-FM filling the stereo. There are large posters of Bobby Orr and Rocky, and two hockey sticks, hand-lettered "Bobby Orr" and "Guy LaFleur."

"It's their real sticks," Serge explains. "When I was 15 many people told Bobby Orr that I was the little Bobby Orr, and he gave me his stick in my hand."

Bobby Orr, then, is your favorite player?

"It was Bobby Orr, but now I do not have a favorite, because he's not there."

Serge started hockey when he was eight, and skated every day in his backyard rink. His strong point is skating, but feels his weakness is stick-handling. "It is really hard for me to skate real fast and stick-handle good. If I could keep my speed and stick-handle like Louie!" he said in reference to Louis Cote, UVM sophomore defenseman from Montreal.

Because Serge was small, he started working on weights, and has won competition in weight-lifting. As a sideline, when he was 17, friends urged him to enter the "Mr. Montreal" body-building competition, and he won the title for the 21-and-under age group.

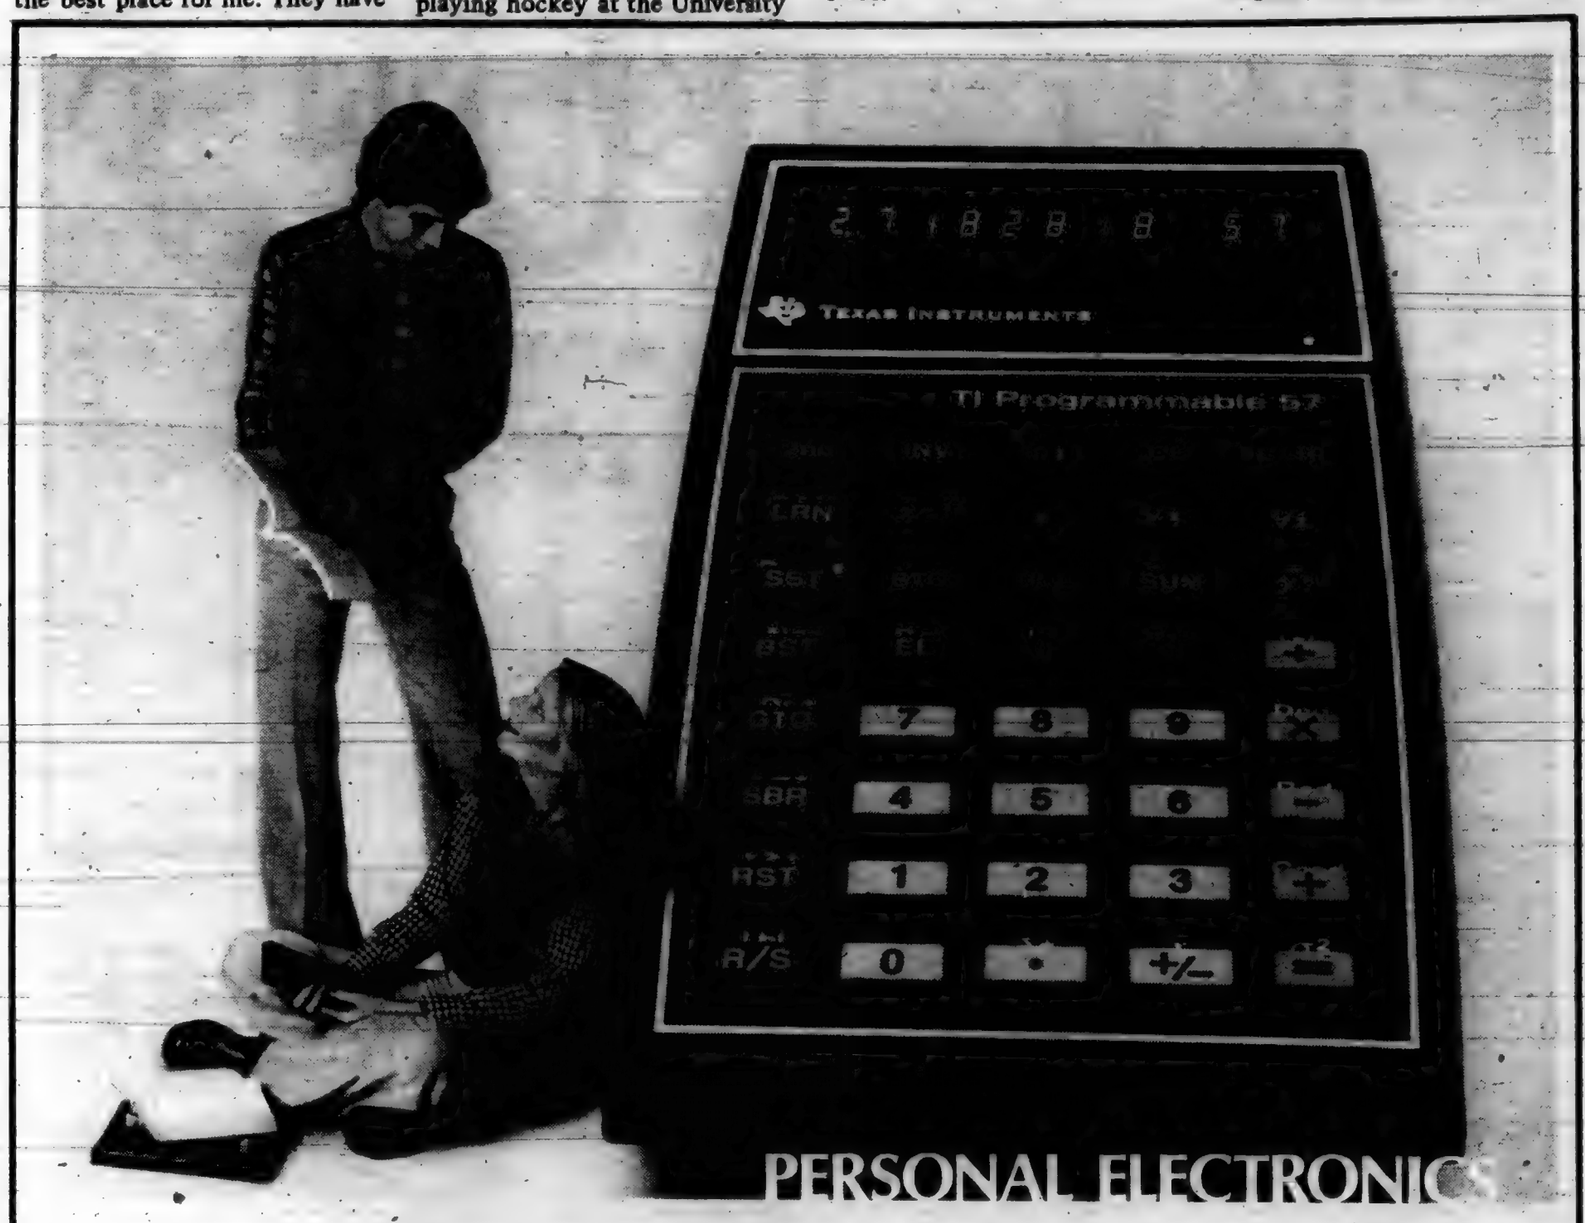
Ironically, it was while doing the benchpress last summer that he suffered rib injuries.

"I had never been injured playing hockey in Canada. Yes, they came after me. Some players and fans, like Lachine, tried to put me out. My team, Montreal-Nord, had to pay $2,000 for protection for me, security people."

Serge was all-star in the fast Montreal Metro League four successive years, and voted best defenseman two years.

All the while, he kept up his studies, attending a tough technical school.

For the past five years, Serge would spend his summers out in the country camping, where he would run, lift weights and ride his motorcycle. "I love the country. That's another reason I like Vermont so much." He has been on a motoreycle since he was 12 and won races competitively.



Have you given much thought to playing pro hockey, I asked?

"I don't even think about that. I think only about my course – electrical engineering. It's a hard course. And I think about next year. Dr. Johnson, who operated on my knee (torn cartilege) – he's the best. He said the knee will be as strong as ever. I expect to be skating by March. I want to be really ready for next year. I would like very much to help win the Division One championship for Mr. Cross. He is a good coach and a good man. He has won many Division Two championships, but never in Division One. Right? That is my goal."

Do you have a girl in Montreal?

"No more. I did. But I stay here now for five years, you know. That is a long time. I have to make a decision because it is not fair to her. But there are other girls. There are a lot here – whew!"

The TI-57. The super slide-rule that'll get you into programming... fast and easy.

Even if you've never programmed before.

For the student who requires slide-rule functions, the TI-57 delivers an exceptional combination of advanced mathematical and statistical capabilities. From functions such as trig, logs, powers, roots and reciprocals...to mean, variance, standard deviation and much more.

And as long as you're in the market for a super slide-rule calculator, why not buy one that can also put the power, speed and convenience of programming at your disposal?

Programming a calculator simply means giving it a logical set of instructions for accomplishing what you want it to do. Programming enables you to solve lengthy and repetitive problems quickly by substituting new variables into the set of instructions which you have already entered into the machine.

The end result is more efficient use of your time in problem-solving.

All this and more is explained in our unique, illustrated, easy-to-follow guidebook, "Making Tracks Into Programming." This 200-page book comes with the TI-57. It contains simple, step-by-step instructions and examples to help you quickly learn to use programming functions to make your problem-solving faster, more accurate and fun.

Women's Track Stepped On

By Robin Snyder

Outstanding performances were turned in by the University of Vermont Women's Track team, despite losing to a strong UMass contingent by a score of 50-49, Saturday at the Gardner-Collins cage. UVM captured six of the ten firsts in the meet and posted several record performances.

In the field events, Janet Terp and Laurie Dane placed first and second respectively in the long jump. Terp, whose 18' 6¾" jump gave her a new school record, matched this performance with a winning 5' 5¾" flop in the high jump. Carol Maronelli also placed fourth in that event. Kiah Thornton carried UVM in the shot put with a throw of 36'4", while Barbara Luneau took third place.

The Cats lost some momentum as UMass captured all of the sprinting events. However, strong performances again by UVM's Terp and Dane gained UVM second and third place in the 50 yard hurdles. The most striking performance in the running events was by UVM's Judy St. Hilare, who ran an unchallenged 5:01.7 mile. She followed this by winning the 800 meter run with a time of 2:21.7. Freshman Amy Bouchard decisively took the two mile in 11:32.4, followed by another UVM runner, Robin Snyder.

The UVM relay team of Maronelli, Dane, Dowling, and St. Hilare were edged out of first by UMass in the 4x440 yard relay with a time of 4:08.7. The Huskies eventually won the meet, posting 50 points to Vermont's 49 and Albany State's eight.

The Cats' Women's team has one more regular season meet February 24th at Amherst College before travelling to the Women's Eastern Championships at Princeton University.

Tracksters Come Up Short

By Bernie Gagnon

Plagued by the flu and injuries, the University of Vermont Men's Track Team fought hard throughout the day but came up nine points short in the final tally, as Plattsburgh snuffed UVM 69-55, and Albany finished third with 49, Saturday at the Gardner Collins cage.

Many fine performances throughout the meet by UVM transfers enabled the Cats to stay in the heat of the battle. Charlie Claudio paced the Cats with victories in the 35 weight (55'1½") and high jump (6'4"). Claudio also captured a second in the long jump and a third in the shot put. Joe McClallen placed second in the 50 yard dash and triple jump and was third in the long jump. Two miler Andy Voorhis turned in another fine performance by running a season best 9:32 while placing third. Last week Voorhis turned a key performance in Vermont's victory over SLU and Colgate.

Captains Craig Buscemi and Bernie Gagnon also were instrumental in helping the Cats stay close in Saturday's contest. Buscemi, former record holder in the triple jump, won that event and placed third in the high jump. Gagnon, returning after a foot injury, captured the 600 yard run and ran anchor leg in the mile relay to place the team second after erasing a twenty-yard deficit. Other fine performances were turned in by Ed Nemeth in the 1000 yd. and Jim Kauffman in the 45 yd. hurdles. Nemeth placed second after being nipped at the finish line. Kauffman also took a second with a respectable 7.0 second clocking.

Next week the Cats travel to UConn for the Yankee Conference championships.

Outing Club Excursions

By Chris Smith

The UVM Outing Club has seen a pressing need to make it easier for its members to participate in some outdoor recreation. In the past we've relied on students planning trips on their own and running them through the club. Our primary concern revolved around meetings, workshops, films, etc. The time has come to step a little farther. The club is expanding and with this expansion comes an added responsibility. We would like to rest assured that at least one trip will be going out every weekend. The easiest way to do this is to schedule them ourselves and supply leaders for them. We are holding a leadership workshop this weekend to get our prospective leaders together and to insure ourselves that they are competent and confident in their abilities. From this group we will be supplying leaders for the trips during the rest of the Spring semester. Our schedule is as follows:

(1) Feb. 17, 18 – Leadership workshop.

(2) Feb. 25, 26 – Weekend of winter camping in Division XI of the Long Trail around the Ritterbush Camp (skiing, snowshoeing)

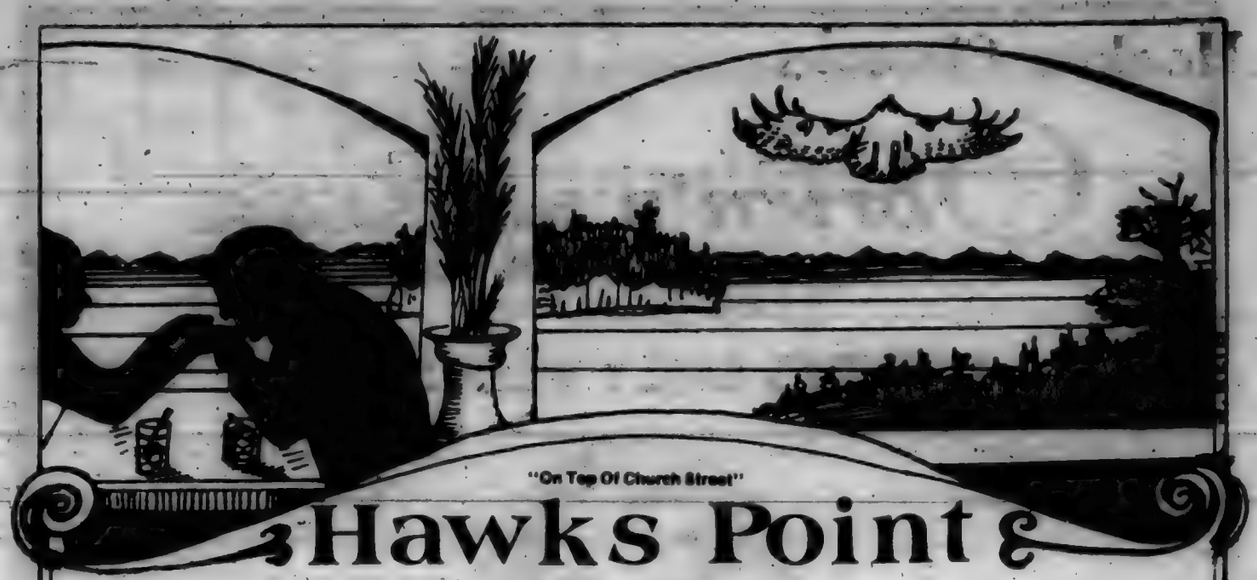
(3) Feb. 25 – X-country ski trip.

(4) March 4, 5, 6, 7 – Trip in the Pemigewasset Wilderness of the White Mountains (climbing, skiing, snowshoeing)

(5) March 4, 5, 6 – Adirondack Hike up Gothics Mountain (snowshoeing, climbing)

(6) March 5 – X-country ski trip

(7) March 11 – Day hike up Mansfield (snowshoe)



(8) March 11 – X-country ski trip

(9) Spring Break – March 25 through April 2 – There are many possibilities, but no definite plans as of yet.

(10) April 8, 9 – Adirondack Hike up Mount Marcy or Haystack (some snowshoeing)

(11) April 15, 16 – A weekend at Underhill State Park at the foot of Mansfield.

The X-country ski trip destinations will be announced during the week before departure. They are primarily up to the leaders. Definite plans for the Easter break will be made as the time gets closer and as seasonal bounds become more apparent. Beyond this schedule are the trips led through our sub-divisions: bicycying, sailing, canoeing, kyaking, and climbing. If you are interested in any trips, please come down to the House (196 S. Prospect St.) To sign up we request a three dollar deposit.

HOCKEY PREVIEW

By Jim Fletcher

Assuming the University of Vermont can beat both St. Lawrence on Tuesday and RPI tonight, it needs at least two wins and probably three in upcoming games in order to hold on to eighth place and make the playoffs. If the Cats lose to either SLU or RPI, then it will take a miracle for them to make it.

Clarkson comes to Gutterson on Monday in the last home game for the six Catamount seniors: Koch, Halford, Reber, Otness, Ross and McAlduff.

The Knights have not been playing like the fourth place team that they are. Clarkson is on a two-game losing streak and hasn't come up with an impressive victory in a long time. Furthermore, leading scorer Kevin Zappia is out until the playoffs with an injury. Hopefully, Monday's game will be clean. The last thing the Cats need is another injury or game misconduct.

The Cats visit top rival UNH on TV Thursday at 7 p.m. UVM will be looking for revenge for the Wildcats' 7-5 win at Gutterson in January. The Cats thoroughly outshot the Wildcats in that game and UVM is quite capable of winning this contest.

THE RACE

It's a critical week for RPI. The Engineers (6-7) played Cornell Tuesday, play UVM tonight, SLU Saturday, and Brown on Wednesday. If they win three then they won't be caught. Two wins would put the Engineers in excellent position with four home games remaining.

Providence (7-9-1) played UNH last night and a victory would be a big boost to their playoff hopes. The Friars have two must wins coming up against Yale Sunday and Colgate Wednesday.

Dartmouth (7—10) visits Penn and Princeton this weekend and desperately needs two wins. The Big Green has lost five in a row.

Northeastern, despite the cancellation of its game with Clarkson, is still out of it. A win over Brown tonight is mandatory for any chance at a playoff berth.

Yale (9-12-1) suffered a major setback when they were upset at Penn 4-0 after squeaking past Princeton 5-4. It marked the third time that Yale has been shutout this season.

Brown (10-6-1) also visited Penn and Princeton. They lost to Penn 4-3 and beat Princeton in overtime 5-4. If the Bruins don't shape up soon they could find themselves out of the top eight. The Cats need help from Brown as the Bruins have games coming up with NE and RPI and two with Dartmouth.

Harvard (9-6) is still fairly assured of a playoff spot. The Cantabs visit Penn and Princeton this weekend. In each of the past two seasons, Penn has beaten Harvard 4-3 at the Class of '23 Rink. The Cantabs need at least one win and could use two.

BEHIND THE ZAMBONI

Before Tuesday's game with SLU, the Cats had the second best away record in the league (5-2) (BU is undefeated). The Cats had the worst home record in the league at 1-6. The team is 0-2 on neutral ice.

Borg To Play at UVM

Bjorn Borg, the No. 1 ranked tennis player in the world, will play at the University of Vermont's Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium in an E.F. Hutton Tennis Challenge Match, May 2, it was announced last week by Harlan C. Sylvester, vice president of the Hutton office in Burlington.

The Challenge Match, a best two out of three sets, is sponsored by E. F. Hutton for the benefit of the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont and the University of Vermont athletic program. Bobbie Flanagan, chairperson of the Ways and Means Committee for the Auxillary of the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont and Al Overton, President of UVM's Catamount Club, will serve as co-chairpersons for the benefit matches. A doubles match, featuring Borg, will also be played that evening.

Borg, holder of most of the major tennis titles, will play Bill Scanlon, the 1976 NCAA champion and one of the fastest rising players on the professional tour today.

Tickets for this event will be available March 1 with ticket prices and locations to be announced before that date.

The Borg-Scanlon singles match at UVM is scheduled for 8:30 p.m., May 2, preceded by a doubles match at 7:30 p.m. involving Borg and Scanlon and two other top tennis professionals to be announced at a later date.

Are You Depressed?

Volunteers are needed to participate in a study on Depression in College Students. All confidential for all students who want to participate whether you are depressed or not. No one else in the group will know if you are depressed or not. The time commitment is two hours a week for four weeks in a small group with other students, plus one individual session of forty minutes. Call Jennifer at ext. 3888. Leave a message, your phone number and times you could meet.

Free Pap Test

There will be a free pap test, breast exam, and blood pressure clinic sponsored by the Vermont Department of Health at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception at 91 Pearl St., Burlington on Monday, March 6 from 1 – 6 p.m. Women who have not had a pap test in 18 months are especially encouraged to come. For an appointment, call Mrs. Beatrice Charron at 862-5330. Or just walk in. Appointments are given preference.

Neurological Workshop

As part of the continuing education for nurses that the University of Vermont initiated in 1975, a workshop entitled "The Nervous System and Neurological Conditions," will take place on Feb. 18 in Room 111 of the Rowell Building on the University of Vermont campus, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

The purpose of the five hour session will be to assist the registered nurse in reviewing the anatomy and physiology of the nervous system; the major pathophysiological problems that may occur due to degeneration and trauma; and the assessments that could be made by the nurse. Sr. Evaline Barrett, R:N., M.S. associate professor at the UVM School of Nursing, will be the principle lecturer.

The registration fee for the workshop is $19.00. Information can be obtained at the Division of Continuing Education, or Mrs. Janet P. Brown, School of Nursing, University of Vermont, (802) 656-3815.

The next offering in the workshop series will be May 18 on the "Renal System and Renal Conditions."

Styrafoam Wanted

The student chapter of the American Society of Civil Engineers asks anyone with discarded packaging styrofoam to leave it in boxes provided in either Cook or Billings Center. Pick-up for any amount can be arranged by calling 864-7771. The styrofoam is needed for the construction of this year's UVM entry in the National Concrete Canoe Contest. All donations of styrofoam help our chances of winning and are greatly appreciated.

Christian Fellowship

Intervarsity Christian Fellowship held its first meeting January 23 to plan its schedule and activities for the present semester.

The emphasis is being placed on small group activities, giving students a better opportunity to interact with each other and grow in their Christian faith.

Regular meetings are held every other Monday night in E166 of Living/Learning and these include Old Testament Bible talks and small group projects. The next get-together is February 13. For more information contact Chris Kluge, 121 Millis, x3411.

VPIRG Wants You!!!

If you would like to become a student Trustee of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG), you should begin attending the meetings of the UVM VPIRG Trustees. The Trustees meet every Monday at 5:00 in Conference Room C, Billings Student Center.

Any student is eligible and the only requirement is that you be willing to devote time and serious effort for the work. If you have a question or cannot attend a Monday meeting, stop by the VPIRG office which is located in the North Lounge of Billings on the left as you enter the lounge.

Alaskan Slide Show

The Vermont Branch of Friends of the Earth will present a speaker and slide show on Alaska's wild lands this next Tuesday, February 21st at 7:30 p.m. in the basement of St. Paul's Cathedral in Burlington.

Following the slide presentation of George Longenecker's travels in Alaska, there will be a discussion on legislation now pending in Congress (H.R. 39 – Udall and S.1500 – Metcalf) that would provide protection for the wilderness areas in Alaska.

This event is free and open to the public.

Conserve Energy!

Act, the Action for Conservation Today committee, will be meeting every Thursday evening at 6 p.m. in the Robinson Hall lounge. ACT is an action group whose members wish to educate themselves and others about conservation concepts and practices. This group will focus its energies on conservation on the UVM campus including programs designed to reduce electricity, water, and paper product consumption. Meetings will be for both sharing information and planning campus activities. Anyone interested in working with ACT to bring about the necessary changes on campus is welcome. If you have any questions, call Sue Kashanski, 2 Robinson Hall, x3086.

S.A. Budget Requests

Attention all S.A. recognized organizations already funded by S.A. and those wishing to be funded. Budget Request Forms for the academic year 78-79 are available as of February first. The Student Association has $175,000 in funds which will be allocated to S.A. recognized organizations. These budget forms are self-explanatory and specific S.A. funding policies are explained on page one of the form. All S.A. recognized organizations wishing funds should pick up these forms soon from the secretary in the S.A. office. The deadline for submitting budget requests is March 1, 1978.

Mortar Sociey

Mortar Board announces their invitation to Juniors to apply for membership to the Mortar Board Society. Applications have already been sent out to those with a GPA of 3.20 or above. Those who have not heard by February 10 and wish to be considered for next year's membership, please call Jane Uttecht at 879-7360, as soon as possible. Mortar Board also invites any interested Juniors whose GPA may be slightly below 3.20 to fill out an application for membership. The deadline for application is February 24.

Crafts Fairs

There will be Crafts Fairs held at the Waterbury Armory in Waterbury, Vt. on Saturday, February 18 and Sunday, February 19 from 9:30 – 4:30 each day. Craftsmen will be exhibiting a variety of crafts to include — batik, candles, ceramics, pottery, inlay jewelry boxes, stuffed toys, quilts & pillows, apple dolls, baked goods, chair caning, plants, sheepskin articles, wildlife art, jewelry, string art, stained glass and much more. Admission is 50 cents per person. Refreshments are available. We cordially invite you to visit the Craft Fairs. For Craftsman information on these Craft Fairs and the future Craft Fairs to be held this year write: Craft Fairs–1978, 252 North St., Apt. 2, Burlington, Vt. 05401 or call 862-3939.

Go To Scandinavia

Students interested in a year of study in Scandinavia (Denmark, Finland, Norway or Sweden) on the Scandinavian Seminar Program are invited to an informational meeting on Thursday, February 23 at 7:30 p.m. in 216 L/L Commons (near fireplace). The Norwegian program director, Hallvard Skauge and former participants will be present. Refreshments will be served.

The Seminar is a national program of foreign study in which over eighty UVM students have participated.

Students who are interested but cannot attend the meeting should contact Kim Wright or Pat Titus, Office of International Students, L/L B178, ext. 4296. Or Prof. Jerry Felt, History Dept., 302 Wheeler House, ext. 3180.

Business Meeting

There will be a general meeting for all members of the Undergraduate Business Society on Tuesday, February 21st at 8:00 p.m. in L/LC 216 Commons. Any student wishing to find out about the U.B.S. is encouraged to attend this meeting as we are looking to expand our membership. Topics to be discussed include (1) Executive Board Positions for next year's U.B.S. (2) the functions and operations of the U.B.S. and (3) the future of the Business Department at UVM with remarks from Dr. Robert Arns, UVM Vice-President of Academic Affairs. One out of every 10 undergraduates is a Business Major so come and help improve your department.

VPIRG Talks Legislation

The Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) will be talking about legislation the group is working on presently. The meeting will be Monday, February 20 at 7:30 p.m. in Marsh Lounge, Billings Center.

Deborah Katz, VPIRG researcher, will be discussing various health and consumer bills. Leigh Seddon will talk about environmental legislation, and Chuck Sheketoff will discuss the different energy bills in the legislature. For further information, the VPIRG office is located in the North Lounge of Billings, or call 223-5221.

Organ Recital

Jack A. Grebb, a third-year medical student at UVM, will present an organ recital for the benefit of the Vermont State Nurses Association on Friday, February 24, at 8:00 p.m., at St. Paul's Episcopal Cathedral, Burlington. The program will also include two pieces for trumpet and organ with David Brubaker as the trumpet soloist. ## Wall Street Seminar

See New York's biggest businesses from the inside. This year's "Wall Street Seminar" will visit Merrill Lynch, Avanti Linens, Marine Midland Bank, Lord & Taylor and more. Talk with industry's top execs, March 27 – 30, during Spring Break. Price is reasonable; program tailored to participant's needs. Sign up soon for this fantastic career opportunity. Information and sign-ups, contact Susan Perkins at 862-4515 or Gail Newman at Ext. 2010. Sponsored by the Alumni Department and the Dept. of Business Administration.

Biomedical Science

The Long Island Jewish–Hillside Medical Center will sponsor a two-month training program next summer on research in biomedical science for undergraduate college and medical and dental students.

The program is designed to help students understand current concepts in biomedical science and offers the opportunity to participate in an ongoing research project at the Center. Daily lectures and demonstrations will be held throughout the program on such topics as research planning, instrumentation, analytical methods, separation methods in biochemistry, the biosynthesis and degradation of macromoleoules, physiology, microbiology, immunology, cell biology, pathophysiology, and experimental surgery and care of lab animals.

Participation in the program will be based on academic achievement, recommendations, a statement of interest and previous research experience. A few stipends will be awarded. Applications are due Feb. 17, 1978. Contact Craig Smith at the Office of Academic Program Support, 340 Waterman for details and application forms.

Homemaker Scholarships

Extension Homemakers Student Scholarships are available for Vermont residents in their sophomore, junior, or senior year in the school of home economics at the University of Vermont. Applications may be obtained in Mary Carlson's office in Morrill Hall. These applications, plus references, must be in by February 28, so don't delay.

Women's Rights

Abortion, ERA, equal employment opportunities, etc. are your concerns as women that are being handled at the national level. But what about your personal eneryday problems and questions? Why not join a consciousness-raising group to discuss these personal questions with other women just like you? CR groups are being organized by the UVM Women's Organization. Call Sally at 862-1855 if you are interested.

Emerson, Lake and Palmer: Art Rock or Space-Age Noise?

GREG LAKE

When you buy a ticket to see Emerson, Lake and Palmer, you're not paying for a rock concert; you're paying for an extravaganza that manipulates your senses. And when it's all over, you're not sure if you should applaud, stick cotton in your ears, or have your body examined for a high-level radiation disease. ELP's show Wednesday at Plattsburgh was a contest between melody and monstrosity. At times, the music was so flawless and powerful that the trio sounded like a fully equipped orchestra. At other times, they sounded more like a testing site for the neutron bomb. The major flaw was that ELP tried to blend these two ridiculously polar accomplishments into a coherent concert package. It didn't work.

When the confusion was kept to a minimum (the crowd of predominantly high school students would usually scream only when the synthesizers did), there were some encouraging moments. It was nice to see, for example, that Keith Emerson has lost virtually none of his keyboard excellence. His performance during "Take a Pebble," which featured a quick injection of Scott Joplin's "Maple Leaf Rag" was masterful. His fusion of jazz, rock and classical moods make him one of the finest keyboard players around. On the piano, he is probably untouchable. He's cocky, and his lust for the unpredictable sends his performance into unimaginable tangents.

Emerson was also interesting while he doodled with and eventually undid the lovely classic, "Pictures at an Exhibition." This time, however, Emerson's cunning and innovation elevated him above the song, above music entirely, and into a trashy collection of electronic flatuations. The number started beautifully: a nice organ movement, and an effective moog solo; but there was just no keeping Emerson satisfied with the pettiness of simple and pretty music. He began racing from keyboard to keyboard, mercilessly abusing each one while the song quickly degenerated into pieces of electronic rubble. The horrifying sounds he produced could perhaps be compared to a truck load of live ducks being squashed by a meteorite.

KEITH EMERSON

CARL PALMER

Greg Lake's vocal efforts were in many ways the saving grace of Wednesday night's show. His voice was mellow and soothing amidst the electronic and percussive turbulence on stage that accompanied the occasional firecrackers and beer bottles that the audience ejected.

On "C'est La Vie," and "Lucky Man," which both featured Lake on his own, the crowd was treated to a majestic singing voice that battled through the hazy distortions and foul regurgitations of the Plattsburgh field house. It seemed that Lake's heart was in each song, and an air of sensitivity and grace was about him. He is not the most dynamic member of ELP, and probably not the most musical, but he is invaluable to the trio as the one consistent element they have to offer.

Carl Palmer, aside from his illustrious insanity, is actually a very talented percussionist. He's quick, creative, and strong; but unfortunately, it's the last of these qualities that predominates his performance. On stage, he was engulfed by his collection of bells, gongs, drums and drum synthesizers all of which were used during a rather long solo midway through the show. It was an interesting movement, but after about twenty minutes, Palmer had exploited every thud, tingle and swoosh that his percussion set had to offer. The crowd became somewhat dispirited, but Palmer countered by elevating his drum stand with an explosion, and rotating it while he hammered out the same primordial impulses that he had been all along. Although the majority of the young audience seemed to thoroughly enjoy his antics, this writer thought that they were mildly amusing at best. For all of its shock value, a rotating, exploding drumstand is

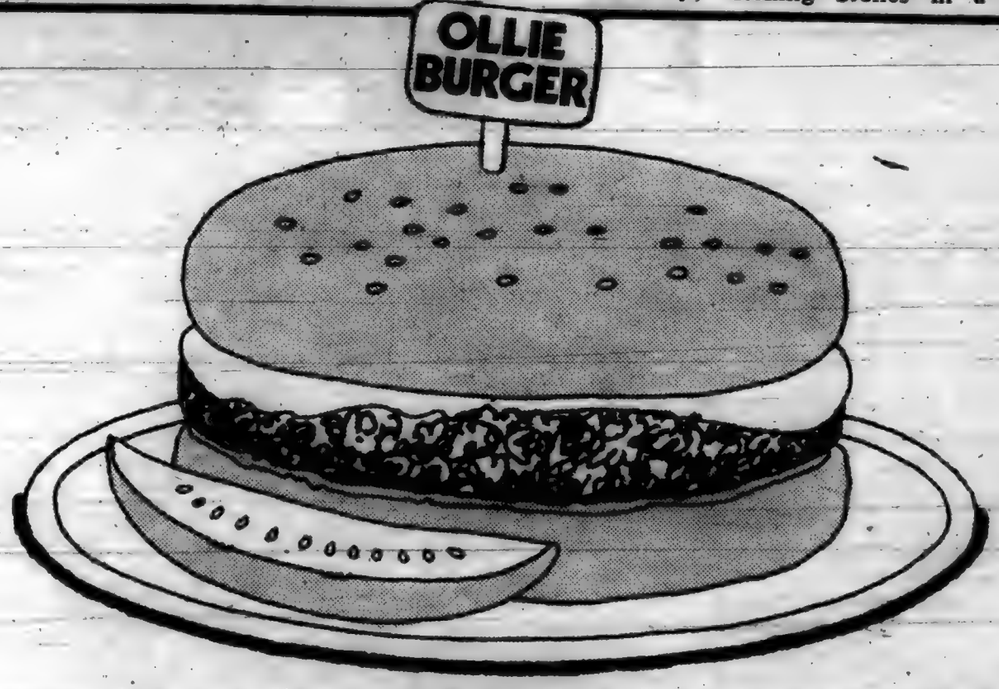
Sea Level Flows To Ira Allen For First S.A. Concert

By Shana Schwartzberg

Coming to Ira Allen on February 23 for the first of this year's S.A. sponsored concerts is Sea Level. The band contains three members of the now defunct Allman Brothers Band, although Jai Johanny Johannson was the only member of the original group.

It is quite a feat to attempt anything with the remnants of one of the most legendary bands ever formed. Their recent and ongoing success is a well-deserved tribute to their ability. In keeping with a tradition started by the Allman Brothers, Sea Level has two drummers, who provide a characteristic pulsating rhythm. Another innovation, (courtesy of Duane Allman) is the double lead guitars which has become so popular with Southern rock bands today. In fact, nowhere else on any album I have ever seen do they list which guitarist is playing thru which channel as they do on the new Sea Level album. That in itself is an indication of their high caliber professionalism.

This tour coincides with the release of their second album, Cats on the Coast. Their first album, simply entitled Sea Level, was recently nominated for Best Debut album for the first annual North American Rock Radio awards program.



Since the release of their first album, Sea Level has picked up three new members: Randall Bramlett, Davis Causey and George Weaver. Each has an extensive and noteworthy background in music. Randall Bramlett, who plays keyboards and saxophone, recorded with Gregg Allman, besides coming out with two fine solo albums. Davis Causey was a guitarist in Randall's Band, and he also has played with Greg Allman. George Weaver on drums has performed with Otis Redding, Bobley Blue Bland and Tyrone Davis among others.

Together with the original Sea Level of Jimmy Nalls, Chuck Leavell, Lamor Williams and "Jaimoe" have combined to produce music that almost defies classification. It's sort of a rhythmic, southern jazz/rock. Unfortunately, a lot of people like to hypothesize about the direction that Duane Allman would have taken musically, were he still alive, but I think it better to evaluate the influence he had and to leave it at that. While Sea Level may have some old Allman Brothers and retain some Allman Brother qualities, they are not the Allman Brothers and don't even sound similar to them.

Opening for Sea Level is the local band Zzebra, featuring Lofty Amas. Amas, a native-born Nigerian, plays congos and saxophones. In 1970 he played congos with the Rolling Stones in a televised concert in London, where he received exposure that led to the formation of Osilusa, a group consisting of three West Africans and four West Indians. During the four years that Lofty Amos was with Osilusa they made three albums and did an extensive tour of the U.S. the original Zzebra was doing a European tour with Chick Corea, that the American pianist suggested to Amas that he might find a more suitable climate for his music in the U.S. 1976 found Amas in Vermont.

Amas has a new band now, playing out of Hinesburg. The name Zzebra in part stands for the racial diversity of the band, besides the musical variety. Electric African jazz is about the best way to briefly describe it.

It's actually quite refreshing to have such a dynamic and positive group on the local scene. The combination of Zzebra and Sea Level should be quite colorful and energizing.

Dickey Betts and Roy Buchanan Jam At Dartmouth

By Bob McGee and Jon Milne

Ideally, one of the most rewarding aspects about attending any concert is the opportunity it provides to come away with a true feeling for the individual and his music. Yet too often today musicians appear to be going through the motions, giving just enough of themselves to appease the average concert goer. Dickey Betts proved to be the exception this past Thursday as he completely captivated a small crowd at Dartmouth College with his own special brand of guitar mastery.

At the outset of the concert though, all indications were that it was going to be unmemorable in every sense of the word. After the two hour drive down, we were forced to wait 45 minutes for our tickets which were lost in transit. Once entering the arena we were further disappointed to find the concert hall only half full — an unexpected development considering all the advance publicity proclaiming a guitar spectacular hosted by Pat Metheny, Roy Buchanan, and Dickey Betts and Great Southern.

The sparse crowd of around 2,000 was to be further depleted by the announcement that Pat Metheny would not appear, as he was stranded in Boston by the travelers ban. Finally, Roy

Buchanan walked out on stage, an hour after the concert was scheduled to begin.

Right from the start it was obvious that Buchanan wasn't into playing, and he failed to even acknowledge the crowd until the fifth song of his set. While putting forth a technically sound hour of music, he was unable to raise the crowd to any real level of involvement. He did manage though to bring them to their feet with two Hendricks tunes, "Hey Joe" and "Foxy Lady," and ended his set on a bright note with a haunting rendition of "The Messiah Will Come Again."

People often comment on the blandness of Buchanan's voice. The fact is that he is not a singer but rather a guitar technician and innovator. Many of the current tricks such as harmonics, volume swell and pick and finger combinations, all of which were evident throughout the concert, were either innovated or made popular by Buchanan. Especially impressive was the way he got his guitar to whistle and sing during "Storm Monday" by bending the strings of his "Fender Tellie" in a certain way.

One thing that hurt Buchanan was the fact that the majority of the crowd was unfamiliar with his music, and thus were uncharacteristically subdued throughout the set. Yet the mood soon changed as Dickey Betts and Great Southern took the stage, and the crowd was not to sit down for the rest of the concert.

Sporting the same set-up as the old Allman Brothers Band, Betts group consisted of two lead guitars, two drummers and a bass. This should of provided a clue to what was going to follow, as Betts proceeded to intermix his own original tunes with some old Allman Brothers favorites to raise the crowd to a fevorous pitch.

Dickey Betts started off the concert with a couple of songs off his new album, including a lively version of "Run Gypsie Run." At this point, he pulled his first surprise of the evening by breaking into "In Memory of Elizabeth Reed," which brought everyone up screaming. Betts proceeded to back off and let the other lead guitar take over, only to join him shortly thereafter in a rousing battle of lead guitars.

The concert never slowed down from here on in. Betts enthusiasm on stage was reflected in the audience as people were dancing in the aisles, while others were waving confederate flags in beat to the music. After playing for well over an hour Betts ended the set with an inspired rendition of Jessica.

At this point many people left figuring Betts was through for the evening. Yet a faithful crowd of 300 or so people remained to try to bring him back on stage. Betts heeded their request by playing "High Falls," and showcased each member of his band during the song.

If anyone thought this was to be the end of the concert, they were soon proved wrong. Roy Buchanan walked out on stage at the conclusion of the song and they immediately broke into "South Bound." Those people that remained were treated to a jam session with two of the best guitarists around. There was no doubt that Buchanan was into it this time, as he was smiling and tantalizing the crowd by playing right at the end of the stage.

Dickey Betts was to be called back for still one more encore, and he responded by playing "Ramblin' Man." It's a tribute to the man and his music that he could so completely captivate his fellow musicians and the crowd. Those few that stayed to the end were treated to a private party late Thursday night hosted by Dickey Betts and Great Southern.

Jean-Pierre Rampal:

A Golden Man With A Golden Flute

By Tricia John

Jean-Pierre Rampal is indeed a showman. With his golden flute in hand he dazzled a packed Ira Allen Chapel with graceful runs and scale passages varying in speed and texture throughout the concert. He is the master of his instrument, in complete control of his tone, intonation and phrasing. In beautifully subtle ways he flirts with the instrument and the music, creating unpredictable twists in his interpretations. On top of that, his performance Tuesday evening was practically note-perfect.

Nonetheless, much of the concert wasn't very good, because the versatile Rampal played the first half too fast for his accompanist Robert Veyron-Lacroix. Clearly Veyron-Lacroix functioned more as an "accompanist" than an equal partner in these duets of the English, German and French Baroque period, unable to compete with the constantly accelerated tempo of Rampal. His lifeless performance easily could have been attributed to his unfamiliarity with the University's Tourin harpsichord, but one still has difficulty imagining how any harpsichordist could keep up with Rampal's wild flute. While Rampal did have complete control, Veyron-Lacroix was left sometimes a beat behind the flute, a problem which could have been remedied only by a more moderate tempo.

The second half of the program improved markedly — Veyron-Lacroix playing piano for the Copland and Prokofiev. Rampal was now positioned to the right of Veyron-Lacroix (in the first half Rampal was to his left which resulted in further loss of rapport between musicians, as well as less instrumental unity), and their precision in timing improved. The first movement of his Duo for Flute and Piano was slow and austere — the flowing dominant theme pervaded the movement's development subtly and effectively. The theme was distinctly Coplandesque in its simplicity, with a lonely, restful tonality typical to many of his melodies.

"In beautifully subtle ways he flirts with the instrument and the music, creating unpredictable twists in his interpretations."

The "L'Inconnue" Sonata in G Major by the relatively unknown composer Michel de la Barre was the most problematic piece of the performance. While the first movement Grave was unified and well performed, the beautiful Chaconne movement lacked everything except speed. What was supposed to be a lovely, graceful, lyrical movement was actually a race to the finish. The Bach Sonata in G minor was "interpreted" in much the same way, although they gave the Adagio a very warm and careful reading. Here Veyron-Lacroix brought life to the harpsichord for the first time. Thus a pattern was established for these Baroque duets: when the tempo must be slow (because it is indicated by the composer), their playing was magnificent.

The popular Prokofiev Sonata in D Major was performed last, and presented the two musicians in good form. Rampal took many intriguing liberties in interpretation, and Veyron-Lacroix contributed an equal amount of fire to the piece. The second movement Scherzo took off at presto speed, and was perhaps a bit too violent and piano a bit overbearing for what Prokofiev intended. Nevertheless, the Andante movement was the prize of the concert — Rampal achieving perfect tone for this slow, lyrical movement. It was Rampal/Veyron-Lacroix at their best. The encore showpieces of Albeniz, Ravel, and Ibert gave further evidence of their outstanding place in twentieth century music-making. It's unfortunate that Tuesday's concert did not completely live up to this reputation.

Jean-Pierre Rampal — "...indeed a showman."

Robert Veyron-Lacroix — "...functioned more as an accompanist."

Burlington Winterfest Hosts Drunkmaster Competition

"...a chance to catch a good buzz at a variety of places for little more than the expense of a hangover the next morning."

By Russell Flannery

Winter Carnival!!! ... Beer, bongs, snow, sex... Good times, right? Not necessarily so, proved Burlington last Saturday during a "Not Too Happy Hour" that capped off the Winter Carnival Bartender's Contest. The contest, a friendly rivalry between downtown pubs to determine which establishment offers the "best" drink, gave area drinkers a chance to catch a good buzz at a variety of places for little more than the expense of a hangover the next morning. Judging from the turnout, however, there must have been an epidemic of lock jaw and a sclerosis panic on the UVM campus. The bars I visited were slightly better than deserted. Why? Initially, I didn't seem to know. After partaking of four contest entries, I didn't seem to care. I had succumbed to apathy.

The official judges' tally sheets showed McCepp's, a virtual unknown to most college students, stalking away with first prize. Fisherman's Pier 149 entered a French champaign drink and The Ice House served a "Banana Split," both tied for second place. A cider drink concocted by What Ale's You finished fourth.

This judge, not one for lists, in addition to not being able to keep one in a straight line at this writing, hereby presents an award to all, and a few good recipes to try.

| ¾ shot | amaoretta |
| ½ shot | rum |
| ½ shot | Chartreuse |

Add 1½ ounces of cream, three drops of food coloring, and blend until fairly thick. Top with whipped cream and almonds.

The Results

(Award given, title of the entry, home of the entry, and an occasional comment.)

The Winner: Eustis P. Biswanger (McCepp's)

"Wait Until Next Year": Hot Cider (Carbur's)

"Most Picturesque": Bird Turd (Hawk's Point) Seeing is believing.

"Best Excuses": Hunt's (For Silver Queen) At least it looked silver.

"Original, Like Hell": Banana Split (Ice House) The judges have obviously never been to a bar in Killington.

"Never on a Friday Afternoon": Reverand's Downfall (The Office) Not recommended for those who usually pass out between Happy Hour and nine p.m.

"Friendliest Waitress," at the Radisson (for the Avalanche) The drink wasn't too bad, either.

"Recommended by the Photographer": Lee J. Sombrero (Stuffed Shirt)

"Most Nostalgic": Polar Mist (Tiffany Pub) I could have sworn I had one of these at a Davis 4th cocktail party last year.

"Second Place": Three Below (What Ales You) A good hot cider drink, complete with cinnamon stick.

Spaced Out: Finbar's, Hannibul's.

Ran Out: Pier 149.

RECENT CUTS

Thad's The Way To Do It

By Tom Nuccio

With the dawn of the seventies, big band jazz has virtually become extinct. Indeed, this most tremendous musical force of the fifties has succumbed to the desires of a young and progressively oriented audience. The demise of such greats as Cab Calloway, Eddie Heywood, and Count Basie can be attributed to this haunting fact. Their music just did not conform to contemporary standards. Despite this fact, one prominent big band has managed to survive and experience tremendous success.

The Thad Jones–Mel Lewis band, formed in 1965, has utilized a musically happy medium to forge ahead. Their music formed one very important element – the essential link between standard big band and progressive ensemble formats – a delightful mixture of both former and contemporary jazz styles. This unique characteristic is shown at its best on their latest album, Live in Munich.

The Jones/Lewis aggregate, established in 1965, consists of the finest New York studio musicians. These talented sidemen don't possess names familiar to the modern jazz audience. Nevertheless, they are extremely talented instrumentalists who together form one of the most capable jazz groups today.

The co-leaders of this band certainly deserve some recognition. Trumpeter Dr. Thad Jones (PhD in Music from Rutgers University in 1977) is not only a talented brass player, but also one of today's premier arrangers. His superbly controlled and ingenious mixing of flutes, reeds and muted brass highlights many of the band's charts. He is the impetus, the igniting factor that maintains this band's high rating. His trumpet, flugelhorn, and coronet playing also makes a tremendous impression on the group's sound. The mellow timbre of Thad's flugelhorn floating above a background of muted trumpets, trombones and reeds adds a certain distinctness to the band's music.

Co-leader and drummer Mel Lewis supplies the rhythmical pulse which sustains the flow of each chart. While not one of the most technically elite percussionists, his playing nevertheless is a creative force that provides the necessary background. On any given piece Lewis might begin by playing a steady tempo, then suddenly switch to off-beat accentuations without upsetting the musical flow.

Live in Munich exhibits these creative tendencies of the Jones/Lewis group. The band shines throughout the album by constantly alternating between big band and progressive styles. "Morning Reverend," a Thad Jones composition, begins with Basie-like brass and reed counterpoint and then breaks off into a free-wheeling tenor solo by Gregory Herbert. At this point, one could never believe that he was listening to a big band album. This group disregards all previous confinements and opens up with unconventional free form soloing.

The other Jones composition, "Central Park North," is literally seven songs in one. It begins by stating a steady four beat jazz theme, then hideously shifts to a heavy driving jazz-rock segment. The rhythm section smokes behind the punchy brasses and reeds. From this portion it transcends to an unaccompanied coronet improvisation followed by a Latin-flavored trumpet solo and then into a Jerry Dodgion soprano flight. The sixth portion features a Mel Lewis percussive effort in a question and answer sequence between his drums and cowbells. Finally, the band reverts to the original theme – exactly where it started. This is by far the best chart of the set.

However, these are the only two Jones compositions on the entire album. This appears to be a tremendous oversight as few of the remaining selections can equal the quality of these two. The band's rendition of Duke Ellington's "Come Sunday" would even put the immortal Duke off into dream world. This band shines when playing original charts, and glows when regurgitating others' material. This seems to be the only flaw in an otherwise masterful album.

Thad Jones and Mel Lewis are living evidence that despite contemporary standards, a big band can still reign supreme. They have won the Downbeat magazine big jazz band award two years in a row. The Big Band Era may have passed, but the Jones–Lewis clique appears to be alive and well by constantly setting new directions in modern jazz.

The Best of Both Worlds

By Vaune Davis

Sonny Rollins: *Easy Living

The saxaphone is so easily abused. In the hands of those well-practiced in mediocrity, it emits sounds not unlike the mating call of the Canada goose. When played by one who understands its potential, however, the saxaphone is one of the most expressive and fascinating instruments. Sonny Rollins falls into this latter category and his latest album Easy Living is proof of his mastery of the instrument.

Rollins first started playing during the bop and post-bop eras and, even in the market today, glutted with electric perversions of swing tunes and synthesized funk, his music still reflects the freedom and imagination of the period. Nevertheless, Rollins has been experimenting with modern jazz and electric instruments since his album The Bridge, cut soon after his emergence from retirement in 1961. Once asked why he was doing this, Rollins said, "I want guys that are fresh, that have the energy, the desire. It turns out that a lot of these guys are playing electric instruments."

Easy Living is a perfect example of a skillful hybrid of bop and modern jazz. Unlike most progressive jazz musicians, Rollins employs sound engineering tastefully. On the tune "Down the Line," he can be heard playing two instruments, in unison, at both the beginning and the end of the selection. The middle, however, is open to wild soloing. Rollins succeeds because he knows where pure music suffices.

On "Down the Line" and "Hear What I'm Saying," Rollins plays some incredibly fast licks. This in itself is not particularly impressive, as anyone who blows a horn two or three hours a day can sound like a machine gun. It's his use of grace notes and various subtleties that set him apart from a mere technician. Nevertheless, Rollins can play slowly and with emotion. On "My One and Only Love," his solo sounds smooth and silky, as though he should filter through a dark, smoke filled room and entrance even the most musically uninclined listener.

But Easy Living does not succeed on Rollins' talent alone. George Duke (keyboards) remains in the background most of the time, supporting Rollins' solos harmonically. Occasionally though, he escapes from this function and takes off on some wild improvisations. Paul Jackson's bass is firm yet striking in its ingenuity. Tony Williams (drums) and Charles Icarus Johnson (guitar) compliment each other, rarely intruding on each other's rhythm and Williams' solo on "Easy Living" sounds like the melody itself.

The only objectionable thing about the album was the obnoxious rendition of Stevie Wonder's tune "Isn't She Lovely." Caught in the confines of rigid 4/4 time and playing with only a semblance of swing, the quintet embarked on only the vaguest melodic tangents. One can't help but suspect that the tune was recorded only to catch borderline jazz/pop customers.

Despite this one fault, Easy Living is a good indication of Rollins' extraordinary talent. Combining the best elements of both bop and modern jazz, this record is the product of a well-matched quintet, not afraid to explore the realms of jazz, and with taste.

When an author of the stature of Fredrick Pohl says that his new novel Gateway (Del Rey Books, 313 pp., $1.95) is the best thing he has ever written, it deserves careful attention. Pohl has been a leading writer for a long time and was famous in the fifties and sixties for his satirical fiction based on exaggerating one facet of business or economics. (In case you weren't aware of it, the collaboration of Pohl and Cyril Kornbluth was probably the finest in SF history.)

Pohl's writing has changed radically since 1970, and he has been outstanding in short fiction. Gateway, like his last novel Man Plus (which won the nebula award in 1977 as best novel of the year) is an excellent book and contains some of his best writing. It's a sequel to his 1972 novella "The Merchants of Venus" although the characters and location have changed. Suppose in humanity's meanderings about the solar system, we find an alien space station — Gateway — an artificial planetoid equipped with functioning star ships which crews can fly to anywhere in the galaxy, or even out of it. It is a daydreamer's supreme fantasy and any desperate, don't-give-a-damn gambler's chance to get the good life. If a ship's crew finds something of value they can get a reward and royalties for the rest of their lives. If they fail, they might be dead or damned for eternity. You see, humanity has not figured out fully how the alien ships operate; that is, where a ship might go and whether it has enough fuel to get there and back again.

To become a crewman on these ships takes nerves of steel and being mere human beings, the crewmen and characters of Pohl's novel are subject to a good deal of personal and psychological hardships within themselves and in their dealing with each other. They are cripples in one way or another, and this really isn't a surprise in a Pohl story. He has long been a writer who emphasized his character's hangups and how their dealings with each other are effected by those problems. Sometimes this preoccupation has seriously hurt Pohl's work, but in Gateway it is enormously successful.

The central character is Robinette ("Bob, Rob, Robbie") Broadhead, who tells of his climb from the shale mines of Wyoming to the penthouses of New York. It was a journey full of danger, fear, pain, the deaths of people he knew and loved, and guilt over his survival. Now Rob, a middle-aged man with ulcers and crying spasms, recounts the story of his life to the reader and to his analyst, Sigfrid von Shrink, a computer. While the idea of Gateway is enthralling, even more fascinating are the scenes between Robbie and Sigfrid. Without any of the dullness that psychological plots can have, Pohl shows the reader all the struggles for power, the devious games of deception and evasion, and the slow, not always successful, revelation of personality that goes on in analysis.

My only major objection is that the book is much too short for the way that it is constructed. It's told as a series of flashbacks and the every-other-chapter format makes the book seem choppy. Still, my complaint that this book is too short is a compliment to the author.

Lesser Known Works By Well Known Playwrights

By Jay F. Collier

The City Company, one of Burlington's resident theatre troupes, will present "An Evening of Lesser Known Works by Well Known Playwrights" tomorrow, Saturday and Sunday in Mann Hall auditorium at Trinity College.

The three one-act plays are part of The City Company's season at Trinity College which began with Cat On a Hot Tin Roof last fall. The Company is a non-profit community organization which operates on the volunteered time of area theatre enthusiasts.

Each of the works to be performed this weekend deals with the interactions between men and women, in different situations and with different conflicts. George Bernard Shaw's "Village Wooing" features David Poirier as a tour guide writer and Anne Curry as the talkative young woman whom he meets on a pleasure cruise. The three scenes trace the growth of their relationship, and the play is directed and interpreted by the cast.

After intermission, "This Property is Condemned" by Tennessee Williams, directed by James Sackett, presents Gideon Zahler and Lauren Singer as two teenagers from a Mississippi town who meet by the railroad tracks and ponder their lives and hopes for the future. In the third play, Elizabeth Bernstein stars as Bertolt Brecht's "Jewish Wife" and David Boedy portrays her husband. Set in the mid-1930's in Germany, the wife is pressured by the Nazi regime to leave the country where she had grown up.

Each evening of "Lesser Known Works by Well Known Playwrights" will be performed at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at Bailey's on Church Street and at the door.

The Unsettling of America

By Timothy Travers

The Unsettling of America by Wendell Berry is the work of an angry poet lashing out at the megamachine of Government–Agribusiness. Mr. Berry's book is full of quiet and thoughtfully rendered rage, that for even those of us who did not grow up on farms, comes across clearly.

He deals with conditions as they existed and do exist in American agriculture, where the triumph of technology seems to be effectively freeing 95% of the US population from the production of food. Perhaps, as Berry suggests, the real banner of American agribusinesses is not freedom and efficiency but greed, and the real horror is the absence of all human concerns in the vacuum greed creates.

The Unsettling of America is a community of ideas in an ecological sense. Good health is the undercurrent goal of every natural community, and it is achieved, as ecologists know, through a diversity of interrelationships. Berry wraps and weaves, in a vehemently lyrical prose style, the story of a human community, American culture, that has become so spiritually and physically weakened by the divisions of labor and love, man and land, neighbor, home, and self, that the prospects of good health are in serious question. It is a book that rides on experience and conviction, and so refreshingly need not depend so heavily on the statistics that validate other books.

Vermont is an anachronism of sorts, but not an exception to the paradigms of land abandonment and dependence on large agribusinesses. Traveling out Route 7, or, more noticeably, in towards the mountains one sees the same picture of neglect and ruin that Mr. Berry portrays of his home country in Kentucky. Why is the countryside so hauntingly beautiful in Vermont? Why so reticent? The small communities that still flourish, though few and far between, once dotted the hollows and hillocks of the rolling landscape here, and were all joined, by common bonds, to the land in health. And health is, "Not merely hygenic, but the health of wholeness, finally holiness of creation, of which our personal health is only a share." Wendell Berry's book is an effective preliminary step towards a necessary and modern resettling.

Renaissance Symposium Reveals Startling Black Culture

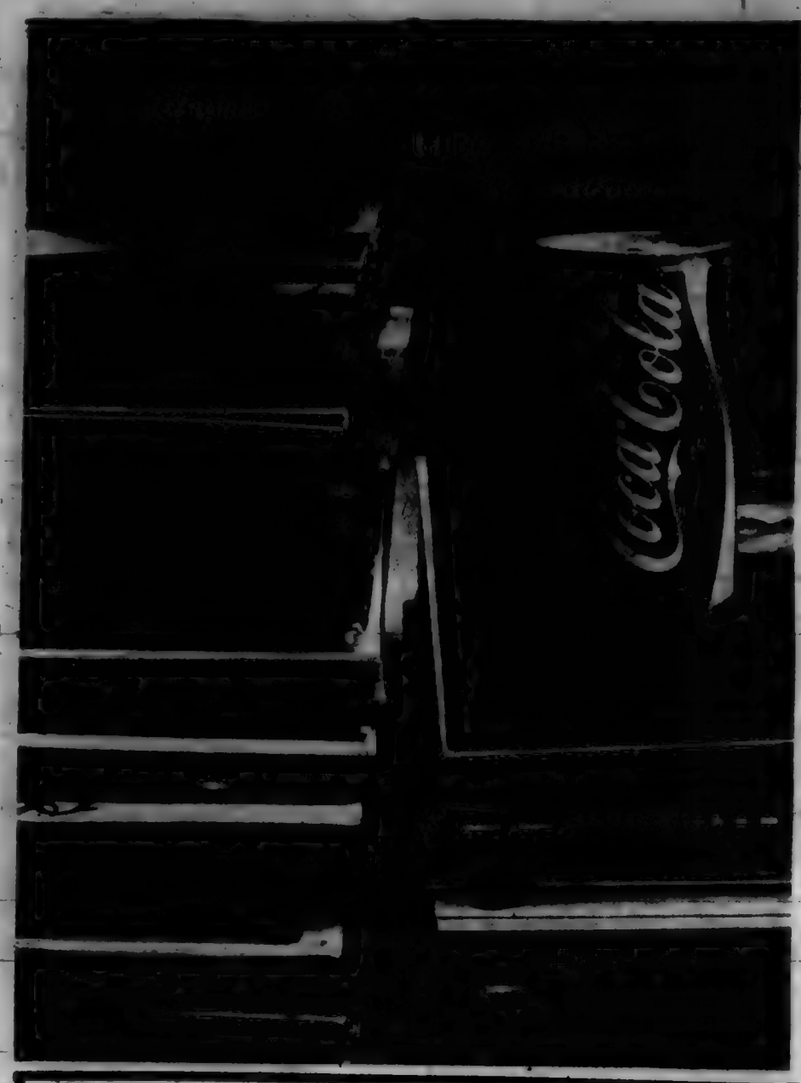
By Hugh Bush

Because of Professor Jennifer Cover's organization and direction of "No Mo' Jim Crow," performed at the Royall Tyler Theatre last semester, many students now have a greater awareness of the Harlem Renaissance.

"No Mo' Jim Crow" was a play, or more accurately, a collection of literature and drama performed by the Harlem Renaissance. Planned by Professor Cover as an introduction to the Harlem Renaissance symposium, "No Mo' Jim Crow" was merely the beginning to a series of seminars taking place throughout the spring semester. Noteworthy speakers such as Lerone Bennett, editor of Ebony magazine, Pulitzer Prize winner Gwendolyn Brooks, and performers Ossi Davis and Ruby Dee, who acted in Purlie Victorius and A Raisin in the Sun will be featured.

The Harlem Renaissance is a flowering of Black Culture that took place in Harlem, New York between 1910 and 1930. In the early 1900's, blacks moved to Northern cities from all parts of the country and Harlem became a melting pot of blacks from different locations and backgrounds. New York, like most large cities, contained the kindling that could fuel the fire of the growing black culture. Blacks developed music, literature, and performing art that were distinctive in style and superb in quality.

Jennifer Cover, director of the Harlem Renaissance Symposium



Ms. Cover feels that Harlem today still has cultural potential. Places such as The Cotton Club display performers and are characteristic of Harlem's artistic promise. Harlem, however, is not the focal point it once was as black culture has spread throughout New York as well as other cities.

The Harlem Renaissance symposium is comprised of twenty-five UVM students who are studying this era. The students are attending all the seminars and each will present their research towards the end of the semester. These presentations will take place on April 17 and will be free and open to the public.

Last March, Professor Cover decided to organize a play and symposium that would showcase black artists. After presenting her ideas, Cover obtained a grant from the Instructional Development Center and, in May of last year, she began contacting performers to participate in the program. Although she has not yet decided which jazz musician will perform, Cover has had no difficulty getting the artists to come to Vermont. M. Cover said, "People like to come to Vermont. It is off the beaten path and they are always charmed by the enthusiasm and reception."

Three events of the symposium have already taken place and Ms. Cover has been pleased with both the attendance, and the audience feedback. Most of the shows are on Mondays at 7:00 p.m. in the Royall Tyler Theatre and are free unless otherwise specified. Schedules are available at the Royall Tyler Theatre and various places around campus.

ELP

not music. It's not even sexy.

Most of ELP's concert consisted of short interludes that featured a single performer. Either Lake would sing and strum a guitar, Emerson would play with his electronics, or Palmer would pound on anything he found in front of him. "Take a Pebble" was the only collaboration that really clicked, while a rendition of a piece from "The Nutcracker Suite" was perhaps the low point of the show. Emerson tried to blend in some blues and jazz movements, but he spoiled them by relying on an array of spacy, synthesized nonsense that could never seem to find itself a melody. Palmer sounded more punk than progressive, and Lake's voice was out-blasted and never really became a vital element.

This piece was also hideously accompanied by a light show that was actually painful, as well as a few explosions that had about as much value as Cher would have had for the Allman Brothers Band.

ELP's first set concluded with more explosions and a light that flashed around Palmer's two gongs. The effect was similar to that of an enormous silver fishing spoon being dragged across a dark body of water.

The encore was highlighted by the song "Show me the way to go Home," a nice bar room blues song on which Emerson performed admirably. He toyed playfully with the keys on his piano, the instrument on which he seems most at home. The song was nicely put together, and there were no special effects. It showed that when ELP plays seriously they can be a very solid and versatile band.

But just when it seemed that the performance would end on a promising note, a terrifying pair of explosions were set off near the top of the stage, as if to remind the audience that they had witnessed more than a music show. It was a grossly unnecessary tactic that had this writer's ears ringing all the way across the Grand Isle Ferry.

Emerson Lake and Palmer pride themselves on being entertainers as well as musicians. But it seems that their entertainment should be re-evaluated. Their style of music, usually labeled as "art rock," has often been associated with theatrics and special stage performances, but ELP's theatrics require electricity more than they require talent. There are some theatrical art-rockers, like Peter Gabriel (formerly of Genesis) and Ian Anderson of Jethro Tull, that can be appreciated because of their grace and agility. Keith Emerson may be dynamic, but one doesn't notice it unless he's dodging the flying remnants of an exploding synthesizer or strapped to a revolving piano.

There is no arguing the fact that Emerson, Lake and Palmer are three very accomplished musicians. It's a pity, however, that they feel compelled to live up to the reputation of art rock with an act that is neither art nor rock. It's progressive trash that disguises the high quality music that ELP is truly capable of playing.

SILENCE IS DEADLY.

When someone drinks too much and then drives, it's the silence that kills. Your silence.

It kills your friends, your relatives, and people you don't even know. But they're all people you could save.

If you knew what to say, maybe you'd be less quiet. Maybe fewer people would die.

What you should say is, "I'll drive you home." Or, "Let me call a cab." Or, "Sleep on my couch tonight."

Don't hesitate because your friend may have been drinking only beer. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't think that black coffee will make him sober. Black coffee never made anyone sober. Maybe it would keep him awake long enough to have an accident. But that's about all.

The best way to prevent a drunk from becoming a dead drunk is to stop him from driving.

Speak up. Don't let silence be the last sound he hears.

Falk Says Vietnam Upset U.S. "Imperialism"

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

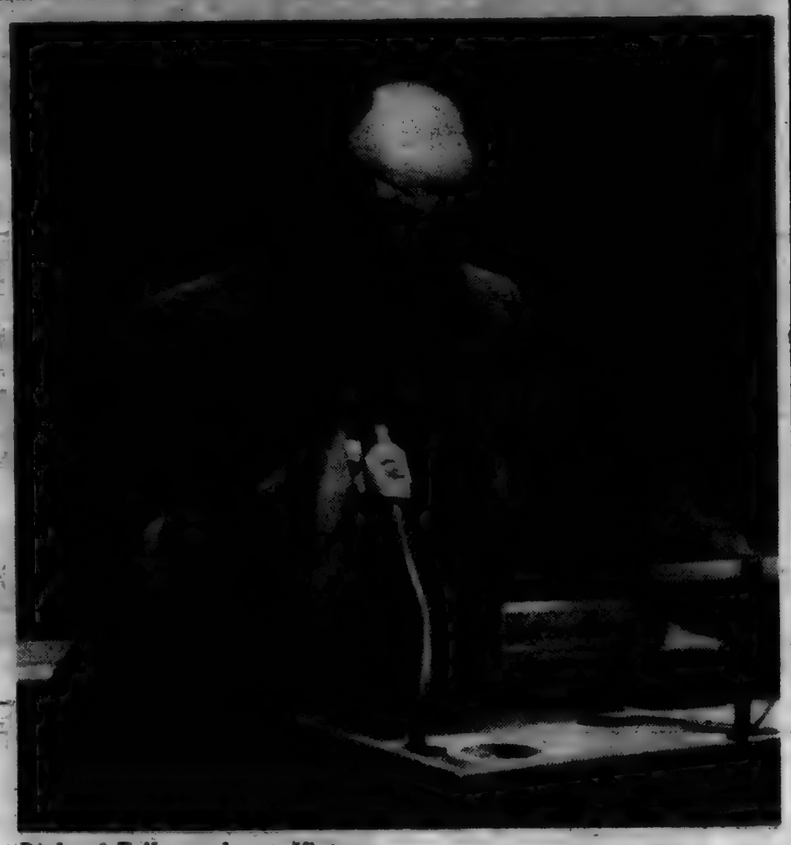
As soon as the Vietnam War was perceived to have an imperial component by the American public, substantial portions of the U.S. population became "isolated" from the U.S. government creating a "sharp division" in American society, Richard Falk, Princeton University international law professor, said Tuesday night.

Falk spoke to about 150 students and faculty at the University of Vermont on "Images of International Order and the Vietnam War" as part of the Vermont Seminars Program.

Although Vietnam "has upset the strategy of U.S. imperialism," the war's outcome has not altered the United States' "strength or determination to maintain its position in the Third World," Falk said.

"What was involved here was nothing less than to make the world safe for multinational corporations," he added. Falk talked of a "polarized" attitude between pro-war and anti-war factions that would surface if the United States should ever again become involved in such a conflict as Vietnam. He said this attitude would put a "much greater strain" on a "democratic institution" such as the United States and would "much more polarize the American politic."

In order to prevent a split which would be detrimental to a future war's progress, Falk said the American military should be left to fight on its own with media censorship as to what official policies are so as to not generate opposition here at home.



Falk is Albert Milbank professor of international law at Princeton University and acting director of the Center for International Studies at Princeton.

He has been vice president of the American Society of International Law, is a senior fellow at the Institute for World Order in New York City and a member of the advisory board of the American branch of Amnesty International.

Falk called the memory of Vietnam "a collective bad dream that recurs and may re-enter at some future time."

He said the United States misunderstood the essential nature of what the war was really about – that U.S. leaders thought of Vietnam as a war of aggression rather than as a civil war or a war for national unification. He explained this "notion of containment," such as had been evident in the Korean War, was misapplied to the Vietnam reality He said U.S. leaders presupposed that North Vietnam was a puppet of the Soviet Union, when in actuality North Vietnam went to great lengths to protect its independence from China and the USSR.

Falk also asserted that the United States went to great lengths to protect its "credibility" by not pulling out of the war after the 1968 Tet offensive. He said if our forces withdrew, "Our credibility as an ally, as a nuclear adversary, would be undermined." He talked of a "great obsession" on the part of the United States to be "dependable."

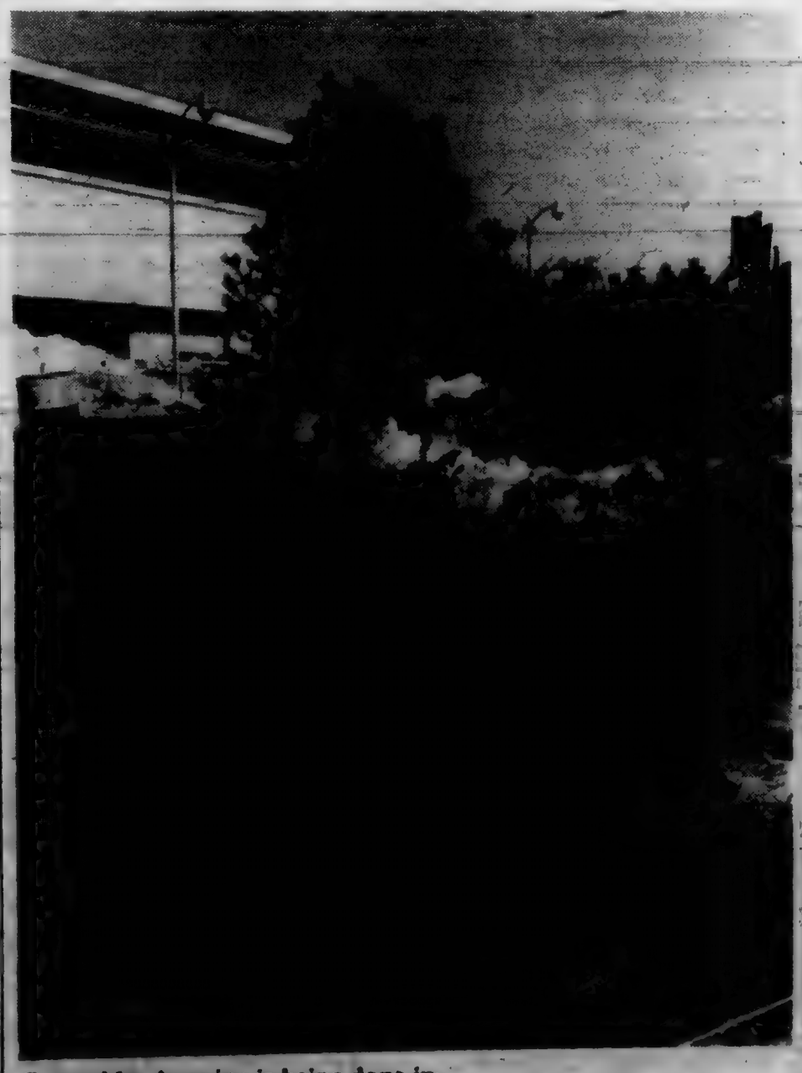
Because of this "incredible notion of credibility" which the United States felt it had to maintain, there were seven "years of realization" after Tet when the United States could have ended the conflict by a compromise.



He said the cost of disguising the reality that the United States was losing the war made it difficult to acknowledge that the war was "indeed lost."

In a legalist frame of reference, Falk said there was no debate over whether or not the bombing of North Vietnam was

Library Prepares To Add New Wing

Construction will begin this Spring, with a tentative completion date of Fall, 1979.

General landscaping is being done in preparation for the library expansion. Photo by Bob Gale

By Russell F. Flannery

The Guy W. Bailey library, originally constructed in 1961, was designed to accommodate a student enrollment of under 5,000. Given the two-fold increase of the student body and a three-fold increase in the number of volumes, most agree that the facility is inadequate. Accordingly, the 1977 Vermont legislature and the UVM Board of Trustees endorsed an addition to the existing structure. Minor alternations are now in progress until major construction can begin later this spring.

Although library officials have begun planning specific programs, a contract for the actual construction remains unsigned. Interested contractors must submit their bids by the March 2 deadline, and the Board of Trustees is expected to award the project at their March 4 meeting. Formal ground breaking ceremonies are tentatively scheduled for early April, with the second and third floors of the addition ready for use in April, 1979.

The addition, nearly 75% of the size of the original library, will extend in a "sort of dog like direction towards the bookstore, attached at the west end of the building," according to Paul Kebabian, Bailey library Director. In physical relation to on-campus walkways, the new main entrance will directly face the major route between the tunnel and Cook Sciences Building.

Increased seating availability in a variety of styles will be a major improvement in the expanded facility. "It will provide approximately twice the number of seats for students so there won't be such a crowded situation at the end of the semester – when crowding is pretty bad," Kebabian said. "Soft" lounge furniture will finally be purchased, in addition to a number of individual study stations.

A corresponding expansion of library services is also forthcoming. In one section, an "in house" audio/video department will provide a group study area for six people, along with roughly twenty carrels (booths) and a projection room with a seating capacity of twenty-five. Kebabian stipulated that "equipment used would be the kind of material that will support the course curricular study material that might be assigned by (a) faculty member... rather than... the material the (UVM) media center would have for classroom use." Development of an advanced research area is also under consideration. These "research study clusters" will accommodate faculty, graduate level students, and occasional undergraduate research projects. This will occur in an area of fifty carrels, equipped with locker space for material storage.

Concerning specific plans for utilization of the total expanded area, Kebabian commented, "...with the new space, we'll be able to distribute the seating better so that there won't be concentration of noise like you get on the second and third floors, where the seating is often jammed together..." Other plans include relocation of the traditional "tomb" (the all night study) to the second floor of the original building, construction of a circulation desk on the first floor of the addition, and the transferral of the main collection of books to the second and third floors of the addition.

Financially, about 75% of the funding for the $4 million project has been secured. The 1977 Vermont legislature approved $1 million for the project, and $2 million is being gradually withdrawn from the library fee – a yearly $30 fee assessed to all full-time UVM students. Failure by the UVM administration to raise the final $1 million through private funding, however, creates the

Decriminalization of Pot Anticipated

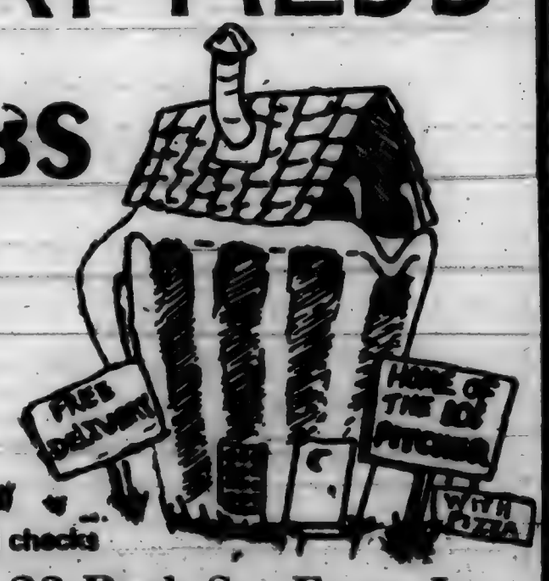
By John Letteri

The Vermont Legislature is now considering a bill to decriminalize the possession of small amounts of marijuana. The proposed measure won unanimous endorsement of the House Health and Welfare Committee and will come before the full House for debate this week.

Randall Niquette (D–Winooski), one of the four co-sponsors of the bill, said the Health and Welfare Committee has a "pretty good" cross section of the Vermont House on it and "that says to me that all the factions of the House are ready to accept the bill and consider it reasonable."

Present law stipulates that persons convicted of possession of 1/2 ounce or more of marijuana, are subject to a maximum $3,000 fine, a three year jail term, and a felony record for possession. Persons convicted of possession of up to a half an ounce are subject to up to six months in jail and a $500 fine. Representative J. Daniel Mahoney, another co-sponsor of the new bill, said the current penalty "far outweighs" the crime of possession and the state is "wasting money" that could be spent strengthening the court system and law enforcement systems. The new bill's preamble states, "Every year thousands of lives are scarred and millions of dollars are wasted in law enforcement resources while detracting from the prosecution of serious crime." Defender General for the state of Vermont James Morse said his office would just as soon "not bother" defending small time users. Morse went on to say that judges now tend to ignore larger fines and generally fine people convicted of possessing small amounts of marijuana between $25 and $50.



The proposed bill would reduce the fine for possession of up to an ounce of marijuana from the present $500 to $100. In addition, possession of up to an ounce will not carry a jail term, nor will it be treated as a criminal offense. After deciding the case, no record would be kept of the conviction. Penalties for possession of more than an ounce would be not more than six months in jail and a $500 fine for the first offense. The second offense would carry a maximum $2000 fine and a two year jail sentence. Mahoney stressed the fact that possession and cultivation of marijuana will still remain illegal.

The bill carries amendments to retain stringent measures for other "THC deviates." At the request of the state police, the co-sponsors of the bill amended it to include a fine of $1000 and up to a year in jail for the conviction of possession of small amounts of hashish. The state police view hashish as a more potent drug, and the subject of considerably less study than marijuana.

Support and endorsement for the bill has come from a variety of authorities. Bill Cain of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), Chittenden County State's Attorney William H. Sorrell, and Director of the Police Chief's Association, Kenneth Libby. However, the highest ranking politician to endorse the bill contends it doesn't go far enough. Lt. Governor T. Garry Buckley feels the fine ought to be $5 instead of $100 for possession of less than an ounce of marijuana. Buckley said although he feels that a $100 fine is a little stiff, a $5 fine would cause police not to bother at all. This he concludes, would be the equivalent of legalizing marijuana and "we can't legalize it until the federal government does." Buckley went on to point out what he calls the "double standard" for alcohol and marijuana use in Vermont. He noted, "if the government didn't have a tax for those two items, there would be a lot more testimony on the damage they do, but because they produce revenue, people are willing to overlook that." Buckley predicts the bill will do well in the Senate after an expected House approval.

The current penalty "far outweighs" the crime of possesion and the state is "wasting money..."

The decriminalization bill has been attempted before. A committee including Sen. Patrick Leahy (D–Vt.) and Rep. James Jeffords (R–Vt.) drew up a decriminalization bill in 1973. However, after being introduced to the 1974 legislature, it never made it out of committee.

Deadline for S. A. Funding Approaches

By John Letteri

Each year clubs or organizations recognized by the Student Association and in need of money from the S.A. must submit budget request forms in order to be assured money for the following year. This year, the S.A. has $175,000 to be allocated among recognized clubs and organizations. According to S.A. Treasurer Larry Landry, the due date for submitting budget request forms is March 1 and only fourteen of the forty previously funded organizations have picked up request forms for next year.

After the requests are in, Landry will publicize budget hearings. "These hearings will probably be one or two afternoons a week and open to interested students," said Landry. During a budget hearing, a club or organization presents its justifications for the request of S.A. money. The S.A. Finance Committee and Landry then ask any questions they have about the club or organization's proposal.

In the second week of April, after all the budget hearings are held, a final budget is drawn up, including all necessary reductions. The budget, in complete form, goes before the S.A. General Assembly in late April. Here, student input is taken into account before the budget is finalized.

Burlington's Lakefront:
The End of an Eyesore ?

By Curtis Haynes

For years, Burlington's Lakefront has been a jumble of oil storage tanks, wayward rail lines, and derelict land. Take a walk out on the ice, turn around, and see for yourself.

But recently, a Waterfront Master Plan was drawn up to offer a vision of what the Lakefront could become. The Plan points out that the Lakefront has been cut off from the commercial and residential life of downtown Burlington, and says it's time this situation was corrected.

The city hopes someone will develop land between the Electrical Department's Moran Plant in the north and the 150 year-old Barge Canal in the south. After a zoning change in 1974, several Lakefront businesses found themselves in non-conforming uses and were required to move. The Lakefront clean-up, however, may be long in coming as the businesses have up to thirty years to re-locate. Moreover, the issue of compensation for these businesses has yet to be approached.

45% of the land in question is owned by the Canadian National Railroad and the Vermont Railroad; and the Canadian National has been negotiating leases with potential developers. Even so, whoever develops the Lakefront will have to meet Planning Commission specifications on height, landscaping, and architectural style. Development is planned to be divided into three areas: low-density residential sites would be grouped north of College Street; between College and Maple would be for commercial and office uses; and south of Maple Street would concentrate railroad and warehouse activities. Many shoreline possibilities have been mentioned including a marina and an elongated pier running far out into the lake.

The thrust for developing the Lakefront comes from the city's desire for property tax revenues. City officials have been wary of becoming involved in another urban renewal type scheme. The last one – encompassing Pearl to Main Streets between St. Paul's and Battery Streets – has taken 15 years and has yet to be completed. There is also concern about Lakefront development affects on the nearby King Street residential area. King Street is a low to moderate income neighborhood; if property values and rents rise sharply, many tenants may be forced out and homeowners tempted to sell.

The Waterfront Board has emphasized orderly development and the preservation of historic sites. Still, the fate of the Barge Canal is in doubt. The canal is used by oil barges which supply a considerable portion of local homeheating oil. In addition, Burlington's "Southern Connector" is proposed to pass through the canal area which supports some wildlife habitats.

Right now, it seems that no one is certain about what to do with the Lakefront, but the consensus is that change is inevitable and necessary. Just wait for your 25th reunion!

Citizens Criticize Burlington Electric's Energy Projects

By John Letteri

The Burlington Electric Department's plan for building an $80 million wood-burning generator and a $10 million dollar trash incinerator in the Intervale region, along with a $15 million dollar hydro-electric plant on the Winooski River, drew criticism from citizens of Burlington at a meeting at the Church Street Center Wednesday night. The meeting consisted of presentations by a number of experts followed by a group discussion period.

Burlington Electric's energy proposal will be considered by Burlington voters on March 7. Supporters include U.S. Senator Patrick Leahy (D–Vermont).

"do the residents of Manhattan drive realize that they would be on eye level with a 100 foot smokestack emitting 52 lbs. of particulate an hour?"
– Director of Solid Waste and Air Pollution

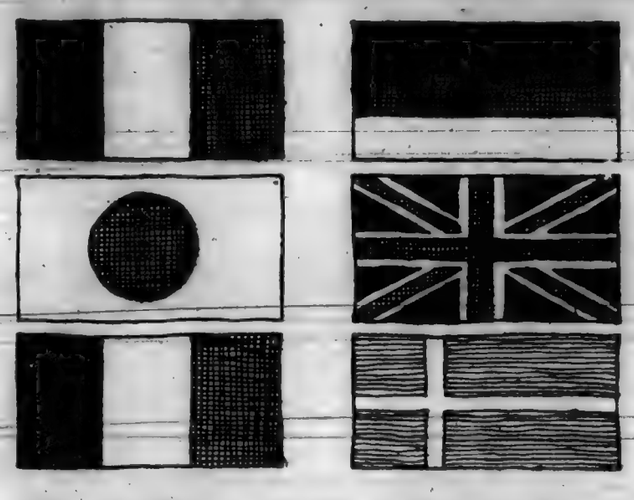
UVM Professor David Conrad viewed Burlington from a humanist perspective. The thrust of his presentation centered around a simpler, smaller Burlington with emphasis placed on human concerns. "Human needs should be at the center. Technology should be directed towards man's needs and shouldn't be an uncontrollable device," said Conrad. He raised questions that he contended "should be answered fully before we go ahead with these proposals. Do we really need the 60.6 megawatts of power that would be generated by the wood-burning and hydro-electric facilities? Won't this massive energy development foster equally massive development in the community of Burlington? Who will benefit from the surplus of power, the smaller consumer or the large corporations?" Professor Conrad concluded "are we not guilty here of what the great humanist Mumphord calls 'technological compulsiveness.' This 'must have' philosophy of new technological ideas? I believe we should be absolutely sure we want this 'energy park' before we go out and build it."

Mr. Edmund Norse, Administrative Assistant of the Burlington Electric Department, explained why the utility believes that Burlington needs the 'energy park.' "First of all," said Norse, "you have to look at what you have. The Moran generating plant (located at lakeside) was built in 1954. It's got a useful life of about thirty years. It's getting old and needs to be replaced." According to Norse "you have to stay up with growth. Presently, in terms of energy consumption, Burlington grows at an annual rate of 5% per year. Sure, it's easier to buy from outside sources, but these new plants will meet the growing electrical demand of Burlington and hold the line (increases of 8-10% per year) on rates." He further stated that burning wood "is a much cheaper way to produce electricity than oil or natural gas fired generators." Norse stressed that conservation efforts on the part of consumers would have to remain at the present level. "Burlington Electric will make conscious efforts at enforcing insulating standards for new homes with electric heat, and the use of demand control systems will be advocated."



Mr. Richard Valentennette, Director of Solid Waste and Air Pollution for the Department of Conservation in Vermont, contended that several aspects of the proposal lacked in "thoroughness of study and real feasibility." Attacking the $10 million trash incinerator study, Valentennette said he had "very serious reservations about the b.t.u. (heat measurement) and boiler efficiency values put forth in the study. The idea that this thing (trash incinerator) could save the city of Burlington $43 million over the next twenty years is preposterous." Concerning the proposed wood-burning facility, an $80 million venture, Valentennette said "the concept is a fine one, a step in the right direction.

S. A. Assembly Poorly Attended

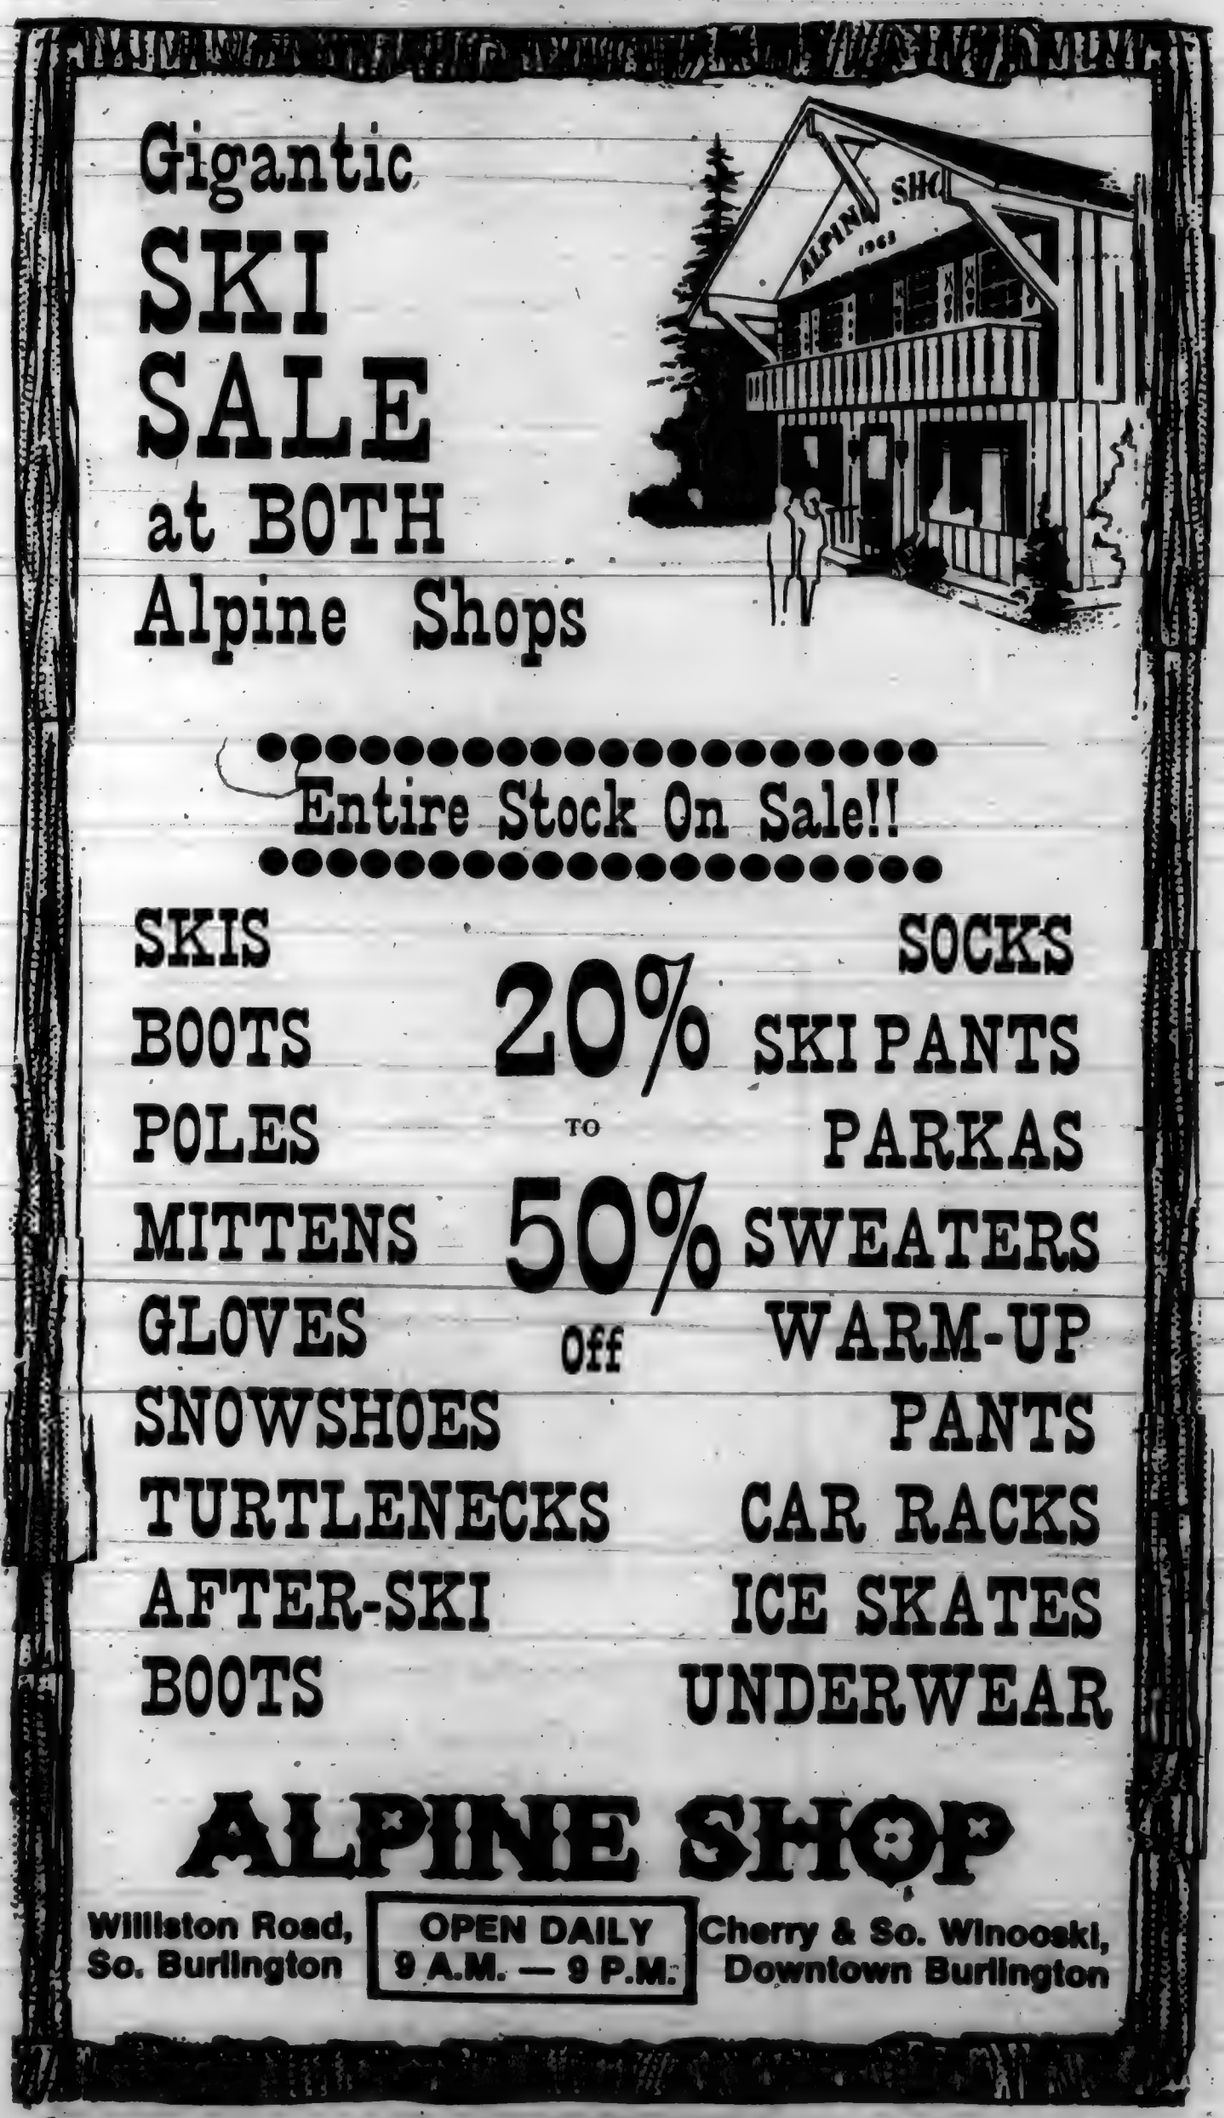
By Russell Flannery

A warning of upcoming budget request deadlines and the announcement of the Presidential election dates were the highlights of a basically ritualistic Student Association General Assembly meeting last Wednesday night at Wright Dining Hall. The sparse student attendence of the meeting illustrated the Student Association's problem of orientating the student body to its programs.

Lack of budget applications, an unusual situation for an organization with $175,000 to distribute, is currently a major concern at S.A. S.A. Treasurer Larry Landry has flatly stated that applications will not be accepted beyond the March 1 deadline, and he strongly urged all organizations who desire funding to meet the date.



Budget request hearings, a public justification of organizational expenditures, will be held throughout March. The final budget will be submitted for Assembly approval late this semester.

Senator John Martin announced the Presidential election dates will be Tuesday through Thursday, March 21, 22, and 23. Additional election related action by the Assembly included passage of a traditional series of election ground rules, and speeches by various S.A. officials urging any interested students to campaign for a position. Petitions are currently available at the S.A. office in upper Billings Center. While 400 signatures are required for Presidential candidates, only 200 are necessary to become a Vice Presidential candidate.

Other topics discussed were a revision of the current Add/Drop policy (see 2/9 Cynic), the Student Legal Service (see 2/16 Cynic), an alternative dorm proposal (see 10/6/77 Cynic), and Vice President Linda Purdy's proposed Student Grievance Process. Essentially, Purdy's proposal would standardize the diversity of grievance policies currently employed by the numerous colleges on campus. Purdy advised the Assembly of a future Cynic article upon completion of the project.

Most noteworthy, however, was the lack of student turnout at the Assembly. Of the roughly 60 students present, at least 60% were S.A. personnel. Vice President Purdy, who chaired the meeting for a hoarse President Liggett, commented after the meeting: "I'm disappointed in the turnout. I wish that more people would come to General Assemblies... I think we all feel that way because we had some information to disseminate to them that would have been helpful and interesting... If students don't come, I hope that Smitty (Communication Committee Chairman Rob Smith) can get some ideas from them. I've gotta get publicity out. We're trying."

No date was announced for the next General Assembly meeting.

Controversy Over Gay Rights Develops

By Rich Hyland

A wide spectrum of opinion addressing the controversial issue of gay rights was expressed last week at a luncheon sponsored by the Community Council of greater Burlington.

The meeting, held at the College Street Congregational Church, featured speakers who commented on the legal rights of homosexuals and the obstacles preventing passage of a gay rights law. Other speakers included admitted homosexuals who spoke of the discrimination and anguish they suffer as a result of their sexual preferences. Miss Gloria Daly, a lesbian health care worker, asserted that a gay rights law is necessary if society is to "recognize the value and worth of every human being."

According to Brian K. Burns, co-director of the Gay Student Union of UVM, "Gays are scared to death to talk about their problems." This, he said, was a result of fear of discrimination, and possible retaliation if legal aid was sought to combat it. The Gay Student Union was established four years ago and currently conducts "Gay Switchboard," a service which enables distressed gays to receive counseling and to meet other gays.

When child custody is being considered in the courts, homosexuality becomes "a real hot issue," said Sandy L. Baird, an attorney for Vermont Legal Aid. She noted that many divorce case judges are highly influenced by sexual preferences, and consequently, homosexuals are warned by their attorneys not to publicly proclaim their homosexuality. Gays are also often discriminated against concerning child visitation rights, she added.

"Gays are scared to death to talk about their problems."

— co-director of the Gay Student Union

Moderator Jim Barbour, professor of human development at UVM, recapped the discussion by delineating certain social fears which the panelists felt were preventing a codification of gay rights. Among these he stressed the influence of gays on children, risks in security (police force and armed services), as well as fear of moral decay in our society.

These fears were soon verbalized in an open discussion following Mr. Barbour's remarks. Comments from the audience ranged from lengthy quotations from the Bible to loud assertions of homosexuality as a current Communist goal in America. "We need to turn to the Lord for direction," stated one elderly woman. "It seems that an awful lot of sinning is going on." Some people grew disgusted and left when their efforts to voice an opinion were not recognized by the moderator, due to lack of time.

Experts and Officials Condemn Proposed Hydro Facility

By Dana Carman

Water resource experts and local town officials have entered the controversy concerning the Chase-Mills Electric project recently proposed by Burlington Electric Dept. They have expressed concern over the possible negative environmental effects of the ten megawatt facility. Burlington voters will consider the $15 million revenue bonding proposal for the plant on March 7. Burlington Electric Dept. has also proposed a $40 million wood burning generator plant, and a $15 million trash burning facility in the Intervale region. Both will be considered in the March 7 vote.

Peter Clavelle, city manager of Winooski, is concerned about the impact of the project on his city and feels that there are many questions that must be resolved before a dam is built. According to Clavelle, the city of Winooski is currently involved in a $7 million redevelopment project for the renovation and re-use of its old buildings. Chavelle's major concern is that normal flow levels must be maintained in order to guarantee commitments from potential investors. According to a preliminary investigation of the Chase Mills site by the engineering firm of Kleinschmidt and Dutting, normal flow levels would be below the state requirements almost 80 percent of the time. The dam would change the character of the lower Winooski to that of slow moving water and terraced ponds. In late January, Clavelle wrote John Berryman, the Chief Engineer of the Burlington Electric Department, expressing his concerns. In his reply Berryman agreed that the flow of the river would have to be altered. For city manager Clavelle this alteration is not acceptable.

The assistant town manager of Colchester, Francis Taginski has mixed feelings regarding the proposed hydro facility. Taginski believes that the dam is the most feasible of the three proposals but that there are major problems with it. One concern of his is that there have been no studies done regarding safety factors or noise levels that will be created by the hydro facility. He is also concerned with the possibility of crumbling rock banks and foundations along Colchester's stretch of the river.

The most important question Taginski raised is that of waste load allocation and water quality. What is the capacity of the lower Winooski to assimilate solid waste if the flow of the river is altered? Rich Czaplinski of the state Water Resources Department is concerned about the ability of the lower Winooski to assimilate waste if another dam is built. Czaplinski asserts that "without further study and investigation it would be dangerous and irresponsible to build another dam on the lower Winooski."

Czaplinski was a member of a Waste Load Allocation Task Force dealing with the Winooski, and due to his findings and those of the committee, he has come up with the following suggestions:

(1) Computer Model: Another waste allocation computer model must be made before anything is done which might affect the water level of the lower Winooski. A technical determination of the assimilation capacity of the river is necessary. The study in 1976 and the suggested waste load capacities were not done in much detail and were only estimates. Should action be taken now when the findings of the next computer model won't be done until after the referendum?

(2) Financial and Individual Support: In order to accurately make such an important decision, all resources (both financial and individual) should

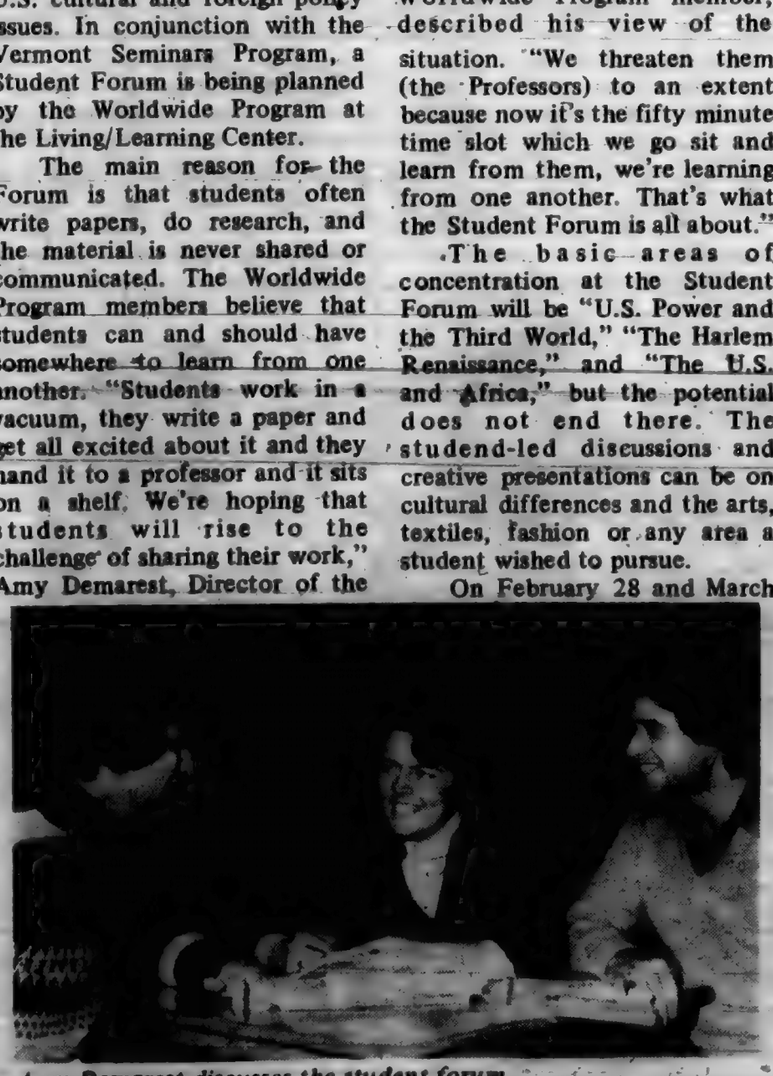
Student Forum Intended to Kill Campus Apathy

By Susan Heller

In an era when apathy and passivity prevail at college campuses, an attempt is being made to spark student interest in U.S. cultural and foreign policy issues. In conjunction with the Vermont Seminars Program, a Student Forum is being planned by the Worldwide Program at the Living/Learning Center.

The main reason for the Forum is that students often write papers, do research, and the material is never shared or communicated. The Worldwide Program members believe that students can and should have somewhere to learn from one another. "Students work in a vacuum, they write a paper and get all excited about it and they hand it to a professor and it sits on a shelf. We're hoping that students will rise to the challenge of sharing their work," Amy Demarest, Director of the Worldwide Program, explained.

There is a combination of optimism and cynicism among the faculty members about the Student Forum. Roger Cutler, a Worldwide Program member, described his view of the situation. "We threaten them (the Professors) to an extent because now it's the fifty minute time slot which we go sit and learn from them, we're learning from one another. That's what the Student Forum is all about."



The basic areas of concentration at the Student Forum will be "U.S. Power and the Third World," "The Harlem Renaissance," and "The U.S. and Africa," but the potential does not end there. The studend-led discussions and creative presentations can be on cultural differences and the arts, textiles, fashion or any area a student wished to pursue.

On February 28 and March 1 from 11:00 – 5:00 there will be a table in Billings for students to sign up to participate. The Worldwide members can discuss projects, put people with similar interests on panels and it will hopefully be a situation of students working with students successfully. "Next week we'll really see how powerful this thing will or will not be. The response we get in Billings will tell a lot," commented Tom Andrea, Communications Coordinator for Worldwide. For further information about the Student Forum, Worldwide members can be reached at x4260, x4263, and x4084.

There is no concrete reward for participating in the Student Forum, no grade, no credit – the reward is self-improvement and passing knowledge to fellow students. Ms. Demarest said, "The Student community has not shown itself to be particularly innovative." The Student Forum is an opportunity for students to prove to skeptics and to themselves that "...there's a lack of trust because it's never been done before," Susan Lunan of the Worldwide Program stated. There is tremendous potential for the two day forum which is now scheduled for April fourteenth and fifteenth. As Worldwide member Carol Englehor agreed, "You have to accept the idea first... it's taken us two months."

Tentatively planned for the evening is an International

Cyprus Gov't Blames Egypt For Recent Deaths

The Cyprus Government says Egypt is clearly to blame for the bloody Sunday on the Mediterranean Island. But Cypriot President Spyros Kyprianou is offering to talk about it with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. Kyprianou told a news conference he would do anything he can to restore friendly relations with Cairo. Those relations turned sour when Egyptian commandos staged a raid in defiance of Cypriot orders.

The leader of the Egyptian Commando team has offered an explanation for the incident. Nabil Shukry said in a Cairo interview Tuesday that he waited 90 minutes before attacking the terrorist held plane, and then attacked on the assumption there had been no progress toward release of the hostages aboard the plane.

The incident, involving two self-proclaimed Palestinian terrorists and their assassination of a prominent Egyptian newspaper editor, caused a breakdown of relations between Cyprus and Egypt. Fifteen Egyptian commandos died in the airport battle with Cypriot troops during which the terrorists released hostages they had held since the assassination one day earlier.

Torrijos Drug Link Examined

The Senate shielded with secrecy its deliberations on allegations that Panamanian leader Omar Torrijos and members of his family are linked with drug trafficking. Members of the public and the news media were cleared from the Senate chambers Tuesday morning.

The deliberations came during Senate debate on the Panama Canal treaties. The Senate considered a classified report on the drug-dealing claims and Majority leader Robert Byrd said Senate rules bar the release of such information.

Treaty opponent Senator Robert Dole, a Kansas Republican, said the information may effect how some senators vote on the proposed pact. He also said he will move to make the data available to the public. One issue that is not secret is that, in 1971, a Federal Grand Jury in New York handed down a sealed indictment saying Torrijos' brother Moises was involved in drug trafficking. Moises, who is ambassador to Spain, has not been arrested.

The head of a Senate Committee said the panel found nothing about allegations of drug trafficking involving Torrijos that would stand up in court. The comments came from Indiana Democrat Birch Bayh who chairs the Intelligence Committee. The panel reported that the data linking Torrijos and drugs is "largely second-hand and of varying reliability."

Agreement Reached In Coal Strike

Top coal industry executives met in Washington to study the tentative contract reached Monday by the United Mine Workers and an independent producer. Since the accord with the Pittsburgh and Midway Company was announced, the Administration has been hoping it will set a precedent for other contracts. After a White House meeting Tuesday, Energy Secretary Schlesinger said this hope is what has prevented the White House from taking stronger action. But the executives said the tentative settlement between striking miners and P&M is not good enough for the whole industry. The members of the Bituminous Coal Operators Association did say however that they are willing to resume contract talks in the 78 day old strike.

The proposed P&M pact would limit fines for wildcat strikes to leaders of the wildcatting. Other companies want fines for members also.

Moratorium On Liquified Gas?

The investigative arm of Congress contends that a moratorium should be imposed on building liquified natural gasing plants in urban areas. The Energy Director of the General Accounting Office said liquified gas plants might be prone to accidents and terrorist attacks. He testified before a House subcommittee hearing on regulating the plants.

Also testifying before the subcommittee, Assistant Energy Secretary Al Alm said the U.S. has no overall regulatory plan for LNG. He said an accident involving LNG could trigger a disaster but that the chance of such a disaster is small.

The chairman of the subcommittee, Michigan Democrat John Dingell, said an accident could spread a cloud of volatile gas over a wide area. He added that only a tiny electrical spark would be needed to set it off.

Oscar Nominations

Woody Allen scored a personal triumph on Tuesday when he was nominated for three Academy Awards. Allen's Annie Hall was among five pictures nominated for Best Film of 1977, and he was nominated for writing it, directing it and starring in it. Only Orson Welles, with Citizen Kane in 1941, was named in those three categories before. He won for writing the film.

Diane Keaton, Allen's co-star in Annie Hall, was nominated for Best Actress, along with Jane Fonda of Julia, Shirley MacLaine and Anne Bancroft of A Turning Point and Marsha Mason of The Goodbye Girl. Julia, the story of two American women caught in Nazi Germany, and The Turning Point, a reunion of two ballerinas, captured eleven nominations each in the 50th Oscars race, more than any other film. Besides them and Annie Hall, Best Picture nominations went to the biggest moneymaker of the year Star Wars, and to The Goodbye Girl.

Star Wars had ten nominations, and another science fiction film Close Encounters of the Third Kind, had eight.

With Allen in the Best Actor competition are Richard Burton for Equus, Richard Dreyfuss for The Goodbye Girl, Marcello Mastroianni for A Special Day and John Travolta for Saturday Night Fever.

Besides Allen, nominees for Best Director were Steven Spielberg for Close Encounters, Fred Zinnemann for Julia, George Lucas for Star Wars, and Herbert Ross for The Turning Point.

Among the usual curiosities in the nominations is Spielberg being nominated for Director while Close Encounters was not among the Best Picture nominees. Diane Keaton was cited for a comedy instead of the highly dramatic Looking for Mr. Goodbar.

The winners will be announced April 3rd amid a gala celebration marking Oscar's first 50 years.

Congressional Leaders Back Carter

Congressional leaders who breakfasted with Carter Tuesday said they will support whatever action he chooses to end the strike. After the session, Senate Democratic Whip Alan Cranston of California said support from both parties was strong.

Carter would need congressional approval for two plans: binding arbitration or a seizure of the mines to restart coal production. Carter has not yet announced what he intends to do.

Smith Proposal Angers Blacks

Prime Minister Ian D. Smith has proposed that he remain as head of the transitional government that will pave the way for black rule, and that posts in the administration be divided equally between whites and blacks.

The disagreement has produced heated exchanges between the two sides. The black representatives were said to have questioned Mr. Smith's sincerity in agreeing to majority rule, with the Prime Minister responding that whites must be "cushioned" against too abrupt a shift from white to black rule.

Supreme Court Refuses To Help Manufacturer

J.P. Stevens and Company failed Tuesday to gain Supreme Court help in its attempt to get out from under a court order that it cooperate, under threat of heavy fines, with union organizers in all its plants in North and South Carolina.

The nation's highest court let stand an order directing the huge textile manufacturer to give outside union organizers access to all parking lots, canteens and other non-work areas within each of its plants in the two states.

The order, issued last October by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, threatens to impose "compliance fines" against the company of $100,000 for each violation and $5,000 each day the violation continues.

The case is the latest in a long line, which includes 18 separate legal controversies, to arise since 1967 over the company's resistance to unions at its plants.

The company has plants in several states, including 65 in North Carolina and South Carolina, and employs some 45,000 persons.

For the last 15 years, it has battled attempts by the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union to bring union representation to various J.P.Stevens plants.

Vive Le Francais!

By Henry Chamberlain

It is difficult for Americans to perceive exactly what is happening in the province of Quebec. Two opposing political forces, those of Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Rene Leveque, are in a struggle over the possible independence of Quebec. After years of in-fighting, the French-speaking citizens, who are concentrated in the province of Quebec, are attempting to either become independent or become dominant over their English counterparts. The movement includes the exclusion of American "cultural imperialism."

A part of the problem can be seen as one drives north over the Canadian border on their way to Montreal from Burlington. The land levels off to produce a vast flat area of farms. These are not the lucrative farm co-operatives you see in the Great Plains. To the contrary, these are comprised of hard-working farmers who are out to make ends meet, make a living. Predominantly, these people parle le francais et pas l'anglais. This is not an unusual occurrence, many of the French-Canadian people are not wealthy. Most of the money in Canada is controlled by the English speaking. Thus, the grand city of Montreal, which is the economic center of Canada, is under the control of the English speaking Canadians.

This control by the English speaking began with the British victory at the Battle of Quebec in 1759. At that time, the efforts of the French to establish themselves as a colonial force in North America were thwarted. However, the culture and the language which the French had erected in Quebec remained intact. This French culture is there today, represented by over three million French-Canadians.

Why the friction that is present today? The answer can best be expressed in two parts. The first is the problem over language. For most of the period since the English established control over Canada, English has been the official language of the country, pas le francais. The French citizens of Canada were expected to learn English. However, the English were not expected to learn le francais. Thus you get a situation where one segment of the population has got to conform to the other to be incorporated into their own country.

Recently, the issue of language came to a boil in Canada. The people of Quebec reached a point where they were tired of the one-way relationship concerning language. This animosity despite the efforts of the liberal Prime Minister Trudeau, who has attempted to create a bilingual nation through legislation. Exit signs have the word sortie written on them as well, for example. However, Mr. Trudeau's efforts have not been enough to quell the passions of the French-Canadians.

To show their displeasure they elected a man, Rene Leveque, to lead the parliament in Quebec. His party, the Quebecois, is for the domination of the province par les Francais. If that entails the departure of some of the English speaking then so be it. The Quebecois' are tired of feeling as if they are foreigners in their own country. When a resident of Montreal goes to Toronto, he must speak English. This is because the English refuse to learn la langue francaise. As a result, the parliament in Quebec passed a law calling for French to be the official language of Quebec.

A consequence of this language and culture issue is education. Throughout time, les Francais have seen their children and immigrants be made to go to English schools for at least some of their education. By going to English schools, the French children lose a little bit of their own culture which is replaced by that of the English. For a group to survive in its ways, it must retain its autonomy. If it cannot, it sees its culture slowly be absorbed by the dominant culture, the same situation we have aux Etats-Unis.

Another bone for contention among the French-Canadians, is the cultural influence of the Americans. Magazines, radio and television shows, and political influence emanate from the "colossus to the south." There was a slight scuffle in the Canadian Parliament when President Carter informed Mr. Trudeau that the Russian satellite was going to crash on Canadian soil. Did the Canadians have to rely upon the Americans for their self-defense?

This author felt some of that animosity on a recent trip to Montreal. While in line at a concession stand, a friend and I placed some American dollars on the counter. "Are these Americans going to be served first?" "Ah, Americans. Get a haircut and join the marines." For the first time, I felt a little resentment directed at me for being there. Indeed this is an isolated case, but obviously this attitude is present to some degree in Montreal.

The problems of the French-Canadians arose back in the eighteenth century. After their victory at Quebec, the English felt that the French should conform to their ways and customs – their culture. Despite this, the French culture was never broken. The two sides have now got to compromise their stands for a solution to occur. The English must accept the French, and les Francais must continue to accept the English. French passions are high, but if the French give one more time then their dream of a bilingual society will be realized instead of a splintered Quebec.

The Feminist Movement:

The Laws Have Changed, But The Attitudes Have Not

By Vaune Davis

It appears that the feminist movement has been making considerable progress recently yet in reality the achievements have been nothing but "paper victories." Although a considerable number of equal rights statutes have been ushered in over the past decade, these seemingly progressive laws have had little influence on the actual status of women in our society. While the laws may have changed, attitudes towards women still remain anachronistic.

Caught between progressive laws and archaic attitudes, it is difficult for contemporary women not to be confused. Where do they place themselves in a society where the courts tell them they have "equal rights" but where they are discouraged to make use of them? A woman can't be a secretary any longer – that is stereotypical and degrading. But she can't be a corporate executive either – at least not without being labeled an aggressive bitch. Indeed, in the minds of most men, a woman who breaks away from her passive role is threatening and unfeminine.

Faced with this kind of discouragement, women are hesitant to enter male dominated fields. This reluctance is overwhelmingly evident at UVM as there are very few female undergraduates, in proportion to the total enrollment of women, who have entered programs of study traditionally reserved for men. While women constitute 55.25% of the undergraduate population, the school of Business Administration is only 28% female. This disparity is even greater among the engineering students as a scant 8.5% are women. Shocking? I think not. Both programs, engineering in particular with its grade scale, are competitive. And in our society, where it is so important to be accepted, how acceptable is it for women to compete with men?

Whenever a conflict about attitudes arises, the media is inevitably questioned. The case of sexism is, of course, no exception. Except in women's magazines such as Ms. and Cosmopolitan, which pursue the myth of a self-sufficient female population, advertisements generally depict women in submissive situations, seeking the approval of men. Brush your teeth with Ultra-Brite and a tanned ski instructor will appear out of nowhere. Customarily, the media is blamed for this kind of sexism. Nevertheless, as advertisers gear their campaign around images that sell products, it follows that these are the values that appeal to the consumer. On the surface, then, it seems that this is the position that women like to be in.

Looking beyond this superficial level, however, it becomes apparent that this is the only situation women can be in and still conform to society's expectations. From birth, girls are taught to be docile, gentle creatures. If they put on a pretty dress, they will please their daddy. They see their mothers catering to their fathers' every whim. In other words, they learn to seek approval for fulfillment. It is unfortunate that girls do not learn to fulfill themselves through personal accomplishments also. If they did, they might someday be able to break out of the mold society has forced them into.

It has been said that women today have the best of both worlds – while they have the freedom to pursue any career they wish, they can still back out and get married if it does not work out. I do not agree. First of all, while women may have the freedom to choose any career, they do not have the encouragement, and because they learn to depend on approval, it is difficult for them to enter a career that demands independence. Volumes of equal rights laws are not going to give women the confidence to enter a field like business or medicine. Furthermore, this argument is just another reflection of a repressive attitude. Women are not expected to be anything of importance and, because of this, few of them try to.

While repressive laws are damaging, repressive attitudes are even more so because this is where the individual's personal convictions and ambitions are formed. And women will never have "equal rights" until these attitudes change. The feminist movement should concentrate more on changing values, particularly, on women's own internalized sexist ones, in addition to laws, because this is where real progress can be made.

be used. It is up to the commission and management program to supply money, for currently few funds are being applied for and only one new person has been added to study the issue.

(3) Public Involvement: As with every other issue that has affected Burlington, the public must be informed of the facts and questions must be raise. One major question is "How do we establish wasteload allocations?" Public forums should be held concerning this issue, both sides being presented, along with any alternative points of view.

Kathy Garnett of the Water Resources Board did a planning study on the lower Winooski in 1976 and echoed Czaplinski's concern over building the facility before studying the possible effects. Garnett explains that "The Waste Load Allocation on the lower Winooski amounts to a $6 million decision. This costly decision is based on a very limited analysis of a very complicated river system. To build a dam at this time without any further research into waste load limits would be a dangerous mistake."

Mike Richardson, Winooski, Deputy Community Development Director, is concerned that no studies have been conducted to determine the influence of the dam on recreation. According to Richardson and John Berryman, canoeing and rafting below the proposed dam would have to be eliminated due to the danger from large amounts of impounded water that may be rapidly released in an emergency.

Another area of controversy is the possible effect of the dam on Winooski's Salmon hole, recognized by sportsmen as one of the best fishing areas in the state. Tom Morro, a chemist at the Water Pollution Control Plant in Burlington, feels that lower flows would reduce the dissolved oxygen content of the river, which could result in fish kills to the Winooski's natural salmon population. John Berryman disagreed with this assertion and stated that although he is not a fish expert, he had been told that the dam would actually increase the salmon population and improve the fishing.

John Berryman of the Burlington Electric Department has answered skeptics by stating that his utility will meet all water quality standards if the hydro project is funded. Mr. Berryman realizes there are questions that must be answered but is confident that Burlington Electric can resolve them after the project is approved. He feels it is important for voters to approve funding for the hydro project on March 7 in order to avoid rising costs due to inflation later on.

However, a wood-burning plant of this magnitude has never been tried in the country, and the proposed electrostatic precipitators (emission control devices) have never been tried anywhere. Furthermore, the precipitators cost $800,000 to install and cost $250,000 per year to operate. This cost was not included in the report of the total cost of the project." Valentennette further stated that "the Intervale location for the incinerator and wood-burning facilities appears to be the best in Burlington. But, do the residents of Manhattan Drive realize that they would be on eye level with a 100 foot smoke stack emitting 52 lbs. of particulate an hour?" Manhattan Drive's elevation is also 100 feet. Valentennette cited the Clean Air Acts passed by Congress in 1977 which state that "no more than 52 pounds of particulate per hour can be emitted in any one area." The Moran plant is now emitting very near the legal limit of particulate. In order to operate the wood-burning facility at capacity, Valentennette said "the Moran plant would have to shut down immediately. Burlington Electric, according to Mr. Norse, does not see this happening. Valentennette reasoned that "the two new plants would have to run at less than capacity until the Moran plant is shut down."

Mr. Walter Cooley of the Vermont Population Statistics Division and chief demographer for the state read from his studies that the population growth of Chittenden County is "at about 1.2% per year. This would indicate about a 1-2% increase in electrical consumption." This is contrary to the 5% per year figure that Mr. Norse cited.

Mr. Michael Richardson, a spokesman for the city of Winooski, found fault with the proposed hydro-electric plant on the Winooski River. "The hydro facility calls for a 16-foot diameter pipe to feed its turbines. That would require a flow of water at around 2500 cubic feet per second. The present average flow of the Winooski is only 1400 cubic feet per second. Burlington Electric would have to accomplish major engineering feats to keep the water flow high enough to keep the turbine running," said Richardson. Burlington Electric has proposed terracing the Winooski with several dams and co-ordinating flows to increase the present waterflow rate to an acceptable level. They are, however, only allowing for a flow of 20 cubic feet per second for the rest of the Winooski while the hydro plant is in operation. This creates another serious problem. According to Mr. Richardson, the sewage plants along the Winooski are secondary plants and require a flow of more than 20 cubic feet per second to complete sewage breakdown. "With the hydro plant running, we'd have to convert all of these secondary plants to tertiary plants, which don't need river flow to complete sewage breakdown. This would mean a tremendous expense to Winooski." He concluded that Winooski has some "very real and exciting" development plans for the river bank which would "be greatly hindered by the building of the hydro plant."

Bring-in your phono cartridge for a free 500-mile checkup!

Thursday Afternoon March 2

Did you know that the stylus on your phonograph cartridge travels about one mile of record groove for every hour of music you enjoy? That's why it's a good idea to have your cartridge checked after every 300-500 hours (miles) of use.

The Micro-Acoustics JB-2 Cartridge Analyzer.

A new kind of 500-mile checkup. While most cartridge manufacturers—and their clinics—view cartridges primarily in terms of record wear and tracking ability, Micro-Acoustics goes an important step further. Which is why their Phono Cartridge Clinic is the most comprehensive ever developed. So comprehensive, in fact, they've invented a unique cartridge analyzer—the JB-2—which works in conjunction with an oscilloscope and the CBS Labs test records.

Specifications most manufacturers never even reveal. The Micro-Acoustics Phono Cartridge Clinic goes beyond frequency response to areas like square-wave response. Intermodulation distortion. And capacitance effects. To name but a few. No other cartridge clinic tests these factors . . . yet any engineer will tell you they are the best measurements of a cartridge's sonic performance.

Micro-Acoustics' technicians will also do all the things you'd expect a cartridge clinic to do. They'll clean and inspect your stylus. Adjust tracking and anti-skating to optimum settings. Check turntable speed accuracy. Test channel balance, phasing and crosstalk.

Come early. Though the procedure takes about 15 minutes per turntable, testing will be done on a first-come, first-served basis. (And you'll have to stay with your turntable.) But when the testing's done, you'll have a 6-page comprehensive record of the test results.

An important note: Micro-Acoustics requests you bring in only high-quality cartridges mounted in comparable record players; low cost units cannot be tested because they damage delicate test records.

Free bonus. The first 25 people with a qualified turntable each day of the clinic will receive a FREE Micro-Acoustics test record—a $3.95 value!

possibility of the first library fee increase since 1961, according to Kebabian. The 1961 increase followed the construction of the existing Bailey library.

Limited, yet visable preparation for the linkage is underway. While trees are unearthed outdoors, the installation of an $86,000 sprinkle system and the upgrading of fire resistence on the structural columns are two indoor projects. While these revisions have had minimal effect on students, Kebabian warned that "There are going to be inconveniences for everybody as the project goes along. We hope for tolerance and understanding of the fact that getting the thing (library) is going to require inconvenience. For example, there's going to be contractors who are required to stake out the property. That's going to mean a fence around the area, and students are going to have to walk around that fence to get where they want to go. It won't be handy, but it's the cost of getting the contractor's trucks, supplies, and so on located where they can get at them... But it will be a lot better when it's done..."

Falk on Vietnam

allowable by the precepts of international law, because the Geneva Convention set down no guidelines on air warfare. Additionally, he explained that the United States "invented a variety of legitimizing arguments" as explanations for certain courses of action in Southeast Asia. As an example, he cited President Johnson's "Crusade of Many Flags" whereby LBJ bribed many Third World leaders to send token forces to help fight in South Vietnam. He said the thinking behind this tactic was to give the impression that the United States was leading the free world in the struggle to contain communism.

Falk pointed out that four successive presidents used international law to "bolster public opinion" and "did so rather successfully." Falk concluded by saying the U.S. leaders exaggerated internationally what was happening in Vietnam through their "containment theory."

Under President Carter, Falk asserted that imperialism is taking a new form, of sorts, in the shape of human rights. He said Carter is using human rights to justify U.S. intervention and this move "has created severe tensions." He also said this human rights campaign presents a contradiction in that we are relating favorably to some oil-rich Mid-East countries that maintain "minimally decent policies toward their populations."

Falk said that it's too early to pass judgment on what will become of Vietnam, but indicated that the United States has been inflicting "punitive damage" toward the now communist country through a trade embargo and the expulsion of their ambassador to the United Nations. He said this is due to the fact that many U.S. leaders have not yet reconciled the outcome of Vietnam.

"It's now too late to argue about Vietnam and too early to understand it," he said.

On The Street:

A New Way of Handling Deliquency

By Randy McMullen

"I have a lot of animosity for most social workers. Most of them are college graduates who don't know what it really means to suffer."

Derek Blaine

Blaine and Prince the entirety of the Burlington Police Department's Juvenile Diversion Project, feel that the criminal justice system in American simply doesn't work well. Their view, perhaps, is well justified, because it wasn't very long ago that the two were themselves considered criminals.

"Derek and I," said Andy, "have had extensive contact with criminal justice systems." Andy Prince has seen a total of nine years in prison, and Derek Blaine's life until recently has been a series of reform-stories and state and federal penitenteries. Like many criminals, they started at an early age. That first crime, said Derek, is "where it all begins." And a juvenile record makes you part of what he referred to as a "tracking system," because your name is given a reputation that makes the law want to keep an eye on you. If you are arrested at some later time, your record is brought forward, and your past becomes a character witness.

The "tracking system" has affected more than a few people, who as a result, have seen most of the world from behind bars; and from there, the view is quite different.

"When you grow up inside of an institution," said Derek, "you learn a value system that is in a lot of ways a direct opposite of the value system that a free society has. You grow up as an observor of society, rather than a participator."

"And that's why we're here," added Andy, reflecting on his less-than-utopian past, "because we don't want to see the same thing happen to kids as what happened to us."

Andy and Derek started talking about working with juveniles about three years ago, while they were both in a community correction center. They had both gotten tired of watching kids come in, as Andy put it, "totally lost. It was a big deal for them to be in jail and to associate with criminals." They considered running half-way houses, and joining different organizations, but it seemed to them that none of those would work.

"We felt that the only way we could get to these kids," added Andy, "was to go out on the street, to basically live and work with them out there on the street."

But then Derek was shipped out to Missouri, while Andy was released on his own recognisance. They kept in touch and determined that the problems for most criminals began between the ages of nine and twelve. They decided to make that age limit their target.

Andy and Derek share the philosophy that this country's single most important resource is its young people. They also feel that this resource is being neglected. "The country in general," said Andy, "is not responding to a kid's needs, or the problems at home. They don't worry about them (the kids) until they're in a correction system or a juvenile justice system."

Andy and Derek began their juvenile diversion project about seven months ago. They are presently the only ex-criminals to work on a police department in the country. Since their project's inception, however, they have been telling everybody that they are NOT policemen. In fact, they feel that a policeman's job is by its nature ineffective. "A cop," said Derek, "is always in an adversary situation; being called in to decide whether he should arrest somebody."

"And at the same time," he continued heatedly, "the kid has made his own conscious decision. He's told everyone around him that he doesn't believe in the system. And he's telling society to stick it up its ass!"

"Then we make the mistake of involving all kinds of other people to make decisions for that kid. Probation officers, counselors, everybody. We tell him what he has to do and what the rules are. He's never involved with making his own decisions."

What Andy finds most discouraging is that the decisions are made by people "in the system," who despite their good intentions don't realize that the majority of the people who break the law are poor. And a good many of the poor people are inflicted with what Derek refers to as "cultural insanity."

"So many of them are apathetic or distrustful of society," he said, "that's why the jails are overcrowded. Someday, there will be more criminals than cops."

For the same reason, Derek does not believe in social reform programs, especially social workers. "I have a lot of animosity for most social workers," he said, "most of them are college graduates who don't know what it really means to suffer. You have to understand an eighty-year-old lady sitting in a four room house with eleven other people in it, eating a three-day-old bologna sandwich and dribbling all over her shirt... You have to empathize with that."

********

THEIR PURPOSE

Thus you have the concept underlying Andy Prince and Derek Blaine's efforts. They feel that a youngster has to be reached on the streets, and he has to be reached with realism as well as concern.

Said Andy: "When I see a kid breaking into a car or something, I kick him in the ass and tell him to go home. Then it's his decision as to what he does next. But he knows that if I catch him doing it again, I'll kick him twice as hard. I don't call that brutality, I call it reality. It's more brutal to send him to a justice system or let him get away with it so that he'll graduate to bigger things. Eventually, he'll get caught."

And getting caught means jail, which according to Andy and Derek defeats the purpose. Jail is "just another big business," said Andy, who cited that $13,000–$16,000 per year is spent on keeping someone in prison. "And when they get out," he added, "they're not rehabilitated. Jail cannot rehabilitate anyone, they have to do that themselves."

Whatever the degree of their rehabilitation, Andy and Derek feel that they have made some real progress. They can sense an attitude change in some of the kids they work with on the North End and Franklin Square – where juvenile delinquency has traditionally been a problem. There seems to be less vandalizing and terrorizing, although the real changes, if there are any, won't be noticed for at least another couple of years.

It's frustrating work, with so much to tackle that it looks unconquerable. "But you can't let the impossible intimidate you," said Andy, "let it motivate you and then you can make some real changes."

Derek told a story about a young boy who one day decided to peg Santa Claus at the Church Street Mall with snowballs. During an ensuing chase with a Burlington policeman, the boy was able to escape although he wound up fracturing a bone in his leg, after which he hobbled over to the Juvenile Diversion office on South Winooski St. to talk about it. The other police officers were shocked by the boy's trust, and they told Andy and Derek later that it was the first time such a thing had happened. "That's the real reward we get from this job," Derek added.

When asked about their relationship with the other police officers, both Derek and Andy smile at what is always the inevitable question. "We're oddities to them" admits Derek, "but they treat us as one of the group, and it's not forced." Andy agrees, saying that "people don't trust cops or ex-cons. We're so different that there really isn't much of a difference, and that's why it works." Derek adds, though, that like most people, he still gets nervous every time a police car pulls up behind him.

One of the more unpleasant aspects of their job is the fact that they work, as Derek phrases it, "in a fishbowl." They've been scouted by the department of Correction, curious taxpayers, and even the FBI. "And everybody," said Derek, "is just waiting for us to screw up."

At the same time, police departments from Barre, Middlebury, and some towns in New York have all called them asking for advice and information.

Referring to the Juvenile Diversion Project, Derek said: "Vermont is one of the only places you could do this. The attitude here is liberal in the sense that they'll take chances. In California, I would already be in jail for the way I talk to people." Another unique aspect of Andy and Derek's work is that they have given their home address and telephone number to some Burlington citizens whom they deal with, and that is supposedly against police ethics.

Nutrition Ignorance

By Jim Nuovo

How much does your doctor know about nutrition? We would all like to think that doctors know a good deal about such an important subject but this is not necessarily the case. A recent study demonstrated that only one half of physicians taking an exam on the basics of nutrition had an adequate knowledge. The reason for this situation is clear: few medical schools offer any program of nutrition education on any level in the training of their future doctors. Here at UVM, for example, it is entirely possible for a recently graduated M.D. to have received only five hours of instruction in nutrition which is presented as part of a biochemistry course. No program exists for the clinical application of nutrition in medicine.

The problem of ignorance about nutrition begins even before a student enters medical school. There is no encouragement from medical school admission committees so that an undergraduate might take nutrition courses while he is a "pre-med." Indeed, when I was an undergraduate at UVM, I was advised against taking a "gut course in nutrition" because it would be frowned upon by the medical school admissions committee. With this type of attitude prevailing at the majority of medical schools, it is not surprising that we are graduating doctors who lack the essential skills in this aspect of patient care.

The results of the deficit in medical training can be disastrous. When such a simple but important feature of a person's health is neglected through ignorance, the result is often harmful for the patient. Patients are frequently given poor advice about their diets and many times are given no advice at all when it is clearly indicated.

What can be done to correct this situation? Perhaps the most important thing to do is to educate yourself, whether or not you are going into the field of medicine. If you are a pre-med, take advantage of the freedom of your undergraduate time to introduce yourself into the broad areas of this subject. If you are already interested, write to the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs (Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont is a member). This committee is in the process of considering the funding of nutrition programs at all levels of education. Indication of your support and ideas for its implementation would be helpful in the development of such a program.

During the time I have been involved in clinical nutrition, I have seen significant improvement in individual concern by doctors and patients regarding the role of nutrition in health. While there are still serious deficits, this is a sign of real progress in the near future.

UVM Admissions:

Are Selections Made By A Computer's Calculations Or By A More Human Process?

By Micheal Grundhauser

It is too easy to forget the days one may have spent awaiting word from the UVM Admissions Office. Accepted or rejected? One wonders just exactly who is deciding what about which grade or SAT score, and maybe imagines some hard-boiled, tight-lipped bureaucrat tossing stacks of completed applications into a closet labeled "Dead Dogs File." And shudders to see his own name at the top of one of those stacks.

I remembered the feeling quite well, and so I approached Tom Sherrer, an Admissions Counsellor for UVM, in order to satisfy my curiosities and confirm what I secretly felt must be the case.

Au contraire!

Tom Sherrer is a young fellow, very congenial and very concerned with his work. He is a relatively recent graduate of UVM (class of '76), and appears both knowledgable about and sensitive to the needs of both student and university. He is also an engaging character, and an articulate representative of the Office of Admissions, as well.

Admissions has no easy task. Some 8 to 9 thousand potential freshmen applied last year, along with about eighteen hundred transfers. Of these applicants, only a relatively small portion can be accepted: roughly 39 hundred freshmen and 480 transfers.

THE PROCESS

Applications are initially classified as In-State or Out-of-State, depending, of course, on where the applicant is from. Vermont (In-State) students are admitted or rejected according to whether they are deemed Qualified or Not Qualified. There is no competition — all qualified Vermonters are accepted. Out-of-Staters, on the other hand, face fairly stiff competition. This fact is adequately reflected in last year's average SAT scores for In-State and Out-of-State accepted freshmen. The average Vermonter's verbal SAT score was 483 and the math 529, as compared with 530 on the verbal and 577 for the math for the Out-of-Stater. Does this mean the average Vermonter is slower than other students? No, says Tom Sherrer. "A Vermonter might come in with not quite the credentials of an out-of-state student. His scores are lower due to the stiff competition that Out-of-Staters must weather."

But SAT's are not all-important. There are no "cut-offs" for SAT scores, in-state or out-of-state. "When we review freshmen, the most important thing by far is the high-school record. The SAT's are supplemental." For the In-Stater, Sherrer emphasizes very general parameters — a student in the top 2/5 of his high-school class, with a "B" average, and SAT scores in the mid 400's is likely to win a berth. Out-of-Staters usually have it a bit rougher. Class rank and high-school profiles are looked at first. High-school profiles indicate how many graduating students go on to two and four year colleges, and thus provide the Admissions personnel with a clearer idea of the applicant's background. When class rank and high-school profile have been ascertained, each application is given a rating. The top ratings are given first consideration. To illustrate just how fierce the competition can get, last year Admissions never made it past the top ratings for most programs at UVM.

Though interviews are conducted in some cases, Sherrer maintains they are essentially unimportant. Interviews serve as "an informational session for the student as opposed to a real evaluative session for us. Some schools use notebooks; checklists, etc., not us." Why is this? First of all, the sheer number of applicants precludes the possibility of interviewing everyone. Secondly, as Sherrer says, "It just wouldn't be fair. People with money can fly up here for an interview whenever they want. The poor can't." Interviews are useful sometimes, though, in that additional pertinent information can be obtained. Still, in such cases, the Admissions staff are careful not to show favor.

There is no attempt to set and satisfy quotas, either. A popular notion is that UVM admits In-Staters and Out-of-Staters on a quota basis, and that limits are set on the number of individuals accepted from any given state. According to Sherrer, neither of these is accurate. The university must first accept all qualified In-Staters — and the number of these varies each year — after that, the door is wide open for Out-of-Staters to compete for the remaining places. Nor are men/women and minority quotas set. UVM does, however, have an extensive recruiting effort for the latter. Even so, there are only approximately 100 minority members of 7500 students presently enrolled — slightly more than one percent.

Perhaps there is one area of the admissions process that generally proves a sensitive point — that of athletic recruiting. "If a student doesn't meet basic requirements, it doesn't matter if he's the greatest athlete in the world." Sherrer says that athletes do get some special consideration, just as do the sons and daughters of alumni, experienced and talented members of the theatre, and others. He explains, "We're constantly looking for people to add to this place — not just through the classroom, but other avenues as well." The final decision for admission is often made in conjunction with the dean or director of the program or school being applied to.

All is not lost if the student is rejected. A Vermonter has the right to appeal the decision, since he has been categorically judged "Not Qualified." An Out-of-Stater, however, cannot, since he has simply been bettered by the competition. Happily, no one receives a flat rejection. In a letter of rejection, the Admissions Office makes suggestions as to what the student might do to improve his situation and/or chances for future admission to UVM. These suggestions are tailored to the student's needs — for instance, a rejected applicant to the College of Engineering may be advised to bolster his mathematical aptitude and experience by taking certain courses elsewhere, and then to reapply after doing this.

In some instances, Continuing Education might be recommended to the Vermont student, to see how he functions in a similar situation to a degree program. Sherrer warns that "we don't recommend this to everyone. Continuing Ed shouldn't be seen as a stepping-stone to college for people right out of high school, particularly for Out-of-Staters. In-State, it can be an alternative, because it's handy. Over one-quarter of Vermont's population is within a 15 mile radius of the University, so for an In-Stater, it is the logical place to take courses."

For Tom Sherrer and the Admissions Office, perhaps the most important objective is accommodating students' needs. "We don't want to dangle a carrot in front of the student's eyes. We try to accommodate only when justified. This doesn't mean we lower our standards. I think the admission process is pretty healthy. We consider the needs of the student from the start right on through. If we judged simply on the basis of grades and SAT's, there would be no need for an Admissions staff. We could just use a computer. But computers are not making the decisions — this is a very human process."

Know Me, Know My Bedroom

Every now and then Admissions receives additional information from an applicant — sometimes examples of an applicant's work. One student sent in copies of a published book of cartoon characters that she had drawn; another submitted a novel he had written.

But perhaps the most bizarre package that Admissions has received, according to bemused Director Richard Steele, contained a doll-house sent by one of this year's applicants. A note attached to the bedroom-in-miniature explained that one way to understand a person is through her living quarters — in this case, her bedroom.

bounce along in Derek's VW van. There is a fierce chill in the air, and the Muhammed Ali boxing match is on the television. Andy comments that the streets are unusually empty, but that tomorrow there will be boxing matches all over Burlington.

It is while Andy and Derek are on the street that their characters stand out most prominently. Andy is more sullen and sarcastic, but he has a keen understanding of things, and his wit is sharp and provocative. Derek's humor is more good natured, and is oriented around rowdy one-liners that are padded exuberantly with obscenities. They compliment each other well, and it is rather easy to see that they are happy working together.

As the van comes upon four young boys, it pulls over. Andy and Derek are immediately recognized by the youngsters, who cry out "Aw Christmas, what did we do this time?"

The six of them are soon horsing around, with insults and laughter being tossed back and forth. The scene resembles more a reunion between brothers than one between juvenile delinquents and law enforcers. A photographer attempts to take their picture, but the boys immediately assault him with a barrage of protruding middle fingers.

"Now what are you doing that for?" asks Derek.

"I don't want my picture in no post office," shouts one of the boys. Later, Derek tells me they all have been involved with the Weeks School, having been arrested for vandalism, public nuisance charges, and possibly breaking and entry. The Weeks School, referred to by Andy as "just another prison," has since been closed down.

Juvenile delinquents have the high price of bureaucracy to pay for their actions. The Social Rehabilitation Service usually brings their case to the District Attorney's office, and from there it more often than not winds up in the court systems. By that time, complains Derek, the case is so far removed from the person and his situation that a rational decision is nearly impossible.

But for as long as Andy and Derek continue their Juvenile Diversion Project, the young lawbreakers of Burlington will have perhaps a better spokesman. One mistake, however, could get them fired, imprisoned, or even killed. "If someone thought that we were police informants," said Derek, "and they wanted to knife us in the back, it could happen." Fortunately, the only nasty incident so far has been the slitting of Andy's tires.

Of course funding is always a problem; in fact, next year's budget has yet to be determined. But Derek hasn't begun to worry yet. "We can always rob a bank," he laughed.

A Short Story By Kimberly Honza

The clock loudly announced the arrival of 2 a.m. Once again the millions of messages that boiled in my mind caused the sweet potion of sleep to elude me. I knew I would not rest tonight.

In darkness, my feet groped for my slippers, and I made my way to the bedroom window. The path was familiar to me, I avoided all the obstacles.

There was no moon, no stars, to illuminate the sky. Neither was the sound of the night animals evident. The inky blackness of the night enveloped what seemed to be the entire world. It took all my conscious effort to persuade myself that light would invade the sky in a matter of hours. The night was infinite.

With a resounding click, the light from my small desk lamp bolted across the room. I surveyed my domain. The room was large, yet uncluttered. No momentos that could hint of my personal and private being were in sight. It was immaculate. Even the sheets on the bed from which I had just sleeplessly escaped were crisply turned back at the corner.

I excavated my journal from its given position.

It was a thick book, entirely hand-printed in my perfect script. It was monotonous to look at — every letter was the same size, an exact replica of the first.

I looked at the previous evening's entry. It was some romantic nonsense that I had conjured up in my somnambulent brain. I chuckled silently. Tonight I was not feeling romantic.

Icy fingers reached out and touched my mind; no thoughts would come, yet my pen was still poised above the barren sheet of paper.

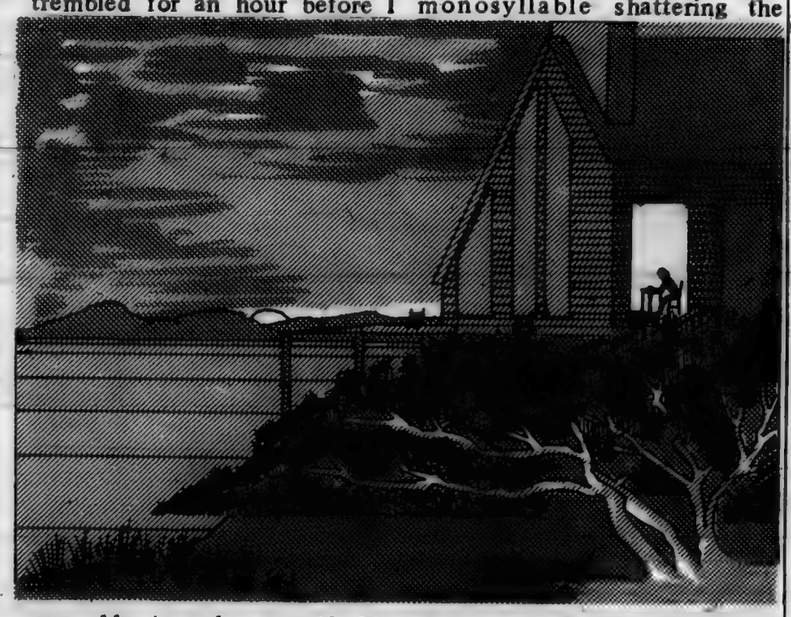
I dreaded the possibility of returning memories. I glanced at the journal again. It was an accumulation of three and one half years of insomnia. Had it been that long? I listened again to the silence surrounding me. It was the sound of being terribly alone. I had no one to blame but myself.

********

My home was large. An eight-bedroom, modernistic structure secluded in the midst of 80 acres. I lived there as a recluse. A housekeeping and maintenance crew arrived daily, but I avoided them with perseverance. Intricate security devices surrounded the grounds and my home. A gatekeeper guarded the only road into the estate.

Nights were my worst time. During the days I kept busy at work. I intentionally took on more responsibilities than were required. Mornings began at seven a.m. with an hour drive into the city, and myself busy dictating the day's correspondence. At work, I often stayed 12 hours. The time I didn't spend talking on the phone to my various advisors, I spent talking to the exchange — buying and selling securities — and making money.

Money. It was the one thing that comforted me. If all else failed, I could buy anything or anyone I wanted. It had bought my seclusion.



Evenings I swam and ran and read books. My library selections were extensive. Classical music habitually poured out of the speakers.

I retired at midnight in order to hopefully capture some moments of intermittent sleep. At two a.m., I began my nightly prowl. Then again at four, I retired to restlessly retire until dawn.

Mercifully, all memories had escaped me momentarily, but I remembered a day when it didn't have to be like this. I had laughed, I had smiled, I had many lovers.

********

Then the nightmares began. At first, I had only shrugged them off as pressure from work. But they continued to increase in intensity. Occasionally, I would abruptly awaken and begin to pace about the room. I sent my lovers away, I had no explanations for my behavior. There was nothing I could do within my power to assuage the situation. I tossed and turned. And suddenly one evening, with the same ruthlessness of the onset of the nightmares, I woke up screaming. I screamed and screamed. Tears poured from my eyes relentlessly. When the screaming stopped, my body trembled for an hour before I was able to calm myself. My voice was always hoarse the next morning.

The hired help was at first curious. But before they had the opportunity to be repulsed by my behavior, I sent them away.

In one final desperate effort to alleviate the situation, I began taking amphetamines to keep me awake, or at least to prevent me from falling into a deep slumber that would allow the nightmares to overtake my subconscious mind. After a year of the repulsive habit, I stopped. By that time, I was so accustomed to the lack of sleep that they were unnecessary.

********

I looked down at the blank page in my journal. I dipped a pen into the inkwell of my creativity, but the point emerged dry. I fought the temptation to think back further. I knew the next step into my memory — but beyond that, I dared not venture, as it was inevitable that some destructive force would emerge, and along with it the nightmares.

********

I had been in a coma for two weeks. With the first fluttering of my eyelids, I asked about my business, and mentioned nothing about the accident. I had suffered severe burns and lost a lot of body fluid; but I was strong, I had survived.

After a week of convalescence, I returned to the business; and within a month had adopted a more rigorous schedule than before.

It was thought that this was therapeutic, and in a sense it was. I had little time to think of the accident; in fact, I said nothing about it. The general consensus was that I had forgotten it completely by year's end.

Everyone was making money and getting paid. People gave up worrying about my mental health, and encouraged me to work harder. I kept everyone happy.

********

I scribbled madly in my journal, but the thoughts came dangerously close to recalling the fateful night. I paced the room. It was three a.m.

"What does a.m. stand for," I quizzed myself silently. I consulted the dictionary. Ante meridiem, meaning before noon.

"Three a.m.," I thought again. That was about the time the accident happened.

"NO!" I said aloud, the monosyllable shattering the silence with such violence, I suspected I had awakened the dead. How I wished I had, or at least I wished to join them.

I began muttering to myself. I could not afford to think back. To do so would destroy everything I had built. I had to think ahead. I couldn't remember, I couldn't let myself. It would be fatal.

********

We were in love. Desperately, hopelessly, helplessly, in love. To think of it threw the society and gossip columns into a frenzy. The two most powerful business tycoons in the world, reduced to indulging in childish behavior in each other's presence.

We laughed; how we laughed. They were marvelous, all-encompassing laughs that brought our souls together. We gave our minds and souls to each other. In all our lives, never had either of us made such a sacrifice.

We were two lonely people reaching out, touching each other, coming together to form one perfect entity, whole its in nature.

When we made love, each time it was as if it was a new

Staffing the D.C. Office

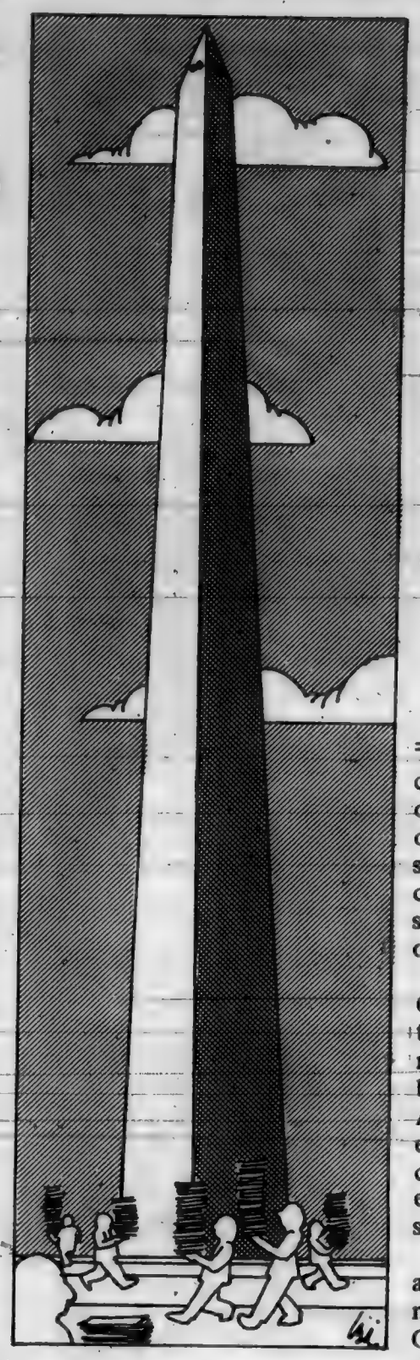
By Tom Daniels

Are you contemplating a summer internship in Washington? Thinking of working for a Congressional candidate this fall in hopes of gaining a position on the staff? Curious about your generation's political go-getters and leaders of tomorrow? Or are you lazy and get sadistic satisfaction in reading about how hard others work?

Congressmen are ever searching for young blood to keep things moving at the office. According to Jack Herney of New Hampshire Senator McIntyre's staff, "It's a good job for young people with a lot of energy who want to learn how politics really works."

Mr. Herney further explained, "In many ways a Senator is insulated by his staff from the pettiness of political favor seekers. The staff takes the flak for not including Mrs. Appleby in a welcoming committee or neglecting to answer donation requests to the March of Marauding Maniacs. But a good staff should protect their Senator from impediments; he has enough to attend to. There are many functions which consume large chunks of time and produce little results."



In short, a Congressman is often no more effective than his staff permits him to be.

The public beyond Washington firmly believes that a seat in Congress is a fat, cushy job. On the scene, observation reveals rigorous 12 to 16 hour work days with 4 to 6 hours of sleep as the rule rather than the exception. No less understood is the life of the staffer, who, on an average day, makes it to the office by 7:30 a.m. and departs at 6 p.m. Late nights are not infrequent either.

"After you get over the initial aura of D.C., seeing famous faces, and hearing story upon historic story, the pace can wear on you," said one staffer. Few staffers last more than five years, but in the meantime, the pay is good, and the work is better than most. In addition, a staff position looks good on a resume (as does a recommendation from a Congressman), and may develop connections to other jobs.

STAFF POSITIONS

A variety of staff positions exist or can be created. An Administrative Assistant runs the office and may have several aides directly under him. The two Legislative Aides hold perhaps the most creative jobs; they research bills, draft legislation, confer with co-sponsors, and brief the boss on what he is trying to do and what to say to whom. Said one LA, "It's exciting; you really feel you are contributing, especially in researching bills that someday may become law."

The Appointments Secretary fills the essential and hectic function of keeping the Congressman informed of where he is to be, when, and with whom. Each morning, the Congressman receives a schedule of events, which may have to be changed at a moment's notice – often putting a strain on the office and the appointments secretary in particular. Other office positions include: press secretary, speechwriter, letter opener, elevator operator,

"In many ways a senator is insulated by his staff from the pettiness of political favor seekers."

Complaints about Congressional offices range from too much pressure to a feeling of not accomplishing much beyond bureaucratic paper-pushing. And, then again, it seems that everyone in the world's greatest capital tries to convince everyone else of his or her own self-importance.

The plushness of the office, and hence the space for and number of staff, depends on the Congressman's seniority. Any office tends to be somewhat cramped. The usual quarters feature a desk with a comfortable chair, a telephone (use that WATTS line to call your friends back home), and a bulletin board of favorite sayings, clippings, and art. Though the staff is often underestimated, their ability to maintain morale is crucial in such close quarters. "The office ambience is generally easy, until a call or visitor comes in, then people jump," one staffer said with a smile. "We're hard working but we love to party," she continued, echoing the classic attitude of Capitol Hill. Nonetheless, I was unable to find any secretaries who could not type but were on the pay roll for "services rendered." Marijuana, other drugs, and cohabitation are supposedly forbidden for staffers. If caught indulging in illicit activities, the boss could be politically embarrassed.

As rumored, the social scene in D.C. is lively, and most of the action takes place on weekday nights and lunches. Georgetown, in the Northwest Quadrant, abounds in bars (especially singles), discos, and young people seeking a good time. Men are often drawn to the capital by the mere fact of the 4 to 1 female to male ratio. As one young buck quipped, "It's easier to get a date around here than a job!"

Mechanized Bonging

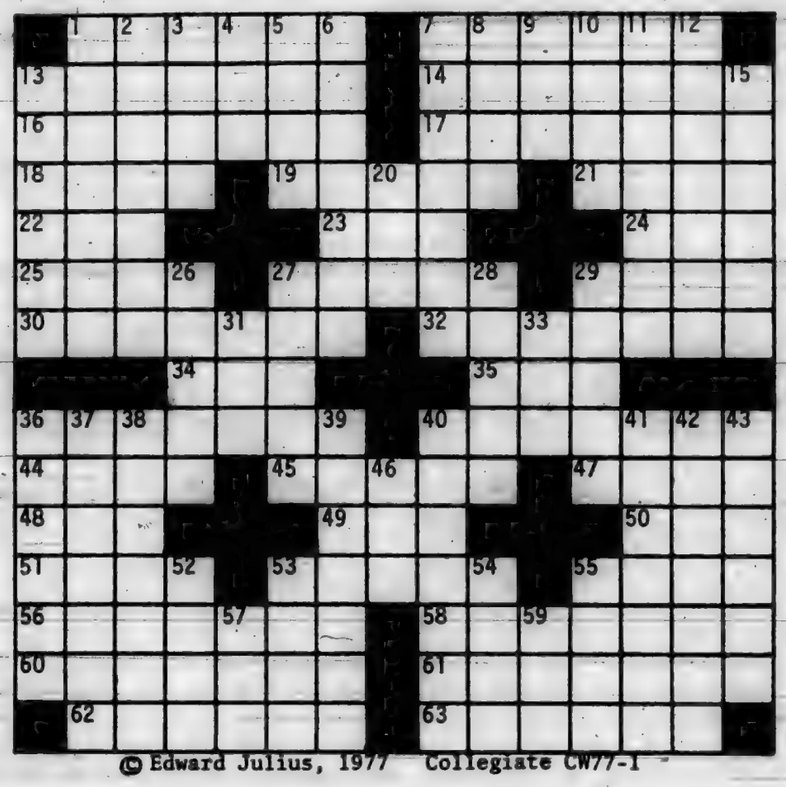
Contending that it will further mankind's strive for "the eternal high," two Davis Hall residents recently unveiled an intricately built, motorized bong. Commander Chuck, one of the co-founders, predicted, "It will bring on a new age of mechanicalized bonging."



The instrument, conceived during a Physics lecture, is awesome in stature and performance. The mechanism is essentially a manual "pump" bong, available at any 'head' shop. By adding $25 in electrical equipment ("numerous lights; numerous lights"), Chuck and his cohort, Willy, transformed the basic bong into an instrument that "breathes for you." Noting the $25 parts expenditure, one observer stated, "The price is no object."

Despite satisfaction with the product, Chuck said, "Further refinement is imminent." Following these alterations, the pair hope to patent the invention and seek exposure in High Times, a publication read predominantly by drug users. Presently, however, Chuck appears content to personally experience the invention. "It's truly incredible," he later added.

The Mardi Gras of the North

Quebec City Parties It Up Before the Deprivations of Lent

By Leslie Dunn

Once a year, for eleven straight days, the entire city of Quebec goes wild. Music in the air and dancing in the streets create an atmosphere which transcend language barriers and cultural differences. The occasion is Quebec City's Winter Carnival, known also as "the Mardi Gras of the North."

The Carnival is based upon the old Roman Catholic tradition of partying it up before the deprivations of Lent. The city is well prepared for the festivities; a huge ice palace is built, and activities ranging from snow shoe races to art exhibits to a great parade are scheduled. The whole city comes alive, with the help of the half a million visitors that swarm the streets. Hotel rooms are rented long in advance, and a citizen committee is formed to make available private homes to the visiting guests. Church basements are converted into huge dormitories to accommodate hundreds of them.

It is said there is enough liquor consumed these eleven days "to fill the entire St. Lawrence Seaway." This isn't too hard to believe, as it seems as if each night is another New Year's Eve. Although beer, brandy, and hard liquor are popular, by far the most popular drink is the 24% proof mixture of wine and grain alcohol called "Caribon," which goes down like water during the Carnival.

The Carnival provides a rejuvenation of spirit in the middle of the long and cold northern winter. The heavy fur coats and the huge hats and boots worn by many were indicative of the severity of the winter months. Drinking and dancing become necessities not merely matters of choice.

The police are quite relaxed about all of the drinking going on. The drinking age is lowered to fourteen during the Carnival, which makes for a lot of "juvenile inebriation." The atmosphere of the Carnival remains happy and under control, even though a very large percentage of the people attending are definitely 'out of control.' Anyone too drunk to stand up is picked up and helped out by willing and happy passersby. An amazing sense of comaraderie is felt among the Carnival's participants. Smiles and friendly greetings become part of an "international language" which make even the most distant traveller feel at home in the French-speaking city. Hundreds and hundreds of people gather until all hours of the night, singing and dancing to the music which plays in the city square. Although the weather is well below the freezing point, the warm, festive atmosphere seems to keep the temperature at a pleasant level.

The Carnival offers a unique immersion into the lifestyles of Quebec. Horse-drawn carriages typical of the old section of the city. The new downtown area of the city is easily recognizable by its modern buildings and wide roads. Throughout the city, huge cathedrals, well-preserved historic sites, and hundreds of tiny shops and inns welcome visitors. Every restaurant and bar is filled with the music and laughter of the Carnival spirit. People of all ages become involved and make the festival an experience to be remembered.

One of the best things about the Quebec City Winter Festival to those of us at UVM is that it is only five hours from Burlington (not like the 30 hours drive to the 'Southern Mardi Gras in New Orleans'). This definitely makes going to the carnival a worthwhile weekend trip. Around this time next year, be sure to consider going to Quebec for a cultural experience that won't be forgotten.

Everything was so new, so fresh. I exploded with ecstasy each time we touched. I remembered how his generous lips felt on mine, the electric sense of his body touching mine. My mind swam.

********

I was too close to the edge. I felt myself losing grip on the evening, on my senses. I was in a long, deep, dark, endless hole, and I was falling, falling, falling...

********

He asked me to marry him the night before. I had accepted.

We made our way to the most prestigious jewelry store to buy the ring. It was huge, almost gawdy.

The next evening we celebrated. We went to all our favorite places, did all our favorite things. In the end, we ended up at my mother's mansion on the island. She held a massive party for us to appease the press. In the end, laughing madly, we jumped fully clothed into the fountain. We felt terribly childish, rejuvenated by the prospect of starting life anew, our life, together.

His mouth met mine in a farewell kiss. We held hands and talked quietly about the future. Then again, our lips touched, and his tongue eagerly sought mine. They touched, and we became one.

Disengaging ourselves, he reluctantly retreated from the doorstep. Turning once again to wave adieu, he swung open the car door.

The number of thoughts that rocketed through my mind at that horrible moment were infinite. Someone at the party, dreading the thought of our two empires combining, must have wired his car, I never found out, I never wanted to know.

The car ignited into a ball of flames. Pieces of debris scattered at my feet. I watched the flames licking out at me, inviting me to join them, before I comprehended what was happening. I remember thinking how nice and warm it was.

A crowd gathered. I looked at them, then looked at the blazing car. I plunged into the inferno to be with my fiance.

I stopped writing.

I could resist no longer.

The dam broke, and the memories rushed with terrific force into the endless chasms of my mind.

I screamed.

New Construction

As a result of the post World War II baby boom, in the late 1960's a historically disproportionate number of college students created an overwhelming burden on previously adequate campus facilities. Even though we are now closing the 70's with dissipating enrollments, many of UVM's facilities are sadly inadequate for a school with a combined graduate and undergraduate total of nearly 11,000.

The two most glaring inadequacies are the Bailey library and the Patrick gymnasium. Both were built in the early 60's and designed for an enrollment of less than one half the size that UVM maintains today.

There is no question that if the university is striving to enhance its reputation, raise academic standards, and increase the quality of the faculty, improved facilities are mandatory ends toward this goal. Few eminent scholars will be attracted to teach at UVM if they feel the library is insufficient to pursue meaningful research. And, indeed the school will become less attractive to prospective undergraduates if the athletic facilities are overtaxed to the point where it deters participation.

Fortunately, with regard to the library considerable progress has been achieved. Currently, 75% of the projected $4 million budget for a new addition to the library has already been procured. The final million will hopefully be incoming through private donations; but, in the event this fails, an increase in the current annual $30 library fee is anticipated.

Construction of the new wing, which will theoretically be completed by the fall of 1979, will provide several long overdue improvements. The most prominent of these will be a two-fold increase in the seating capacity, relocation of the all-night study, and supplemental audio–visual and research facilities. So, for those students who understandably feel crowded – especially during exam periods – relief is on the horizon.

Unfortunately however, while the new library wing will soon be a reality, gym expansion is still in doubt. Last year the legislature, due to post recession conservatism, and a fundamental misconception of its necessity, rejected funding for an expanded gym. This year, however, confronted with the happy dilemma of distributing a state budget surplus exceeding $20 million, the granting of the appropriation appears more likely. Already Republican Lt. Governor T. Garry Buckley has expressed his active support for the project.

It cannot be stressed enough to the legislature how important an improved gym really is for UVM. Designed for a student body of 4,400, the present facility, once lauded as one of the best in New England, can simply no longer service a university of this size. Athletics, and success of a school's teams are fundamentally important to the morale of any college. While recently dismal performances of Catamount athletic teams cannot be blamed solely on poor facilities, better ones would most likely draw better athletes to the school.

Furthermore, there is another critical issue to be considered here. Title IX, a law requiring equal facilities for men and women, has compelled the university to either construct new locker rooms for women or to partition off the present male ones. A brick wall through the middle of the men's locker room is hardly an acceptable alternative.

The new budget request before the legislature has been curtailed significantly and calls only for internal renovations within the existing structure. This is indeed a fair request and the Cynic urges the legislators to seriously evaluate all the issues and make a favorable decision. After all, few great men would disagree that sound intellectual growth can only be most effective with simultaneous development of the body.

Misconception

To the Editor:

For the interest of those who seek for some reason to deny the necessity of change when change is needed, or who perhaps do not read the references which are available, I would like to suggest in response to D. Meany's letter of the 16th that the accusations that the Cynic brought out in the editorial of February 9 are not only documentable, but apparently unchangeable within the context of the present SA administration. Many attempts to improve the current habits of the S.A. have been made over the past two semesters by numerous different people, and they have all come to nothing. Indeed, the current S.A. has been behaving as though it was "unavailable, slow, inept, and indifferent... irresponsible... misdirected." Although the experience of the aforementioned letterwriter may have been perceived as different, I am suggesting that the S.A. has been behaving in this manner over the past six years that I have been involved in it personally. I might like to suggest that the perception to the contrary is a result of one's point of view and that D. Meany is suffering from the prejudice of his past commitments. I am sure that a large portion of the student body would concur with him in his estimation of the performance of the S.A., and that is because the only contact they have is when they pay the fee, and/or if they drink alcohol. Any time that D. Meany or anyone else would like documentation of the above actions I would be more than helpful in guiding them to the appropriate documentable occurrences.

In relation to purpose, I would like to refer D. Meany to the preamble of the S.A. constitution for clear deliniation of the single purpose for which the S.A. exists.

With fondest hopes for creative innovation

Road Salt

To the Editor:

I would like to express some thoughts generated by the attack on road salt published in your recent issue.

I wonder if Mr. Haynes drives. I do. I commute almost 100 miles a day, and have seen the condition of the roads this year. I would say that there has been at least a 30% reduction in salt usage over the last few years. I have driven home at night in freezing rain on unsalted roads; I know of two people killed in similar conditions; I have tried coming up the hill in Winooski in a snow storm. Road salt is not an academic matter.

Reduced speed limits (they are presently at a modest 50 MPH) may seem a smart solution to someone who does little or no driving. I would not appreciate it, as I already spend two hours a day driving. Civilization does not come to a standstill for a storm. If it does, it's called a disaster.

It is precisely the attitude displayed by VPIRG's insistance that the Highway Dept. prove itself innocent in road salt contentions that makes that organization noxious to me. Defendants in our legal system are not assumed guilty until proven innocent. I suggest that VPIRG provide the people needed to shovel out those sand catch basins each spring. Maybe they will appreciate the fact that the road exists for them, and not in spite of them.

The arguments against road salt focusing on safety are inconclusive. That 'snowy roads cause more minor accidents' makes sense, but it is not clear why there should be fewer fatalities on snowy roads, or what conditions produce more fatalities.

If people are looking for environmental issues, I would like to see attention directed to the practice of spreading manure on frozen ground. I think this one practice has a greater influence on our environment than road salt.

And you can help your car survive the winter. Wash it.

Splendid Review

To the Editor:

Your critic Tricia John wrote a splendid review of the Christopher Parkening concert. Any musician who, as Ms. John says, is devoid of feeling, discredits his profession and betrays his fellow musicians. It's unfortunate that the audience, in its eagerness to embrace the "classics," was so easily conned by this uninspired pseudo-artist.

On The Feminist Movement

Don't Knock It

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter in response to the article written in last week's Cynic entitled "Either She Wins or She Wins." I am not a radical women's "libber" or a feminist. All I ask is that women be given the chance to compete on an equal basis with men. For women as well as for men, "success is not only desirable but mandatory." I am paying $5200 a year to go to UVM certainly not because I have nothing to lose but precisely because I have everything to lose if I don't. Women have been given the key that unlocks the door leading to equality but that door is still bolted and jammed shut by the forces of society, 1000 years of tradition.

In applying for a certain job or promotion, men have to compete against those who are equally or more qualified than they are. However, women still have to compete against those more qualified and less qualified, and what is expected by society and stubborn employees who often still discriminate. It is no wonder that the chances of greater financial success are better for men.

Success is "obligatory" for every human being regardless of sex, race or social class. Of course there are varying degrees of success, but in order for a person to have any self-respect, he or she must be successful in some realm of society.

Mr. Albee is right, for once, in concluding that most females still expect the male to pick up the tab on dates. But is it not also true that most males invariably expect to? When I

"Either She Wins or She Wins" reflects limited insight into the female undergraduate's position in college today. The option of becoming a supported wife, enjoying the luxury of bringing up children and maintaining the household, is one that is fast disappearing. As the economy of the country changes, it is an option that few women will "enjoy." I, for one, would not be in college if my mother was not employed. The presupposition that the option of being a wife and mother is an enjoyable one is open for debate. Few women still view this role as being an ultimate goal in life – there are many drawbacks in being simply a wife and mother.

What is it that keeps women from taking their careers and their independent lives seriously? Is it because when they were growing up no one ever took their career goals seriously? Are there really women here for the sole purpose of finding a husband? What does this reflect about our current social structure?

I believe that expectations have a great effect on performance. If a man is expected to have a career and has a lot of positive impact from his environment, this gives him the necessary encouragement to take his education seriously. Many times women get very mixed signals from their environment and this creates confusion and a lack of direction. Ideologies have to change before women can have equal status in American society. Women have only begun to have an effect on the inequities in the American society. Women should open their own doors and pay their way on dates – they have the strength and capability to take care of themselves.

The attitude that Luke Albee maintains in his commentary is precisely the attitude that keeps women from emerging from their shells and

The Watergate Payoff Continues

OPINION

If the affairs surrounding Watergate taught us anything, it is this: if you're thinking of writing a book, get involved in a scandal first. In the end – looking out through Lompoc Prison windows towards brighter and wealthier futures – it is an empirical observation of increasing clarity that crime, in fact, does pay, particularly for those conveniently placed high officials with a flare for penmanship and an itch to tell it like it was.

The list of successful published works stemming from the devious incidents inside the curved, corrugated cement monstrosity of a hotel overlooking Whitehurst Freeway (and other crowded D.C. focal points) is long and telling indeed. We have yet to hear from Nixon's busboy, or the Roosevelt Room janitorial crew – maybe we have – but don't count them out. Everyone wants a piece of the pie.

Such was emphasized in last Friday's New York Times. There Haldeman got a front page, center-left advertisement for his new rehashment of Nixon's bungle – The Ends of Power – with the first of five exerpts to be printed appearing on page 17. Not even Tolkien receives such coverage, let alone no-names like Vonnegut or McPhee, all of whom make it no further than the New York Times Book Review. Whether Haldeman has lied about Russian intentions concerning a nuclear attack on China in 1969 remains to be seen. Former Secretaries of State Rogers, Kissinger, and the Soviet Union insist he has. Regardless of the truth, the controversy won H.R. another free New York Times front page advertisement – Saturday, February 18, 1978 – and should up his sales greatly.

The sequence is becoming quite standard – and reliable. Party A makes a threatening acquisition or observation; Party B, who is threatened, completely denies – "resolutely refuses" – the ridiculous invention; the ears of the consumers perk up; author makes friends with book distributors and speech circuit agents.

The message is clear; tales of the good guys don't sell novels; nor do fictional documentaries; non-fiction; or movies; or neckties; or solid chocolate miniatures of the buildings which played a critical role in the incident. Ask your buddies to name ten current governmental officials noted for their integrity and honesty. Tough? If your household is similar to mine, "ma" and "applepie" are having their status as the premier household lingo challenged by names such as Ehrlichman, Hunt, Colson, Liddy, Mitchell, Richard M., and Haldeman. Familiar names? Try listing LBJ's crew, or Carter's for that matter.

This is not confined to Watergate. Of thousands of current and former congressmen and other government officials – many of whom worked their heart out in attempting to honestly serve the nation and their constituents – who did UVM choose to speak on the subject of "Government – Master or Servant" last semester? Bert Lance. Why? It certainly wasn't for setting up a boy scout troop down the block.

Lance's delivery aside, one wonders why he, and not some veteran senator or representative of ten to fifteen years service, is considered the authority on the role of the federal government in a republican system. Yet delivery and authority, if not irrelevant factors, are at least secondary concerning Lance's speech, or the books of Haldeman, Dean, Mitchell and others – the connection between best sellers and quality literature is not always completely clear. Instead, the product for sale here is the author's or the speaker's relationship with the mystery of the corruption, with the thrill and excitement of the scandal.

And it's selling! Which sheds an interesting light on us as the public, because we're buying. It's understandable. The alternative is Star Wars and one must admit, there is some pleasant novelty in having someone other than the good guys win out in the end.

"The sequence is becoming quite standard and reliable. Part A makes a threatening acquisition or observation; Part B ,who is threatened,completely denies-"resolutely refuses"- the ridiculous invention;the ears of the consumer perk up;the author makes friends with book distributors and speed cicuit agent."

The Power of the UMWA

By Eric Pollard

INSIGHT

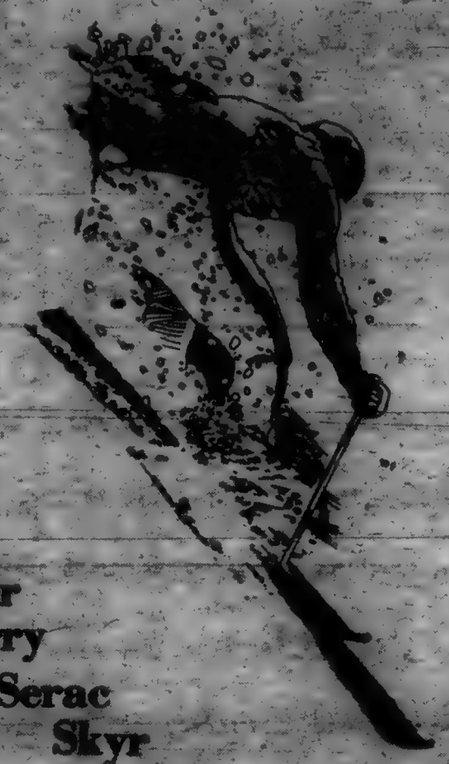
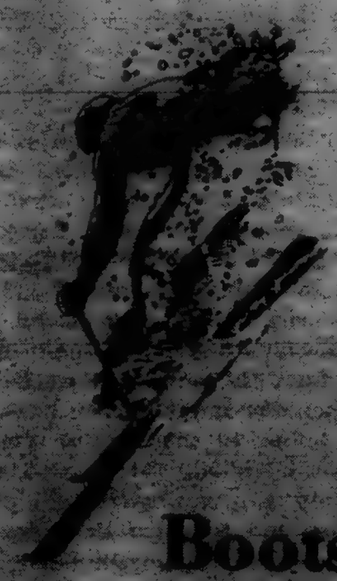
The longest coal strike in the history of the United States seems to be destined to continue for some time. There is no way of determining when the miners will be ready to go back to work to alleviate some of the shortages their strike has produced. The union seeks a contract that provides for an increase of 35%, or $2.35 hourly, over the next three years. It also seeks guarantees of the right of individual locals to call a wildcat strike to protest conditions in individual mines, and to maintain control over the health and pension funds into which the coal companies pay to compensate the work force for the exposure to danger inherent in the mines.

railroad industries. The eleven week-old strike has forced the cutback of output by several utility companies, including the Duquesne Light Company of Pittsburgh, which announced a 20% cutback this week. President Carter has begun to make threatening noises about the impact of the strike, suggesting that if the union and the industry cannot settle their differences, perhaps the Federal government can correct the situation by utilizing federal troops to reactivate the mines as did Truman with the steel industry in the early fifties.

Problems exist within the union to such an extent that the president of the union, Arthur Miller, no longer has control over the negotiations or union demands. The strike involves 160,000 members of the United Mine Workers of America and has forced the layoff of several thousand workers in the steel and



The only salable alternative is the settlement of contracts on an individual basis, mine by mine, individual local by individual company. This suggestion also originated in the White House, and would seem to be a fair solution to the problems now facing Secretary of Labor Marshall as he attempts to negotiate a new contract. In the eyes of the union, however, such action would be tantamount to the destruction of the labor movement, at least in relation to the bituminous coal industry. The union will not allow its individual locals to negotiate their contracts because to do so would be to forfeit what power it has to organize the miners and wield the collective financial strength that entails. The union has, in fact, already exceeded the limits of its power by trying to force the industry to grant concessions to a group that cannot get its own house in order. While quite willing to consider the requested pay increases, the industry negotiators are adamant about their refusal to give guarantees of clemancy for wildcat strikers and to allow the union complete control over the pension and health funds, and rightly so. How can they be expected to run a business when the workers can walk off their jobs without fear of punishment of one form or another? The miners also stand a better chance of getting all of the funds put aside for retirement and health benefits if there is some element of oversight provided to insure that the money is not misused by the union management. It is the interest of the miners to have the industry as a watchdog over the union because the industry is not likely to allow any of its money to go where it does not belong, unless of course it happens to be back to the industry.



The workers must soon choose between their own welfare and that of the UMWA. Union strike funds cannot last forever, and the miners are bearing the burden of the work stoppage. Two miners have already died as the result of strike related clashes. Inflexibility will not strengthen their position, but rather will make it more vulnerable to the kind of civil strife that has marked the history of the labor movement in the coal industry. The union is not inherently to blame for the present state of affairs, but because of the internal struggles that characterize it, it is no longer an effective representative of the interests of its members. Perhaps a change of leadership will be enough to correct the problems that exist, but one thing is a surety; the organization of the United Mine Workers of America is no longer a contributing element in labor-management relations. The sooner the miners act on this fact, the sooner they will be able to achieve their objectives. The reform must come, even if it is at the expense of the hundreds of thousands of Americans who depend on coal to light and heat their homes.

Types of "Success"

To the Editor:

In an article entitled "Either She Wins or She Wins" Luke Albee has presented his views on the status of American women. The author's opinion, though somewhat difficult to glean due to the incohesive manner in which it was presented, seems to be that women in America have two options in terms of how their basic needs will be provided. If a woman is fortunate enough to be successful at school and find a job upon completion of her degree, she may work and be self-supporting. However, this is not the way things must happen. Should our typical woman not find success and career, she always knows that she may look elsewhere and find husband with success and career. Her male counterpart, however, is doomed to financial success.

What the article's author fails to examine is the difference between success through a career and "success" through someone else's career. The effect that societal approval of both routes has on many women is also something that should be explored. Surely many women are happy and productive being married and supported by their husbands. I believe, however, that this is often a role which gives a woman little power and little opportunity to make decisions which influence others. The general approval and recognition of this role furthers the depowering of women, for it lessens their commitment to personal career success.

Men who feel they "must" succeed surely work harder to do so than do women who are continually told that they can have someone else succeed for them. However, it should be recognized that the two options advertised as available to women do not lead to the same end. True, either way she is fed, clothed and housed. But in many cases, rather than winning or winning, a woman will either win or surrender. She will often surrender her independence, her power and her influence. She may be perfectly content in doing so. Or she may struggle to accept and fit into her role as the dependent, the subordinate.

Our society continues to stress the rigid need for men to be financially successful, women to opt between career and marriage (as if success in both is not a viable possibility). We are not winning or winning – we are all losers.

offer to pay my own way – and I do – my date insists he prefers to and is even insulted. To be perfectly honest, I would prefer "dutch" dates for many reasons but especially because I realize that in college every student has limited financial resources regardless of his or her sex.

Albee stated that "realistically females still feel they must appear relatively innocent and thereby continue to foster the myth that males are only attracted to the inexperienced bride." Where has he been? That myth went out years ago because it is just that – a myth. A myth is, according to Webster, "a story invented as a veiled explanation of a truth, at least partially traditional." Females who want to "appear relatively innocent" do so not because of any myth but because they want to be respected.

Are females "self-interested"? Of course we are interested in ourselves. Aren't you? Isn't everyone??

becoming powerful human beings. It is this attitude that has to change – and women must fight this attitude within themselves – maybe then women will have equality in America.

I don't know how many times I've heard from my women friends, "There are so many beautiful women on campus, I wish some of them would drop dead..." or "I enjoy makeup, I like to look pretty... that feminist stuff is ludicrous..." It appears that women on campus are afraid to have a common bond of sympathy because they feel threatened by each other's beauty and competence. Feminists are viewed as a crazy group of women burning bras, and women feel threatened by them. But women need each other's friendship and support; this is part of the feminist consciousness.

The Feminist movement hasn't gone far enough, in fact its roots are only beginning to take hold at UVM. Every student should make an effort to tackle these questions within her/his self, and try to affect the inequalities that they see around them.

Clarkson Halts Scrappy Vermont Icers, 7-6

By Paul Gardner

Ahh, Gutterson. Home of Division One hockey action and rabid hoards of shouting students.

As they leave, this year's crop of seniors won't look back fondly upon this season's harsh memories of Gutterson. Monday's Clarkson game was an accurate comment on UVM's 1-8 division one record at home.

Characteristic of UVM's whole season was Clarkson's go-ahead goal at 5:31 of the third, scored by Derek Embody on a little pop-up that jumped over Turcotte's shoulder as he seemed to lose the puck in the lights. Embody had a total of one point coming into this game. Minutes later, though, Clarkson's real big gun put it away as Kevin Zappia unloaded a shot from 20' straight out in front of Turcotte to make it 7-5. Chris Zimmerman scored what proved to be a meaningless goal for Vermont beating freshman goalie Pete Meisinski who had 31 saves in his first division 1 game.

Mielzynsky looked shaky in his first minute. Louis Cote was skating down the left side with a low shot that jumped the goalie's stick as he came out to cut down the angle, but as fans watched in agony the wobbling puck heeled off the post and went wide of the net. From that point the game went downhill rapidly and at the end of a period Vermont was in the hole 4-2. The Cats, led by great skating and forechecking from Craig Homola, Andy Halford, and Bill Reber, outscored Clarkson's Golden Knights 3-1 in the second period to pull into a 5-5 tie. Similar to the BU, Cornell and Brown games, the Cats couldn't close the lid on Clarkson and got stung in the end.

It was a good game for the Cats despite the loss as they stayed in it till the buzzer. In addition, UVM got its power play cranked up and scored three as Gold Knight captain Bill Blackwood sat out a five minute penalty for high sticking Randy Koch to the ice. Clarkson did manage one shorthanded goal during that penalty when Sid Tanchak got behind the Cat defense and held the puck until Turcotte flopped to the ice before lifting a backhander over the helpless goalie's right side.

Randy Koch, Chuck Ross, Bill Reber, Dave Ofnecs, Bill McAlduff, and Andy Halford all played their last game in Gutterson. UVM's fans gave each player a nice ovation at the end of the game; for most it will mean the end of their hockey careers. All have been big forces in UVM hockey.

Coach Cross later lamented "the bad bounce has been the story of the season. In the third period we did a lot of things right, except score. The players gave it their all and we took it down to the wire, but our defense was worn down and let Clarkson through."

Vermont now travels to New Hampshire, Boston College, and Boston University for the last three games of the season. The Cats are now in 13th place in Division One, with a 14-14 overall record and 8-12 division one record.

Herje Powers UVM Skiers to Williams Carnival Win

By Steven Larose

Kare Herje outdistanced the field in the men's jumping competition to power the University of Vermont Ski Team to their 15th consecutive carnival win, topping Middlebury 221-206 in the Williams College Winter Carnival, which concluded Saturday.

Dartmouth College survived a protest and the jumping results were somewhat jumbled, but when the smoke cleared UVM established themselves as the favorite going into this weekend's Eastern Championships at Middlebury.

Scott Light placed third in the Slalom event, but the Cats finished one point behind Dartmouth and Middlebury, 76-75. Kent Belden came in seventh, while Jerry McNealus finished eighth.

Herje made up for the UVM's disappointing slalom finish by racking up a 216.5 point first place finish in the jumping event. Roger Holden took second with 210.7 to further boost Vermont to a 83-63 win over Middlebury in that event. Dennis Lambert and Dave Larson finished 6th and 7th, respectively, for Vermont with 185 and 180 point totals.

Karsten Medtvedt stormed to a 49.01 point first place finish in the cross-country event, as Mark Wagner placed 3rd with a 49.47 score. Mark Quinlan returned from an illness to take seventh for UVM, as the Cats downed UNH, 82-70 in the cross-country results.

Vermont continued to dominate in the giant slalom, with a 81-59 dubbing of Middlebury. Scott Light took top honors for Vermont, finishing second with a 106.67 score. Doug Bruce placed fourth while Jerry McNealus finished in 6th. Kent Belden pulled a

Hoopsters Slugged By UConn

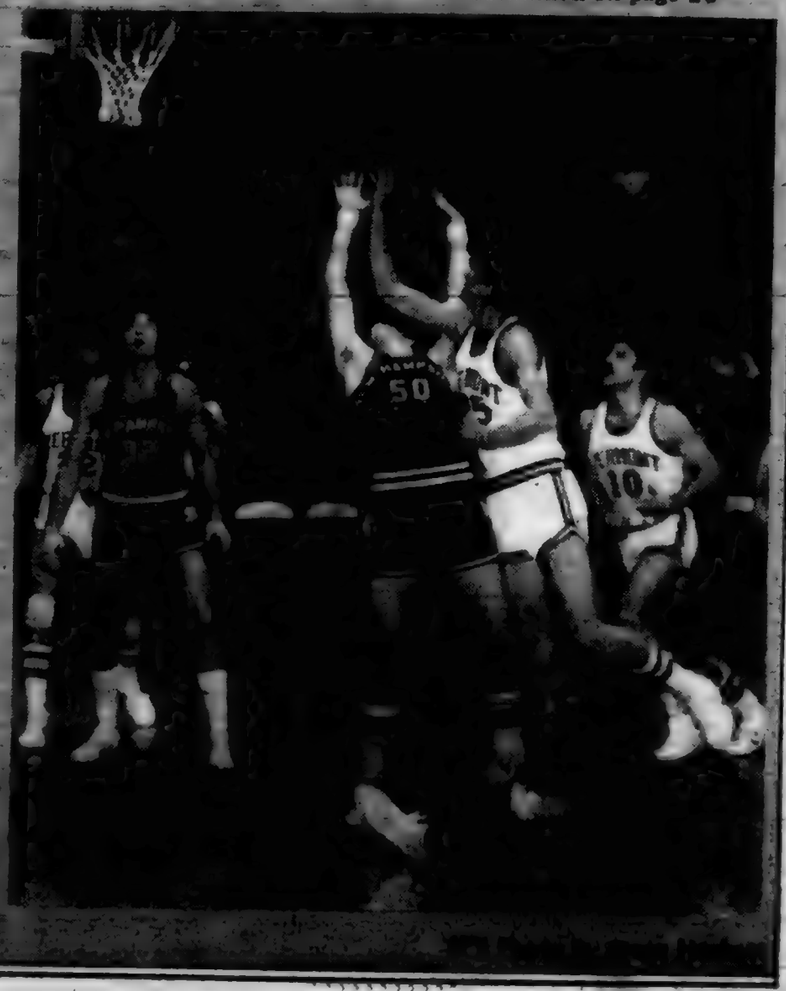
By Steven Larose

A punchless University of Vermont basketball team became a sparring partner for the University of Connecticut, as the Huskies slugged the Cats 59-48 Saturday in Storrs, Conn.

Vermont ran head on into UConn's 2-3 zone defense, and staggered to a 29-20 lashing by the intermission. Vermont never drew closer than seven points for the remainder of the game. But, as assistant coach Greg Ashford later pointed out, Vermont's scrappy defense allowed Vermont to not be totally blown off the court. "Our offense was stymied by their 2-3 zone defense. Even though UConn outrebounded us by almost 20, our defense kept us fairly close when it could have been a lot worse."

Vermont fell behind from the start, but Dane Correll hit from the outside at 14:36 to put the Cats on the board. Mike Kern then dropped in four points and Dave Davis added two more as Mark Sobolewski each scored on drives to pull the Cats within two, 12-10 with 10 minutes left. As in so many games before, just as Vermont was beginning to make headway, the Cats decided to roll over and play dead. Connecticut outscored Vermont over the next four minutes, 11-2 to grab a 23-12 lead. At the intermission, Vermont had hit 10 out of 32 attempts and had nabbed only 15 rebounds.



Vermont's big men, as a result of the 2-3 zone, were forced to the outside, where UConn's big backcourt hindered Vermont even further in the second half. Coach Peter Salzberg later lamented "we weren't tough enough inside to finish off plays and missed a lot of good shots from the outside. Then we were just too far behind to come back against a disciplined team like Connecticut."

Vermont sagged even further in the closing 20 minutes and at one point was down 49-34 before mounting a final rally. The Cats ran off a 12-4 streak over the last 5 minutes, and pulled within seven when Greg Davis sank the first of two foul shots with 1:24 left. Any hopes of victory that Vermont might have entertained were dashed when UConn grabbed the rebound and made a slam-dunk.

UConn outrebounded Vermont by a 42-22 margin and outshot the Cats from the floor, 54.2 percent to 48.1.

Mark Sobolewski and Dane Correll were the high men for Vermont with 11 and 10 points, respectively. Mike Kern had 8, while Tom Perrin and Jim Nocera both dunked six points. Rounding out the scoring was Greg Davis with three and Corey Wielgus scoring two along with Charlie Trapani.

Vermont played scrappy Middlebury Wednesday night and faces national power LaSalle Saturday at the Patrick Gym at 2 p.m.

Engineers Topple UVM Hockey, 8-6

RPI Buries Cats' Playoff Hopes

By Paul Gardner

Coupon No. 18 of the UVM athletic ticket book is listed on the back cover as RIP. That misspelling of the hockey game to be played with RPI turned out to have some validity. Within the first 3 minutes 46 seconds of the 1st period, the Engineers settled the outcome with four goals, as they cruised to a 8-6 University of Vermont hockey defeat Thursday night.

Gutterson has been Vermont's graveyard this year. Coach Jim Cross denies that the Cat's are choking in front of the fans, rather he has attributed the quick retaliation by opponents after UVM scores, to over-exuberance by the Cats (RPI got their eventual tieing goal 44 seconds after UVM had pulled to within one at 5-4).

Against RPI Wednesday night the real bug-a-boo, however, was early first period goals rather than quick retaliation by the Engineers after Vermont scores. Their five goal outburst led to a 5-2 bulge going into the second period. The Randy Koch line with Gordie MacFarlane and Jim Duffy had started things off well for the Cats as the three came out in smoky fashion to bottle the Engineers in their own zone. The Cats, incredibly fired up for this game which would determine which team would make the play-offs, continued to press on offense. Then the breakdown started. Typically, Vermont would start out of its zone with a defenseman passing the puck. Soon calamity would come in the form of an intruding stick wielded by a red-suited player. The puck would flash to another red figure that had lagged in Vermont's zone and he would find a third red figure to redirect the puck past a helpless form in white and green. This happened at 2:59, 3:57, 4:17, and after the Cats scored at 5:17, RPI scored again at 6:45, and 15:41.

Scoring early was the key to the Engineers' victory. "I thought it would be a low scoring game," said Cross. "They opened up in the first and second and kept the wings high (out by the blueline). It paid off for them." It certainly did. RPI got several good breaks, several times sending men in alone against Turcotte for a couple of goals.

Turcotte did as much as could be expected of him. His 20 saves against eight goals does not accurately reflect the kind of scoring chances the Engineers created around him. Even though RPI goalie Ian Harrison had 35 saves, he had more help as RPI played a conservative defense of their own zone late in the second and during the third periods, and thus was not tested as severely as Turcotte.

The Cats played hard all the way against Coach Jim Salfi's Engineers. "Every kid on our team has the flu." Only nine men were healthy for a 3-0 loss to Cornell. They were still down Wednesday and really got what the doctor ordered in getting a nice fat early lead to sit on. A game decided in the third period could well have gone to UVM on endurance as the Cats, though not too healthy either, pressed RPI to the final horn.

UVM Cagers Troubled By Flu

By Randy Briggs

A recent outbreak of the flu at UVM and other area colleges has also hit the Catamount basketball team. The second scheduled game between the Cats and St. Michael's had to be postponed until Saturday, March 4th.

The setback from the flu was another unwelcome blow to Vermont. The Cats have had enough difficulty winning games this year and they certainly did not need to be weakened further by health problems.

Vermont had not completely shaken off the effects of the flu when they hit the road against the UConn Huskies. In their worst offensive show of the season, the Cats only mustered a meager total of 48 points. True, Connecticut played a strong zone against Vermont, but UConn's team is its weakest in ten years. As many teams have done earlier this year, the Huskies soundly beat the Cats off the backboards. A crucial lack of rebounding aggressiveness has damaged Vermont this season.

For the first time in many games, Jim Nocera had a weak offensive performance. He has carried the team load on offense for the past month and a half. When Nocera does not score, Vermont's other problems become evident. Vermont has had trouble producing consistent, well-balanced scoring efforts this year. If Mike Kern or Nocera have bad games, the team seems doomed to defeat.

The loss of Kevin Kelly to an ankle injury looks even more disastrous now in light of the team's inability to perform well on offense. Kelly has had a tremendous amount of bad luck in the last two years. If he had been physically healthy, Kelly could have been the difference in a number of ball games this season. He began the season by developing a tendency to get in foul trouble early. Because of this, Coach Salzberg had to substitute early. A 6'8" forward with a lot of offensive firepower can't help Vermont by sitting on the bench.

Despite this season's fine play from the freshman backcourt, often inexperience has hurt Vermont's chances for victory. Unquestionably, Dane Correll has pulled Vermont through a number of games. On the other hand, his shooting woes injured Vermont in the UNH match. During the whole contest, Correll shot a horrendous total of 0-12. An experienced player would have learned that if he is not hitting when his shots aren't accurate, he should find other ways to help his team win.

Correll was too self-confident, believing his shots would eventually score. Sometimes it takes a dismal performance by an athlete to show he is not a quitter. One should remember that it is tough for a freshman to adjust to college. But Vermont's freshmen have adjusted exceptionally well. In fact they have saved the season from complete disaster.

LASALLE INVADES PATRICK

The LaSalle Explorers, led by sophomore sensation Michael Brooks, will offer top flight ECAC basketball action in Patrick Gym Saturday at 3 p.m.

LaSalle is the eastern division leader of the East Coast Conference. They sport a 5-0 league record with a deceiving 14-10 overall mark. Year in and year out, LaSalle's schedule is one of the East's toughest. Some of this season's opponents included Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Niagra, Syracuse, Duke, Notre Dame and Villanova.

Even though LaSalle has a fairly small team, they can compete with the best of clubs. Spearheading the LaSalle offense is a pair of flashy backcourt aces. Six footers Kurt Kanaskie and Darryl Gladden are two of the reasons why LaSalle can play excellent fast breakball.

Vermont will be seeking revenge after last year's 66-60 loss in Philadelphia.

Women's Skiing

Labaron Squelches Middlebury

By Steven Larose

Gail Labaron, Lisa Morrison and Muffy Arndt swept the slalom event of the Williams College Winter Carnival as the University of Vermont women's ski team handed Middlebury a 157–134 defeat Saturday.

Vermont's strong slalom showing keyed the Cat victory over the Middlebury women, their first defeat in three years. Vermont now proceeds to the Eastern Championships in Middlebury.

Middlebury dominated in the cross-country events, defeating Vermont 60-43. Nancy Dickson took sixth for UVM with a 30.10 score. Janet Reynolds finished eighth with a 30.23 time.

Vermont roared back to take the lead with a 54-48 win over Williams in the Giant Slalom. Gail Labaron finished second, with a 68.89 time. Liz Wormer placed third with a 70.75 time, while Muffy Ardnt was in 7th for the Cats with a 71.88 time. At the end of the first day, Vermont led Middlebury 97-92.

A strong showing by UVM during the final slalom event locked up the carnival, as Labaron swept the slalom with times of 42.42 and 40.39. Morrison finished second with a combined time of 85.76 and Ardnt sped to a 85.78 third place finish. Melisu Papworth finished eighth for the Cats with a combined time of 89.67, as Vermont topped Middlebury 60-42 in the slalom event.

Mary Ellen Rathbone, Women's Alpine coach, remarked that this is the first time both the men's and women's team have won a carnival. "The team spirit will be at a climax for the Eastern Championships. The women are all skiing well and their confidence is growing."

Aquacats Upset Rhode Island

Ron Kirkwood pulled away in the last second of the relay event to propel the University of Vermont men's swim team to a 58-55 upset win Saturday.

In the first event the 400 yard Medley relay, URI took the largest lead of the day by taking a seven point lead. Mark Kinne, suffering from a bad flu and unable to practice for almost a week, was nevertheless able to get an important second place in the 1000 yard freestyle, as URI took a first and third. Vermont then rested its hopes on Ron Kirkwood to change the tide. Kirkwood pulled off a first place in the 200 yard free with his best time this season of 1:49.4. The winning fever caught on as Peter Gelhaar swam the 50 free in 22.7, his best this year, and Steven Leary captured the 200 IM in a time of 2:04.5. Dave Platow managed to add some crucial points by taking a third in the 200 yard in a time of 209.8.

Vermont's Dan Couture took first place in the one meter diving event. Later in the three meter competition Couture then clinched first place with his last diving attempt. Both teams entered the 100 yard free style event knowing that it could be the turning point of the meet. The Aquacats sent Kirkwood to the blocks and once again he banded through with a time of 49.4.

In the next three events URI took first place, but UVM's depth enabled the Aquacats to pick up important second and third place points. In the 200 yard Backstroke Steve Levy and Dave Platow took second and third respectively and in the 500 yard Mark Kinne took a third with 5:11.3. Allan Kopel and Andrew Daniels combined for a second and third in the 200 yard Breaststroke. The spotlight then turned to John Prosbko and Couture who captured first and third places. The score after the diving was URI 55, UVM 51. With Vermont trailing with only one event left, Coach Les Leggett went to his best 400 yard free relay team. The team of Platow, Dave Hammer, Gelhaar and Kirkwood trailed by four feet. With the first three legs of the relay completed, anchorman Kirkwood managed to tie it up and with only twenty-five yards to the finish both swimmers were stroke for stroke. In the end Kirkwood won by less than a tenth of a second to upset Rhode Island. The Aquacats finish off their season this week and prepare for the New England Championship at Springfield, Mass. March 2, 3, and 4.

Gymnasts Trip Over Coast Guard

The men's gymnastic team was handed their first loss on the road last week-end as U.S. Coast Guard pulled a 157.4 to 148.5 win.

Despite the loss, Catamount Hans Nilsson retained his undefeated all-around record with a score of 41.2 in addition to scoring first on rings, and freshman John McDonald copped a first on pommel horse. Captain Mark Ricard took a second on horse as he placed third all-around. Nilsson also placed second on floor exercise and parallel bars.

On Wednesday, February 15, the Catamount gymnasts failed to stop a powerful Dartmouth in the Patrick Gym as the Big Green rolled up a 164.5 to 156.5 win over an injury ridden UVM squad. Again it was Nilsson and Ricard taking first and second all-around as McDonald copped first with his pommel horse prowess. Nilsson added firsts on the rings and vaulting events, while Ricard tallied a second on pommels. McDonald added three third places for the floor exercise, pommels, and horizontal bar while Dan Stragatt placed third on rings. Despite UVM's dominating the first four events, Dartmouth's depth on parallels and high bar put them ahead at the conclusion of all six events.

Coach Tom Dunkley noted that the UVM gymnasts have been performing near their potential capabilities despite a rash of injuries, and only lack of depth has kept them from team totals high enough for victory in the last two encounters. He is optimistic, however, about this week-end's meet at MIT which is the final dual meet before the New England Championships on March 4-5 at Central Conn. He also ventured to predict that UVM stands a good chance to reach the finals through the individual performances of Nilsson, Ricard, McDonald and Ahearn.

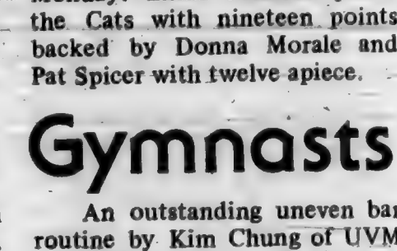
Borg, Martin, Scanlon & Hoehn All to play at UVM in May



Former UCLA star and 1975 NCAA champion, Billy "The Kid" Martin, and former No. 1 ranked player in New England, Ted Hoehn, will join Bjorn Borg and Bill Scanlon at UVM's Patrick Gym in E. F. Hutton's Challenge Tennis Match, May 2, it was announced last week by Harlan C. Sylvester, vice president of the Hutton office in Burlington.

The evening of tennis is for the benefit of the University of Vermont athletic program and the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont.

Martin and Hoehn will join Borg and Scanlon for a doubles match which will precede the singles between Borg and Scanlon. The doubles, one set, will have Borg and Hoehn paired against the youngsters, Scanlon and Martin.

Martin and Scanlon are two of only three players ever to win the NCAA singles championship before reaching the age of 20 and Martin is one of only two ever to win the title as a freshman. The third player to win the NCAA championship before reaching 20 was Jimmy Connors. Connors also was the other player to win as a freshman. Martin was the NCAA champion in 1975, while Scanlon won in 1976.

The sihgles match featuring the No. 1 player in the world, Borg, against tour regular, Scanlon, will be a best two out of three sets and begins at 8:30 p.m. The doubles match starts at 7:30 p.m.

Ticket prices and locations for the Borg/Hoehn – Scanlon/Martin doubles match and the singles with Borg and Scanlon will be announced February 22. Tickets will be available to the public beginning March 1.

Women Cagers Stomp SLU

By James deForest

Margaret Considine grabbed sixteen rebounds and stuffed thirteen baskets as the University of Vermont romped over St. Lawrence University 87-45 Tuesday at the Patrick Gym. Gail McWilliam added twenty-three points to help pace the Cats as Belinda Emerson shot for fourteen points, and Judy Ketcham added ten.

UVM then went on to be edged by the University of Rhode Island 81-74 on Saturday at Cortland. Gail McWilliam led the Cats with twenty-two points while Margaret Consedine connected for twenty. Belinda Emerson, Mary Eddy and Judy Ketchum also added to the Vermont tally with ten, eight and six points respectively. Despite the strong effort, the seven point final deficit could not be overcome by the Cat women.

The women then came back to break away from Norwich University early in the second half to coast to a 61-41 win last Monday. Linda Johnson paced the Cats with nineteen points backed by Donna Morale and Pat Spicer with twelve apiece.

Cornell Nips Women Gymnasts

Despite dropping meets to both Cornell and Springfield, the University of Vermont Women's Gymnastics team gave a strong showing while attempting to qualify for the Eastern Regional Gymnastic championships. Cornell defeated UVM 129.16 to 119.35, with Cortland scoring 128.82, on Saturday. Vermont again scored over 120 points, being topped by Springfield 128.05 to 120.15 last Wednesday.

Anne Berry jumped into first place in the vaulting with an 8.5 score against Springfield. Kim Chung took second on the bars with 7.75 for a unique swinging routine. Janet Lynch placed third in the floor exercise with an 8.7 score, while Kris Costello was third in all-around competition with a 30.1.

Coach Debbie Kosciusko later remarked "The team was very together in this effort. It was encouraging to see a larger audience cheering the gymnasts along."

An outstanding uneven bar routine by Kim Chung of UVM took first place with 8.45 to pace Vermont against Cornell. Anne Berry tied for first place in the vaulting event with a spectacular yamishata vault. Janet Lynch took third place in the floor exercises with a score of 8.6.

The next competition for the women's gymnasts will be the tri-state championships at Keene, N.H. on March 4th.

Karate...

More than self defense

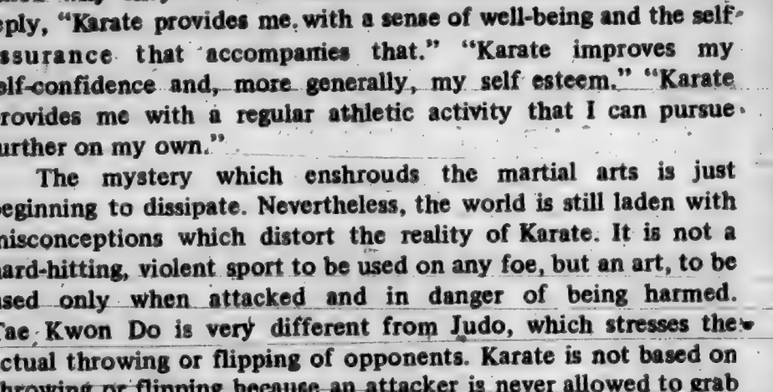
By Rich Chalmers



Karate is an art, a form of self-defense and exercise, but more importantly, karate emphasizes the mental as well as physical development of each of its students. It is through the martial arts that many people find a way to gain confidence, self respect, and a true sense of accomplishment.

Kyong Ae Fontaine, a native Korean, began the Kyong Ae Academy of Tae Kwon Do ten years ago upon arrival in the United States. "When I came to America," she commented, "I missed the discipline, patience and respect that is so much a part of Korean culture. But I can teach my students those qualities through the martial arts."

Karate was recognized as an official sport by the Amateur Athletic Union in 1975, and is growing continuously stronger each year in the U.S. What kind of people get involved? People from all walks of life, young and old, enjoy karate. There are no requirements other than a true desire to learn and develop. When asked why they are true believers in Tae Kwon Do, students reply, "Karate provides me with a sense of well-being and the self-assurance that accompanies that." "Karate improves my self-confidence and, more generally, my self esteem." "Karate provides me with a regular athletic activity that I can pursue further on my own."

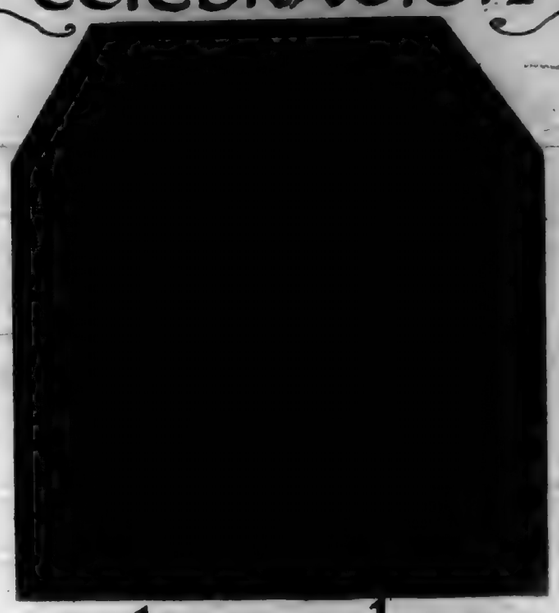
The mystery which enshrouds the martial arts is just beginning to dissipate. Nevertheless, the world is still laden with misconceptions which distort the reality of Karate. It is not a hard-hitting, violent sport to be used on any foe, but an art, to be used only when attacked and in danger of being harmed. Tae Kwon Do is very different from Judo, which stresses the actual throwing or flipping of opponents. Karate is not based on throwing or flipping because an attacker is never allowed to grab hold of you. It is not a sport of opponent against opponent, but rather of each man or woman performing for him or herself. Karate is designed to instill in its students a sense of respect, patience and confidence. It is a psychological and physical art designed to develop the good qualities in a human being.

Now that much of the myth is being dispelled, more and more people are learning karate for the right reasons. Many of the Kyong Ae Academy's students are family combinations such as mother-daughter, father-son, etc. Yet everyone from college students, telephone operators, professors and more, have joined the growing ranks of karate enthusiasts.

Mrs. Fontaine is a highly qualified instructor in the art of Tae Kwon Do. She was a participant in the instructor's seminar of the Third World Tae Kwon Do Championship held last year, and was the only female referee in the World Championship. She is the Chairwoman of the National Amateur Athletic Union Women's Tae Kwon Do Subcommittee and has proven her excellence consistently as a skilled Tae Kwon Do athlete and teacher.

Dae-Yong Kim, Mrs. Fontaine's brother, fourth Black Belt and partner in the organization, came to the United States in 1974. He found the American culture a difficult one to adjust to. "Americans have less respect and patience than the people of Korea." Mr. Kim explained, "The Americans must always know why, before they try something new. Many people misunderstand what karate is all about and they ask too many questions before they try it. We try to teach them many things, including teaching them not to judge until they have experienced something, and not to give up until they have really tried. It is a fusing of mind and body. Without our minds we can't do anything."

"People change when they enter our school." Mrs. Fontaine said, "We get so much pleasure from seeing people grow, both mentally and physically. It is an entirely different world in our school than out in the street. The students' outside identities are meaningless when they enroll here. They are all my students and I treat each one personally and with special attention."



Mrs. Fontaine went on to say that her and Mr. Kim's tasks as teachers are extremely important. There are too many uncertified and unqualified karate schools around the country. "It hurts me," she said, "when poor teachers give students a bad impression of the art. It is a beautiful philosophy of mental and physical confidence and it is a shame when it is taught incorrectly."

"I have as my dream," added Mrs. Fontaine, "to see Tae Kwon Do gain widespread acceptance as a female sport, self defense and spiritual discipline rivaling that of male participation. Unfortunately due to the preconceived misconception of Tae Kwon Do as an aggressive and combative male sport, the female participation has been minimal. But I strongly believe the female physical and technical adaptability is equal to that of the male

The Man Behind The Zamboni

By Gregory Boardman

"I always worry about missing a spot. The fans let me know when I've missed."

Merritt Gordon is "Mr. Zamboni" of UVM. In his seventh year as operator of the Zamboni, he has an interesting sort of philosophy about his occupation as master of the rink. "In the old days they used to be exiled in Siberia. Seems like the low man on the totem pole usually got hooked with the ice rink during the winter. I came here and I was low man on the totem pole naturally and got started with it and I liked it well enough, so I stayed with it."

What's the secret of the Zamboni? According to Gordon, it's all in the blade. "Lots of people are mystified by that situation. Actually, the best thing you could compare it to would be a razor blade. In other words, it puts it from flat up to where it cuts. The steeper you put it up the more it shaves. Theoretically, you're going to cover. The blade sticks out about 8-10 inches on each side of your track anyway, so you cover wider than your track is. The only thing that bothers most people is that the condition of the ice makes quite a lot of difference. If it's a real warm temperature, you slide more on the turns. The colder the ice is, the more traction you have on it. Mainly, it's judgment more than anything else. It comes with feel after awhile."

"Then you have a conveyor that brings the shavings into the center and also conveys it up to the tank. In back of this you have a pipeline with a whole lot of holes in it that lays down the water. It's like a sprinkler system. Then there's what you call a felt that flattens it out."

Besides Gordon, there are four other men who operate the Zamboni. However, he has the night shift and hence more people come into contact with him than they do with the others. He works every night from 4 until midnight except Mondays and Tuesdays. So if there is a hockey game on a Monday or a Tuesday, one of his counterparts will take over the reins.

The Zamboni, which runs on propane gas, is second-hand. "I think they paid somewhere around nine or ten thousand for the thing." It was manufactured in California – still the only place one can be purchased. "It's a controlled industry; a monopoly." And, of course, the man who invented the machine was who else but a man named Zamboni.

In preparing for a game, there is not much work in getting the Zamboni ready. "We try to keep a sharp blade on there which has a lot to do with the ice conditions." Mainly it is work on the ice itself. "You try to get it in the best shape you can. Sometimes you have to take some off, quite a lot off, in different places, because it builds up more in certain places than in others. Sometimes you have to put some back on with water in order to build it up where it's low. Besides that, of course, you've got to clean off around the boards with a shovel and just take care of it with that."

Gordon likes to hear the fans applaud for him. "Sometimes your mind is somewhere else, you hear it but you don't really come to about what's going on. And then again quite often it's real loud, enough so that you've probably seen me throw up my hand sometimes." He especially likes to hear the fans cheer for the team. "I think it gives them more spirit out there when they cheer for them."

Like many students here, Gordon never had much experience with hockey until he came here. "I'm quite an enthusiastic hockey fan now."

Concerning this particular season, Gordon says he is a little disappointed. "I think the boys are working very hard. They're trying, but things just aren't clicking for them. They've had a lot of bad breaks all the way through. It's too bad. I hope they come through with at least a .500 season. I've got my fingers crossed for that."

Ali Defeated by Father Time

By Mark Kevorkian

Leon Spinks has been champ for over a week now. The roar has died to a murmur since last Wednesday night when Spinks and Time punched their way off the ropes in the fifteenth round and beat Muhammed Ali. Everywhere since then we've read Time got the win and Spinks the assist.

And of course it's true. The legs of Ali would only dance briefly before he would retire to his rope-a-dope gimmick which worked so many times before but not now. The hands and arms, pistons once, would no longer pump mercilessly at Spinks' face and body. Even in the last round, where Ali has pulled so many fights out of the bag before, his final onslaught was answered with Spinks' right hand solidly smacking his chin. Ali's instinct was there, but the reactions were not. That made the difference.

"Ali is just a shadow of the fighter he once was"

The reactions haven't been there for several years. Ali is just a shadow of the fighter he once was. The half-fights with the Alfredo Evangelista's didn't buy Ali any time, they only led the way to a sudden end. Ali and his managers didn't see that. They didn't see Time sitting in the corner between rounds next to Ali, pushing him into the ring where his brains took the place of his frayed reactions. Time knew when it was time to switch allegiances and go with youth instead of age, but Ali didn't see it change corners.

The aging champ was bested by an upstart with only seven pro fights to his credit. Spinks was innocent to the rope-a-dope and all of Ali's other tricks which were supposed to exhaust him so he could be polished off. The challenger beat the champ at his own well-used game. Logically, we would think the champ should retire in favor of this challenger and all the others with youth on their side.

There is a cry that Ali enter the ring again and try to win the heavyweight crown for an unprecedented third time. There is no thought to the possibly tragic outcome of such a fight, only that Ali dance his magic once again and leave us shaking our head in disbelief as he walks off with the championship belt.

One more fight will not further instill Ali's greatness in our memories. Another fight can only serve to erase Ali's accomplishments from our minds and the record books.

Karate continued from page 25

because the techniques are applications of physical principles. Many women are beginning to find out about the art, and they are pleased with what they experience."

Entering into the school is not as easy as one might expect. Mrs. Fontaine is not in the business for the money and she is very careful whom she lets into the academy. She only accepts people who are interested in learning the martial arts for their true value. It is not a place to play with one's whims and then give up. One must have a true desire to reap the rewards which the martial arts offer.

In addition to the school in Burlington, there is another Kyong Ae Academy in Hanover, N.H. Mr. Kim is also presently teaching a physical education course in karate for UVM. Classes at the academy cost a mere twenty-eight dollars for a full month and students can come and learn as often as they please during that time.

Mike Charney, a student at UVM, is currently taking the Phys. Ed. course. He commented, "Karate is an excellent combination of discipline and exercise. It is a fabulous skill and it is easy to improve quickly. It has built up my confidence considerably." Charney had nothing but praise for the academy and their methods of teaching.

Martial arts competition will be held in South Burlington on March twenty-fifth sponsored by the New England Association of Tae Kwon Do, of which Mrs. Fontaine is chairwoman. The national championships will be held in Washington D.C. on April 7, 8, and 9. The winners of the national championships will most probably represent the American team in the 1984 Olympics.

Vermont hockey losses to RPI and Clarkson in the past week all but eliminated the Cats from the playoffs. The Cats would have to win the last three games and hope that five of the following six events occur: (1) RPI goes 2-3. (2) Providence goes 1-3. (3) Harvard goes 2-4 (quite possible). (4) Yale loses one of its games with Harvard. (5) Dartmouth goes 2-2. (6) NE goes 3-3. The Cats can lose to UNH and still be mathematically alive, but to make it would require something like Northeastern beating RPI and Providence, and last place Colgate winning three of their last four.

Before last weekend, the playoff race was a battle between RPI and Providence for the number eight spot, with several teams having outside chances. Dartmouth and Harvard visited Penn and Princeton. Dartmouth survived, winning both games fairly convincingly. Harvard bombed. For the third year in a row, Harvard lost to Penn by the same score of 4-3. On Saturday, the Crimson lost to Princeton 6-3.

Result: The playoff race is now a three team battle for two spots. RPI (8-8) is almost a cinch to make it. They took on Brown last night and play UNH on Saturday, and can afford to lose both if they beat Colgate, NE, and Princeton next week. All of their games are at home.

Providence (9-9-0) needed a win against Colgate on Tuesday. If the Friars had succeeded, they will then need one win (maybe two) against Dartmouth tomorrow, NE Monday, and BC next Friday.

Harvard (9-8-0) challenged Cornell Tuesday and plays them again tonight. They could use an upset. The Cantabs need at least three wins in their last six. In addition to Cornell, they play Yale twice, Dartmouth once, and BU in the Beanpot.

Dartmouth (9-10) has four games left and needs three wins. Two of those wins must come against Providence tomorrow night and Harvard on Tuesday.

At the moment, Brown (11-7-1) is in good position. The Bruins have not played very well lately, however, and could slip out of the playoffs if they lose their last four: RPI last night, UNH Wednesday, and a pair with Dartmouth (Feb. 25th and March 4th).

The Cats will have a lot to say in the race for home ice. It appears that BU and Cornell are far enough ahead to stay in the top four, while Clarkson should make it with their easy schedule (Princeton, Penn and SLU). The fourth spot is up for grabs. Brown could take it if they start winning, but it looks like a race between UNH, whom the Cats play tonight, and BC, whom the Cats will visit on Tuesday.

Jon Fontas of UNH has scored three, four and five goals in his last three games. I doubt that he'll get six tonight.

Men's Gymnastics

Nilsson Excels But Cats Stumble

By Amanda Miller

Despite Hans Nilsson capturing his fourth all-around title in as many tries, the University of Vermont Men's Gymnastics team dropped a 164.05 to 156.55 meet to Dartmouth at the Patrick Gymnasium Wednesday.

Nilsson took first in vaulting and rings to capture his all-around win, but his performance wasn't enough to pull off a win for the Cats. Vermont freshman John McDonald won the pommel horse and Mark Ricard placed second in the all-around.

Nilsson placed second in the floor exercise with a 6.45 score, and McDonald took third with a 6.4 score. Vermont swept the pommel horse, with McDonald taking a 7.2 point first place finish. Ricard took second with a 7.15 score and Nilsson captured third with a 6.8 score. In the vaulting competition, Nilsson racked up an 8.65 first place score, while McDonald came in third with an 8.25. Nilsson also took third in the Horizontal Bar, with a 7.35 score.

The UVM Gymnasts will travel next to the New England Championships at Central Connecticut on March 4th.

seventh place finish to round out UVM's scoring. After two events Friday, Vermont had racked up a lofty 163 point total, with Middlebury in second with 127 points.

Coach Chip Lacasse pointed out that even though Vermont is plagued by the flu and injuries, the Cat skiers are determined to keep winning. "We are making our own luck. Even though we don't have much depth in some areas and are facing several obstacles, we are ready for the NCAA's. We keep getting stronger and stronger, so hopefully we will peak for next week's championships. The Alpine team is showing more consistency, and the jumpers are beginning to adjust to the smaller hills."

Lacasse continued "We now have confidence, since we have overcome everything that has been hurled at us. In the past we have been flat in the NCAA's, but this year it's different. This year, we intend to let it all go and give the Championships our 100% best. Being second or third won't be good enough for us this year."

Women's Ice Hockey Team Conquers All Obstacles

By Darcie McCann

The University of Vermont women's ice hockey team, not under varsity status, now receives club recognition and no funding from the University. Through the kindness of the Student Association and Family Associates, money can be used towards uniforms for the team. Currently, the girls have to share their jerseys with the junior varsity boy's team and money out of their own pockets goes for their skates, sticks, gloves, elbow pads, skin pads, and transportation for the away games. For away games, the individual team members rely on their own means to get there. Frequently, the players also have to pay for hotel rooms when going to tournaments. Unfortunately, the tremendous personal cost factor is an enormous discouragement to some girls who would like to join the team. Captain Paula Priestly adds that "many kids are not able to play because they don't have the money to join."

Lack of monetary support is not the only problem. Support of the team still needs improvement when less than sixty people show up for the women's hockey games. The girls' games are exciting; the rules are basically the same for men's and women's play. Coach Weig, comparing his team to others, feels that "it is fascinating to see the girls in Canada and what they have accomplished, and it can happen here. It can be every bit as exciting. Good women's hockey is exciting and great." The UVM team seems to play on the same calibre with a 5-7-2 record against established women's teams, such as Dartmouth, Cornell, UNH and Concordia.

In the recent UVM – John Abbott game, the UVM women's ice hockey team battled to a 2-2 tie against a stronger, more established John Abbott. Goals by Cathy Sagaser, on an exciting one on one break, and Joy Veronneau completed the women's scoring. One of the finest efforts of the game came from the UVM goalie, Ann Bartlett. Bartlett continually made extraordinary saves and prevented any further scoring by the John Abbott Islanders. UVM Coach Roger Weig felt that it was a "road effort — skillwise — against a stronger team."

The girls are presently being coached by fellow students Roger Weig, John McDonald, and Gregg Marston. These men receive no payment or credit by the school. Ice time, for practice, at the Gutterson Field House runs from seven a.m. to nine a.m. in the morning. Because this is the only time the women were allotted, many members of the team are absent from the practices due to eight o'clock classes. Weig says "that city functions have precedence over the women's hockey team," and as a result of this time scheduling, "it does not make for an organized practice."

As for any further progress in UVM women's hockey, Captain Paula Priestley comments that "it is good to have a winning record – something you can work for. I'm looking for a long-term goal, allowing us to reach our potential." She states that this is difficult "because we don't have the money and support we need." Hopefully, in the future, things will change for the three year old women's team. The monetary angle of women's hockey will inevitably have to change; it can't get much worse, but the interest and zest conveyed by these hockey players has overcome all obstacles.

Vermont Women Icers Slip Past Dartmouth

By Melissa Brown

The University of Vermont women's ice hockey team had a busy schedule last week as they defeated Dartmouth 4-3, lost to New Hampshire 11-0, and tied John Abbott Junior College at home. The week was highlighted by some fine defensive efforts and weakened by a less potent offense.

In the first game UVM defeated Dartmouth 4-3. Although the Cats demonstrated superior skating skills, Dartmouth was equally aggressive and gave UVM a challenge, especially during the third period.

Next the Cats played the undefeated New Hampshire Wildcats. It was strictly no contest as UVM was trampled 11-0.

On Saturday UVM and John Abbott College of Canada deadlocked at 2-2 after a sudden death overtime period. John Abbott is currently number one in their division but were not as sharp as their ranking in the first period as UVM notched a goal to take a 1-0 lead into the second period. The goal was scored by UVM defense Joy Veronneau. Veronneau took a low shot which travelled through a maze of skaters and sticks on into the goal to the far left of islander goalie Ridgway.

UVM Coach Greg Marston commented that the game was characterized by UVM's fine defensive effort especially on the part of Bartlett as well as some very effective backchecking and aggressive play by the forwards.

UVM is now 5-7-2 on the season. They next travel to Dartmouth March 3-4 for a tournament involving Dartmouth, Middlebury, and UConn.

Livingston Taylor

The Music Just Rolls Along

By Hugh Busch

Following his first appearance in Burlington since the S.A. concert last spring with Bonnie Raitt, Livingston Taylor finished his 8 p.m. performance at Hunt's last Monday and retreated to his dressing room to prepare for the 11 p.m. showing. After pushing past his manager, I spoke with Taylor or "stone," as he refers to himself in one of his songs.

On tour, he has recently been playing in Ohio, Philadelphia, and Washington D.C. Taylor has not released any albums lately. "Maybe I'll put out another album" he said. "It depends if I get what I think I'm worth, and that's a lot."

"How did you get started in this business?" I asked.

"I first began to sing," he explained with a slight southern drawl, "then I learned to play the guitar, and then I got a job. The most important thing was the last. I got my first job when I was sixteen. I played in Beverly, Mass. for a bunch of people playing chess. No one acknowledged me; they were a very mild crowd. I sometimes wish my crowds these days were as mild." He began to hum, smiling and tapping his fingers on his knee.

"Where do you think your music is going right now? Is it changing at all?" I continued.

"Well I never know till it shows up. My music rolls along."

"Had you been to Vermont before your concert with Bonnie Raitt?"

"Sure, man, I broke my leg skiing at Stowe when I was thirteen."

"Do you plan to ski while you stay here in Vermont?"

"There are three things I've learned not to do in Vermont: ski, argue, and drive fast."

At 11 o'clock the performance began with folk guitarist Dick Orleans, deftly strumming. After he finished his first song, he asked the people in the audience to turn around and say "hi" to the person behind them. It was clear that Dick Orleans enjoyed performing as he hopped around the stage singing ballads such as "Centerpede Shirt" and "Frustration." He finished with an amusing piece on the Jew's harp.

A few minutes later, Taylor walked on Hunt's carpeted stage wearing socks (no shoes), khaki pants, and a sweater. The sell-out audience applauded with enthusiasm as he opened with "Friends." His warm, charismatic style was instantly apparent. He smiled and frowned at his guitar as he played, captivating the audience and demonstrating his skill and experience.

Barely slowing down to receive applause, Livingston Taylor played many of his own songs including the popular "Carolina Day" and "Doctor." He also has that rare talent for taking other musicians' songs such as Steve Miller's "Darling You," Joe Cocker's "Get High with a Little Help From My Friends," and Jessy Collin Young's "Six Days on the Road" and filtering them through his own style in a way which produces pleasingly fresh material.

After about an hour, Taylor put down his guitar and entertained with three pieces on the piano. Then, moving to the banjo, he began to pick foot stompin' music such as "Good Ole Mountain Dew." Leaving the stage after four pieces on the banjo, he soon returned, in answer to the shouting crowd, for a well-earned encore. He took up his guitar again, and began to play Merle Haggard's "Oakie from Muskogie" and. when he finished, the audience called for a song he played last spring in Patrick Gym: "Somewhere Over the Rainbow." He answered this request and then put down his guitar for the evening.

Livingston Taylor said he had "an excellent time" with his 8:00 act. This is not surprising. Hunt's, being a relatively small place for a show of this caliber, provided an atmosphere of intimacy. And, from listening to the crowd as they left, the consensus was overwhelmingly pleasurable. After the show I understood why Livingston Taylor boasted that his music was worth a lot. Indeed it was.

Behind the Scenes of "A Man's A Man"

By Mark LaRiviere

On Friday evening, March 3rd, in the Mann Auditorium of Trinity College, a dozen actors and actresses will revive the spirit of Bertolt Brecht in the City Company's performance of A Man's A Man.

The Widow Begbick dares you to come. To witness the transformation of a man, closely examine change and personality, and observe the barehanded dissection of an individual may well be a haunting experience. For, perhaps, we will see something of ourselves.

Full of earthy humor and comic satire, the play is set in Northern India and involves the antics of a machine-gun detachment of the British Imperial Army. Behind this deceptively simple plot transpires the metamorphosis and reformation of a simple man named Galy Gay. A labyrinth of other levels become evident as each character reveals their modus operandi of the moment. Nothing lasts more than a moment. It is easy to be deceived by the flux of things.

Director Sam Pierson brings to this production a personal vitality that closely parallels that of the German playwright in the 1920's. Unconcerned with elaborate scenery and props, Pierson believes in the concept of popular theater. Theater in which learning is as important as entertaining.

In this play, the only constant is change. With the arrival of the bawdy band of roving players, the theater itself will change. No longer a mere auditorium, it will become an arena for the exploration of human behavior. To the audience an intermission invitation is extended to join the actors on stage for food, drink, and conversation in Widow Begbick's Rolling Bar, a welcome change. The improvisation of slap-stick comedy means a fresh and changing approach for each performance. We'll all change having been witnesses to the forces that will break a man that hasn't learned to bend.

To Pierson, the essential spirit of the play lies in the performers functioning as a team of skilled players. Like a basketball squad, each game is different and depends on the collective strength of individual talents. Rehearsals possess the rakish quality of a locker room punctuated with peptalks and new strategies. Flowing into the seriousness of common effort, the investigation of the characters begins, experimenting and improvising, trying to locate clues of personality that reveal the individual. Forever working and reworking the transitions of action and reaction.

From the beginning, Pierson has had the respect of all involved in the play. Cool and considerate, his sensitivity to the cast's individual abilities and problems has fostered a theatrical family.

The initial two weeks of rehearsal were profitably spent without the script in intense sessions of improvisation. There, twelve unfamiliar people became familiar. Personalities were exposed and a collective confidence was formed. From this pool of experiences, Sam drew on the apparent resources of the individuals and weaved them into Brecht's human tapestry.

The cast is a wealth of talents. When Deborah Dow isn't Widow Begbick, she is either writing, arranging, or performing the musical score. David Poirier, the tyrannical Bloody Five, has written and directed productions of his own and is a founding father of the City Company.

Jeff Kent, an aspiring perfectionist, plays Galy Gay, the indigent docker, with a mysterious and infectious energy. Members of "the Scum," the affectionate nickname of the infamous machine-gun detachment, are played by Paul Schnabel (Uriah Shelley), Al Saltzman (Jesse Mahoney), Eric Raymond (Polly Baker), and Peter Neiburg (Jeriah Jip). Mark LaRiviere plays the part of Wang, the oriental pagoda keeper.

The Widow's daughters appropriately form the Begbick "Jug" Band. They are Jo Schniederman, Marilyn Slaisbury, Martha Tormey, and Terry Tyler.

Behind the scenes are David Corliss, props; Frank Kaufman, lighting and set; Jim Lang, publicity; Karen McGregor, stage manager; and Portia Arthur, costumes.

Widow Begbick, mother of us all, has asked me to pass along this invitation:

"Mr. Brecht hopes the ground on which you stand, will sink beneath your feet like the shifting sand and that while you watch Galy Gay, you'll see that life on earth from danger is not free."

Join us. Opening night, March 3rd. Other shows March 4, 5, 10, 11, and 12, at the Mann Auditorium of Trinity College.

The City Company: "Rehearsals possess the rakish quality of a lockerroom".

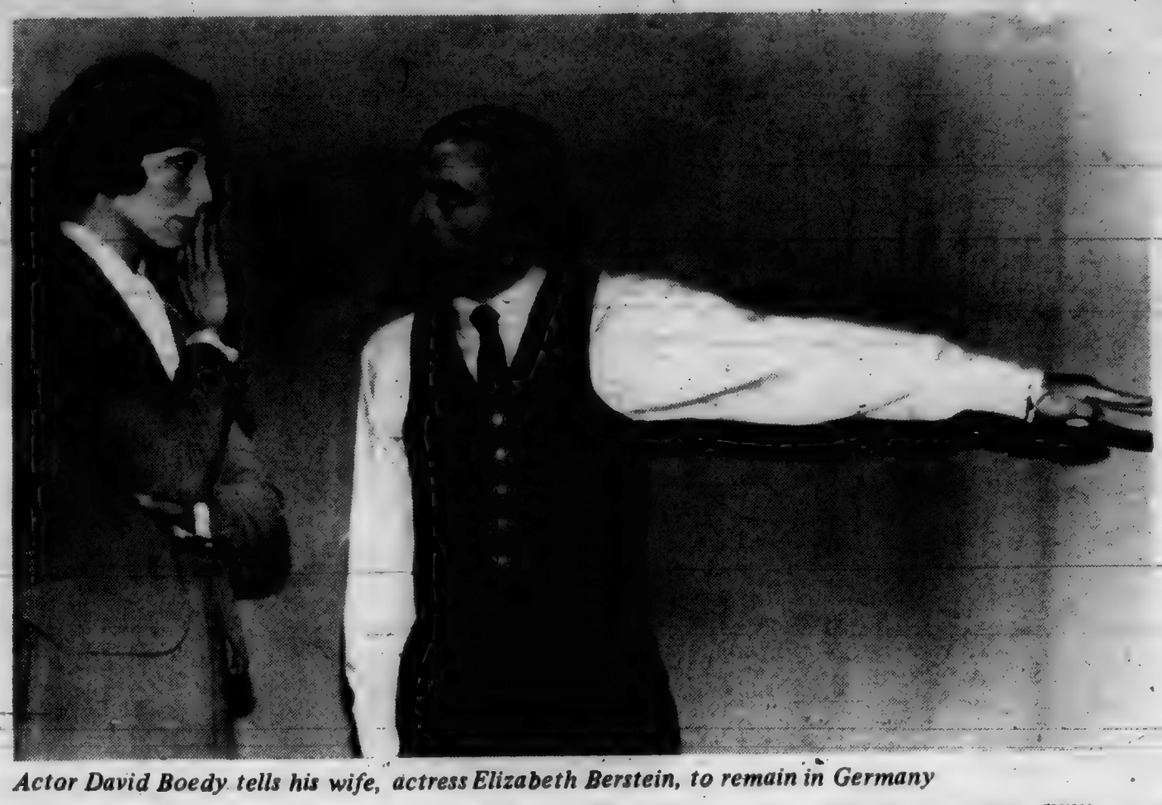
City Company Scores With "Lesser Known Works"

By Jeanie Cooper



Haunted. One sees an evening of amateur acting and leaves with a feeling of chill and wonder. Two plays are over and the third is just beginning. A lean blond figure, donned with a ridiculous striped scarf draped over a plaid flannel shirt, wanders up the right isle of the theatre. Elizabeth Bernstein as the wife in Brechts' one act play "Jewish Wife" continues a difficult telephone conversation with her sister-in-law. The baffled audience watches the strange young man approach the stage and gaze up at Ms. Bernstein. With utmost composure, she takes the wine glass from his hand, firmly pushes him away and resumes her action.

The episode appears to be an intended part of the performance until the apparently possessed figure wanders up the aisle once more. When asked by Ms. Bernstein, still totally in character, "What do you want?" he answers dazedly, "Mime, mime. Have you never heard of mime?" The flow of the play is broken. The director steps out from the wings and Ms. Bernstein announces calmly that they will have to begin again.

What an incredible obstacle for an actress to overcome. Understandably, the audience was distracted, shifting in their seats and looking toward the back whenever the floor creaked slightly. Yet after such total adulteration of her concentration, Ms. Bernstein returned to give the best performance of the evening of three one act plays presented at Trinity College last weekend by Burlington's City Company.

Directed by UVM freshman Jay Collier, "The Jewish Wife" was woven together into a tight scene with an impressive, almost professional air. And one can't place enough emphasis on an actress who carried herself as well as Ms. Bernstein did. With complete assurance in a moving drama, she was able to product the emotion needed without slipping fatally into over-dramatization. Her command of the stage is worthy of much praise as she and actor David Boedy delivered a powerful conclusion to the evening of theatre.

The other two plays the City Company performed last weekend had less startling qualities. In fact, it was quite clear why "Village Wooing" is one of George Bernard Shaw's lesser known works. The two actors who portrayed A and Z failed to stir any real interest from this viewer. The audience behind me even remarked on how unconvincing the actors were during a scene in which they were supposed to be aboard a ship, as each broke character often and lost their credibility.

In comparison, however, the second play had a somewhat more truthful insight into in nature. The performance of Gideon Zahler, an eighth grader from Charlotte Central School, indicated real talent. His role was basically a supporting one to Lauren Singer, a pitiable young girl with wild fantasies, a dead older sister and a rotten banana. Ms. Singer is a graduate of Middlebury College and UVM medical school. This one-act play by Tennessee Williams was stark and brief, the message was forceful and the City Company highlighted many obscure dimensions of the work.

No question that the City Company is going places. They are a growing group that exhibits much energy and enjoyment in their work.

Taj Mahal: "First I'm a African. second I'm a Jamaican, third a black American."

Taj Mahal and Gil-Scott Heron To Perform At Memorial Auditorium

By Randy McMullen

Taj Mahal and Gil Scott-Heron's concert March 3rd, 8:00 p.m. at the Memorial Auditorium, will feature two performers who are too intellectual and culturally distinctive for it to be just another show.

You may remember Gil Scott-Heron for his addition to the George Benson concert last semester in the Patrick Gymnasium, a show that was hailed as "the concert of the year" by the Cynic, and a show many feel that Scott-Heron stole.

Scott-Heron's music has been called "dangerously militant," yet seductive and graceful." And to be sure, he is all of these. He is a contemporary political spokesman for the black movement, who addresses his listeners in a jazz style that is based heavily upon rhythm and Afro-Funk. He has been inspired by John Coltrane, Martin Luther King, and Mao Tse-Tung, and his songs' topics range from racetracks in France to nuclear power to the black movement.

On par with his philosophical and political achievements, Scott-Heron is also an established musician and lyricist. His voice is sweet and low, and his midnight band is a well-oiled and integrated machine. Even if you can't get into his messages, his voice will attract you enough to listen to him.

With Taj Mahal, you can expect to go on a journey to the roots of many different musical styles. His gospel-sounding ventures have brought him to the Carribean, West Africa, and the West Indies.

"First, I'm an African," Mahal told the L.A. Free Press, "second I'm a Jamaican, third a black American. The rest of it is somebody else's mischief."

Taj Mahal is known as an authentic artist, because his music is said to be pure, derived from the roots and kept intact. His performances are perhaps a melting pot of different cultures and their archetypes; but most of all, they are known for their mood. He can win an audience with his good-natured boogie and religious mysticism, or he can put one to sleep with his monotonous blues and spiritual chanting.

It can be speculated that Taj Mahal and Gil Scott-Heron will together provide a unique evening. Musically, culturally, and philosophically, the audience will no doubt be treated to many new interpretations. Whether or not these interpretations are appreciated or even understood depend ultimately upon the roots of the audience.

Ken Bloom and Willie Winston

Musical Monsters Mesmerize

By Peter Relick

What has four hands, four legs, and eight eyes, and plays a combination of nine instruments? The answer is Ken Bloom and Willie Winston. Did the eight eyes confuse you? They both wear glasses.

Besides the lenses, these two talented musicians have no other visible handicaps. In fact, their dexterity and finesse would amaze anyone, from athlete to music-lover, because their control is so profound and their music-sense is so deep that it must be viewed with awe. Unfortunately, this concert did not draw as well as Patrick Sky and his Potstill band – possibly because of the lack of the "big name." But those who stayed home because they did not find one of the programs were the losers in the end, as these two musicians "wowed" the small audience.

Two of the finer points of the program were the ease with which the instrumentalists performed, and the repertoire which they played through. The audience felt as though it was part of a "jam" session between a couple of old buddies, and they played many of their favorite tunes, pleasing themselves as much as the crowd.

Ken Bloom, who has recorded with Linda Ronstadt and Steve Goodman, was the extrovert of the show, both in his playing, and in his dialogue. He cradled his guitar in his lap, and loved every note that rose from it. His long, lanky body seemed to wrap around and protect it, and the tones he produced were worthy of that security blanket. In contrast, when he sat himself behind his concert zither, an instrument of his own invention, he gave the appearance of a schoolboy sitting straight in his chair and pouring over the day's assignment. With every instrument, his character changed. Suddenly, Bloom became the King of Swing as his clarinet wailed out clearly and strongly through the audience. At another point he became the staunch and majestic Ukranian strumming away on the bandura, while singing his national anthem.

Winston was the straight man of the act, but musically, he didn't fall for anything. The man became a part of his pedal steel guitar, and the clear sweet tones gave the room a more mellow and relaxed feeling. Winnie also did some great banjo licks, among the best being "Schuckin' the Corn," by Earl Scruggs.

The duos' singing attempts cannot be rated as the best to ever hit UVM, yet there was a certain naivete and earthiness in the way they poked through their favorite folk ballads. The diversity of the songs performed left almost no area of music untouched. From a song whose chorus lamented about a "lunchbox full of broken hearts" and a "thermos full of tears" to "Somewhere over the Rainbow" performed on the Ukrainian bandura, they just about hit them all. Bloom also displayed his prowess on the Nurthumbrian pipes, and his humorous songs helped to make the time go fast. And it did move quickly. The last twenty or so survivors who stayed through the concert in its three

Bluegrass Showcase Features Two Top Banjo Pickers

On Saturday evening, February 2?th, the University of Vermont will host a special Bluegrass Showcase featuring the two best banjo pickers in the U.S. – J. D. Crowe, from Lexington, Kentucky (the "Bluegrass" state) and Don Stover, born in Clear Creek, West Virginia. Also on the show will be Vermont's favorite bluegrass band, Pine Island, from the Burlington area.

J. D. Crowe and Don Stover are probably the two best Bluegrass banjo men currently playing show-dates. Born within one hundred miles of each other, down in the most remote mountains of eastern Kentucky and southwestern West Virginia respectively, both men are known throughout the Bluegrass world for their impeccable taste and that all-critical "drive" – the backbone of the true Bluegrass sound.

J. D. Crowe and the New South currently features J. D. on the five-string banjo, the rock-solid lead vocals and flat-top guitar picking of Keith Whitley, tenor vocals and crisp mandolin work of Rhode Island-born Jimmy Gaudreau, and the unusual left-handed fiddle work of Bobby Slone.

Don Stover and the White Oak Mountain Boys are well-loved by Yankee audiences, both for Don's work with the Lilly Brothers at Boston's "Hillbilly Ranch" for 17 straight years and through the White Oak Mt. Boys' many shows in and around the Boston area. Stover's band includes Don on the five-string, the incredible Al Jones (a super singer from Maryland) on guitar, Dick Staber (formerly with Del McCoury and the Dixie Pals) on mandolin, Bill Sage's fluid fiddle and New Hampshire's own Howie Dearborn on bass. Stover, who now lives in Maryland on a farm with his wife and 8 or 9 of his 13 kids, has been recorded dozens of times and appears with the Lilly Brothers on the County label, Folkways, Prestige, Starday-King, MCA, as well as dozens of others. He currently records for Rounder and has a best-selling LP called Things In Life.

And we are very pleased to be able to also present Vermont's favorite Bluegrass band, Pine Island. Gordon Stone knows how to play the five-string, city and country-style, Tim McKenzie is a good singer and does some fancy finger-picking on the guitar, David Gusakov's fiddle has lovely intonation and Jim Ryan, on mandolin, has got that old drive... James McGinniss rounds out the band on bass. Pine Island has added immeasurably to Bluegrass here in the northeast... they are a good solid band and well deserve their enthusiastic following.

The show takes place at the Ira Allen Chapel, UVM; showtime is 8 p.m., presented by the Vermont Folk Music Society and the Boston Area Friends of Bluegrass.

The Lady From Boston

By Jeffrey B. Aronson

Tom McHale, The Lady From Boston

Social leaders, through their official channels of communication like People magazine, have informed us that the '70's comprise a decade of self-awareness. This mellow, laid-back decade has supposedly brought with it a new inner comfort shared by all. Its conduited run the gamut from the Unification Church and EST through Silva Mind Control, Power through Intimidation, to Dale Carnegie. All promise a new-found happiness through a better understanding of YOU. This being the case, the nation should find itself swimming with joyous, caring citizens, crying "Hi, I'm an American, how may I help you?"

However, we are more likely to find ourselves, like Russell Baker, stranded between television commercial make-believe and reality. Baker's fantasy includes bow-tied, capped service station attendants who sprint like Harvey Glance to your car as you pull up to the pumps. "Check your tires and battery, sir? No problem – here, let me clean that back window for you!" Other commercials contend that hundreds of fast-food franchises contain hordes of eager servants, bubbling with excitement over your arrival. The realities differ slightly. Finding a gas station where the jockey does not throw your gas cap onto the trunk, or clean the windshield (if at all) with the same rag with which he checked the oil, brings me to my feet with applause. Similarly, lines of customers seem to sprout uncontrollably along Shelburne Road as phantom waitresses fill their orders, french fry by french fry, ice cube by ice cube.

Inner peace has neither brought national civility nor pride. In The Lady From Boston, Tom McHale degredates the '70's and the citizens who populate the decade in a novel of black humor, outrageous cynicism, and strong sentiments.

McHale introduces a variety of hopeless, unlovable characters. His anti-hero, Dwight David Aldrich, of Abeline, Kansas, becomes "an inevitable victim of his really shameless posturings for universal moral reform and just plain low-down greed. All told, he had thought that for people like himself America was really quite a manageable Republic from sea to shining sea, until all sorts of unforeseens ganged up on him and harshly smote him down." His problems began when Richard Nixon, his idol, resigned in 1974.

Aldrich lives in a "tumbledown Disneyland" called North Hollow, a four-seasons, condominium resort he constructed in the Northeast Kingdom of Vermont. North Hollow had turned into "a near-ruined monument to his short-lived entrepreneurial dream that had become a veritable chimera of implacable investors, strung environmentalists, warring lawyers, heartless utilities, and poker-faced auditors of the IRS." The foibles of Vermont-living are all too explicjtly catalogued in the novel.

Lydia Welch, of the Boston Welches, is featured as the book's heroine. Daughter of the famous civil rights attorney Danton Welch, she shuttles between her Milton (Mass.) estate and her farm near Shelburne, (Vt.), along Lake Champlain. A new-found radicalism during the '60's places her in the leadership of numerous anti-war demonstrations in academic island throughout the Midwest. When the Pacifist Queen announces her intention to take over a building at Aldrich's University of Nebraska, Aldrich plans (along with his compatriots in the local YAF) to squash a bunch of non-union grapes in her face, hopefully in front of a wire-service photographer. Instead, he find himself utterly enthralled and aroused by her "tirade of imprecation that rose from some deep, almost libidinous place in her. Sensing his lust for her body and family money, he joins her in an occupation of the Records Office and begins his life of ineffable crassness."

The book does not lack for weird characters. An Indian, named Charlie Wishing Ten Fingers, accompanies Lydia on her journey; he has a degree from Harvard Law and a viscious temper. He also lives with his cousin, the 300-pound Sybaritic Hawk, in a dump near Saugus. The book's only honest individual is Boston cop Pasquale Mugiani, who prowls the Combat Zone pummeling johns who proposition nice Italian girls. Aldrich spends one Thanksgiving with his great aunt Zebidiah Aldrich, a certifiable looney in Inglenook, Vermont, whose existence was positive proof of the centuries of Yankee inbreeding and its consequences in the region.

The book offers bitter insights into seventies' people, Vermont, Massachusetts, the ills of the Midwest, love and living. It unfortunately does so in a messy style which substitutes fraternity language for clever writing. All the characters arouse instant and long-lasting dislike, so you must be content with enjoying the settings. It works, but for this reviewer, only up to a point.

RECENT CUTS

A Slight Recovery

By Tom Nuccio

Stanley Turrentine, *Nightwings

The invasion of disco into the world of jazz has been a sour affair. This forced marriage of two incompatible musical forms results in a horrifying transition involving many talented jazz artists. Because of this cursed trend, former all-star performers such as Herbie Mann, Bob James and Stanley Turrentine have become "disco-ducks." While two of the above musicians remain contented by just quacking out songs, the other is beginning to strive for creativity and top-rate performance.

Stanley Turrentine's effort towards self-rehabilitation presents itself in the form of his latest fantasy waxing titled Nightwings. The album shows diverse phases, interests and styles previously never witnessed in his playing. Turrentine delves into promising musical spheres on all but two cuts. The result – a freshly unique variety of music produced by one of the brightest blowing tenors in modern jazz.

Turrentine begins the album with a disco-souled repetition of "Papa T." I assume he inserted this poor excuse for a song for purposes of comparison and contrast. Otherwise, it serves no relevant function. The remaining side one cuts exhibit only the potential of something decent. However, soon he recovers and begins to shine.

Side two leads off with the best tune of the set – Joe Zawinul's "Birdland." It is executed in an entirely different manner than Weather Report's spaced out, heavily synthesized original version. With the aid of Claus Ogerman's euphonous horn, string arrangements and conduction, the proudly spoken melody from Turrentine's tenor produces a brightly flavored and full-bodied rendition. More evidence of his rebirth into the world of quality jazz appears on the title track, "Nightwings." This smoothly flowing ballad features an airy yet proud tenor solo gliding over an orchestral atmosphere of perfectly balanced horns, reeds, and strings.

Flat on his back with the horrible symptoms of melodic exhaustion and improvisational repetition, it appeared as if Turrentine was musically dead. Nightwings represents Turrentine's attempt to reemerge as an influential force on the jazz scene. Yes, Stanley Turrentine is alive and in the process of disinfecting himself from that parasitic virus – disco.

Play Harvey, Play!!!

By Russell Flannery

Harvey Mason, *Funk in a Mason Jar

The sound of Harvey Mason's vocal serenadings is comparable to a K.C. and the Sunshine Band single being played at 33 RMP. Fortunately, Mason's livelihood is not dependent on his voice, but his instrumental ability. On his debut album for Arista Records, Funk in a Mason Jar, Mason displays the "best and worst" of his talents.

A self-taught jazz drummer, Mason has performed with Quincy Jones, Tom Scott, Duke Ellington, and is currently the drummer for George Benson. Mason has penned the title song for the film The Graduate and also for television's The Bill Cosby Show.

Despite his commercial successes, Mason apparently finds it difficult adapting to conceptualization of a larger project. Funk in a Mason Jar suffers from an inconsistent format. Unquestionably, the instrumentals are excellent, as Mason has commendably channeled the efforts of the multitude of guest artists. Mason's adaptation of Marvin Gaye's "What's Going On" features George Benson on guitar and is at least qualitatively equivalent to a cut from an album by Benson himself. "Set It Free" and "Liquid" are characteristically relaxing Tom Scott performances.

Yet Mason's vocal attempts represent less than mediocrity. "Space Cadets" may be an attempt at mature electronic jazz, but the listener immediately parallels the song to a theme of a Saturday morning cartoon series. Wisely, Mason enlisted the talent of Merry Clayton and Art Wilson to sing two of the four vocal efforts. Still, the instruments are clearly superior to other cuts.

In short, Mason has both the musical acquaintances and the instincts to assemble a highly respectable album. If Mason allows his music to stand on its own merit in the future, he should achieve greater public recognition for his apparently sincere efforts.

Feld's Ballet Tip -- Toes Into Town

The Lane Series will present the Eliot Feld Ballet on Wednesday, March 1 at 8:00 p.m. in the Memorial Auditorium.

Acclaimed by critics and audiences alike as one of the premiere classical ballet companies in America, the Eliot Feld Ballet has been performing before capacity crowds in New York, Chicago, and Washington, D.C. They were also on a Performing the Arts Series "Live from Wolf Trap," which was seen on network television. The company has just recently returned from a triumphant tour of Mexico, Central and South America.

Eliot Feld, the choreographer of the ballet, is a genius. Hubert Saal of Newsweek exclaims, "Feld's choreographic imagination seems inexhaustible... his dances unusually accessible and his dancers immediately engaging... They come out to knock you dead." "He is the most talented classical choreographer of his generation anywhere in the world. He is an American National Treasure," is praise given Feld by Clive Barnes of the New York Times. Feld and his company will perform "The Consort," "Mazurka," and "A Footstep of Air"" His latest company, formed in 1974, is a mode of stylish unity, strength and energy. These 21 dancers obviously know what they are doing, and they do it with rare dedication, enthusiasm and precision. "This exciting ensemble is 'the' American Ballet Company to watch." – Baltimore Sun

Tickets are now on sale at $7.50 and $4.50. For reservations and information, call the Lane Series Office at 656-3418 or 3419, 284 East Avenue, Burlington.

War Strikes The Fleming Museum

By Peter Relick

An exhibit of the artifacts of war currently on display at the Fleming Museum, takes the various objects of human conflict and categorizes them for the casual observer.

Set up in such a way that even the most devout pacifist can gain new insights into one of man's oldest institutions, the war exhibition is, for the most part, comprised of articles in the museum's permanent collection. The diversity of eras, wars, and artifacts is impressive. From the poisoned shark's teeth sword from Kingsmill Island to the World War I Maxim Machine Gun that shoots 600 rounds per minute the observer is given a broad overview of war.

The exhibit is presented in conjunction with the Third World Seminar, and the exhibition room was designed by Donald Stevenson. Various other students, graduates, and interested people assisted museum curator Nina Parris in presenting the show.

The war is divided into many aspects: the planning, mobilization, battle and the aftermath of the conflict are all illustrated. Features include a photo montage, mobilization posters, instruments of the battle and various sketches of the horrors of the skirmish and its results. A video-tape presentation shows the various stages of the battle from still photos to movies of recent conflicts. The hurried urgency of World War I soldiers as they go "over the top" is both comic and sad as they run in Keystone Cops fashion to their death. The exhibition of and about war treats it in an objective way; since we must live with it, it must be chronicaled and analyzed. The Fleming Museum has taken this monumental task and arranged all of the haphazardness of war into an concise, organized and easily understandable exhibition. War is showing now at the Fleming Museum, and for a deeper understanding of this very complicated interaction of man, there is no better place to go to find the answers.

Bloom and Winston

hour entirety were treated to improvisation at its best as Winston and Bloom mastered a Blues number in Bb on the pedal steel and clarinet.

Overall, the concert was refreshing, and a great look at some very talented men for a minimal price. Mountain Greenery and the Vermont Folk Music Society have done a great job in bringing quality entertainment to this campus and town, and they must be commended. So, if you've been putting these concerts at the bottom of your list of things to do, it may be time to rearrange your calendar. Ken Bloom and Winnie Winston are two fantastic entertainers, whose musicianship made the small admission fee negligible, and whose presentation made the evening a bit different from all of the others.

By Jim Wright

There seems to be an ever increasing number of people who are reviewing SF these days. College papers are running review columns, magazines other than the traditional SF ones are starting to include SF reviews and even the New York Times Book Review has jumped onto the band wagon and has been known to run a SF column. When you strip away style and vocabulary you discover that we all say pretty much the same kinds of things about books. While there are infinite shades of reaction to a given book, in the final analysis you (a) liked it, (b) disliked it, or (c) something inbetween.

In categories a and b there are a whole series of catch phrases on which to rely. For (a) you speak of "tight plotting, holographic characterization, competent craftsmanship, good story," and then you pick a couple of nits to demonstrate discrimination. For (b), invert procedure. The work, such as it is, involved hauling the dictionary of synonyms down from its high shelf.

But in the overwhelming majority of cases, my own reaction spectrum lies somewhere in (c), and that's where a reviewer really works hard. It is difficult to precisely describe ambiguity. There are few catch phrases.

Such is the case I found myself in with The Jupiter Theft (Del Rey Books, 374 pp., $1.95) by Donald Moffitt. I enjoyed the book – on the whole. It is a novel about our first contact with intelligent alien life and is better than most I have read. The plot involves an alien "world" which is discovered coming toward us from the Cygnus star system. They go into orbit around Jupiter and we send out a ship to investigate exactly what is going on. The Cygnans, we find out, have come only to take Jupiter (they need the gas giant for fuel for their ship) and nothing else. They have no interest in mankind except on the biological level. The Cygnans capture the team from Earth – without so much as getting up a good sweat it seems, and place them in a "zoo" of sorts which contain alien life forms from all the systems they have visited. Moffitt paints an interesting and believable alien society in describing the everyday life of the Cygnans that we see. The most interesting feature was the Cygnan's "speech" which is based on musical chords. They are able to sound whole chords at once with each chord a whole sentence or complete idea. I wondered if this was really a realistic type of language, but my friend Bill (who attends the Boston Conservatory of Music) assured me that not only was it practical but that music was the only "true" language.

Moffitt seems to have a gift for portraying conflict and tension which kept me turning pages at near light speed and the real climax of the book, on page 328, literally lifted me out of my seat.

So why the ambiguity? Well, a couple of reasons – the ending was just a little too pat for me. A variation on the old John Campbell idea that "anything they can do, we can do better." Also, while giving us an excellent picture of life among the Cygnans Moffitt never really develops life on Earth. We get bits and pieces throughout the book – just enough to get me interested in how he pictures life on Earth in the future. We learn that Russia somehow destroyed itself, there was a civil war involving New England and the rest of the states, something called the Reliability Board which certifies everyone for a government job, and talk of "dirty privies" who are those without a government job. All this makes up the background of the humans on the Jupiter mission, but that is about all we learn about Earth.

This is Donald Moffitt's first SF book so perhaps we can overlook these complaints. He was attempting to show us the Cygnan way of life – and did so successfully – so he probably felt that a detailed account of Earth life was not needed. I think it would have helped the book by letting us see where Tod Jameson and the others were "coming from."

Jay Ashman, Assistant Attorney General and visiting lecturer at the University of Vermont, will speak on Thursday, March 2, at 7:30 p.m. at Rowell Hall, Room 111. He will discuss the ramifications of certain laws on the consumer in a lecture entitled "Advertising and the Law: The Layman's Approach to State and Federal Laws and How They Affect the Consumer's Life."

All UVM alumni, parents, students and community members are welcome. For more information, contact the Alumni Office, 86 South Williams St, 656-2010.

Wall Street Seminar

See New York's biggest businesses from the inside. This year's "Wall Street Seminar" will visit Merrill Lynch, Avanti Linens, Marine Midland Bank, Lord & Taylor and more. Talk with industry's top execs, March 27–30, during Spring Break. Price is reasonable, program tailored to participant's needs. Sign up soon for this fantastic career opportunity. Information and sign-ups contact Susan Perkins at 862-4515 or Gail Newman at Ext. 2010. Sponsored by the Alumni Department and the Dept. of Business Administration.

X-C Ski

The Student Community in Action (S.C.I.A.), a volunteer organization affiliated with The Center for Service Learning at UVM, has initiated a new project for this semester. The project, UVM Community Cross-Country Ski Program, will provide cross-country ski equipment and instruction for kids in the Burlington area and for established organizations like The Big Brother/Sister Program, Shaker Mountain School and The King Street Youth Center. The program will be free with funding coming from the Student Association. The equipment is being provided by The Ski Rack located in Burlington.

West Indian Fish

On Friday evening, February 24, Dr. George Epple, Chairman of the Anthropology Geography Department at Rhode Island College, will give a slide illustrated lecture entitled "The Heavy Thumb in a West Indian Fish Market" at 8:00 p.m. in L/L C 115 Commons. Epple's talk will cover his anthropological fieldwork among peoples of the Caribbean Islands. The public is encouraged to attend this dynamic program sponsored by the UVM Anthropology Club.

Dairy Deli

On Sunday, February 26th the UVM chapter of the Hillel Foundation will sponsor a Dairy Deli in room 216 Commons at the L/L Center. At 6 p.m. the deli begins with blintzes, kugel, and loxspread. The cost will be $2.00 per person and you get all you can eat. For further information or reservations contact the Hillel Office L/L B127, x3488.

On Monday, February 27th Rabbi Wall of the Ohavi Zedek Synagogue will speak at our last coffeehouse. He will speak on the Jewish Life Cycle and will start at 7:30 p.m. We will meet in L/L B162. Everyone is welcome at both events!

On Meditation

On Thursday, March 2, Howard Lipson of the Burlington Dharmadhatu will give a public talk entitled "Mind and Mindfulness: An Introduction of Meditation." Howard is a student of the Venerable Chogyam Trungpa, Pinpoche, a scholar and meditation master from Tibet, who has introduced many Americans to the validity of meditation practice in modern life. Speaking from his experience of several years as a practitioner, Howard will discuss what we can and what we cannot expect from meditation. Though a complex subject in theory, the actual practice is quite simple. All are welcome to hear Howard in A-101, Living and Learning Center, at 7:30 p.m.

Thirsty Ear

WRUV which has been carrying the syndicated concert series for new artists, Thirsty Ear, will now present an expanded coverage of the program. WRUV officials noted that due to the excellent response of the programs, the producers of Thirsty Ear were able to go bi-monthly.

To start off the new series WRUV will present NRBQ and Larry Gatlin in a one-hour special on March 1 at 10 o'clock. The following week WRUV will present "An Evening with Aztec-Two-Step" on March 8 at 10 o'clock.

Davis Brothers

The rock band, Davis Brothers, will be returning to UVM on Friday, February 24. The event is an All-Campus Dance sponsored by the Junior Class. All the fun starts at 9:00 p.m. at Wright Dining Hall on Redstone Campus. It is B.Y.O.B. but plenty of mixers will be provided at no charge. The cost is only $2.50 per person or better yet, $2.00 if you purchase an advance sale ticket. You may purchase advance sale tickets at 318 Wing, 531 South Converse, 420 College St. (Sigma Phi), Alumni House, and from any Junior trying to sell you one.

The Junior Class needs your support. So boogie up to Wright Dining Hall and Dance! Dance! Dance!

A smoking treatment and research program is about to start at the Howard Mental Health Services. The program will use the treatment techniques which have been found most effective during the past ten years. Group treatment sessions will be held in the evening. To participate in this program, you must (1) have smoked at least 5 years. (2) smoke at least 20 cigarettes a day (1 pack). (3) have no history of cardiovascular problems. (4) plan to remain in the area at least one year. A fee of five dollars will be charged for the

Sun Day

Plans for Sun Day, a nationwide day of celebration of the sun and the potentials of solar energy, have begun at UVM. A group of students met Thursday Feb 16 to discuss plans of the upcoming event to take place on May 3rd. Activities will include demonstrations of solar equipment, films, speakers, solar art, workshops, and public education campaigns. Committees have been formed to plan the different activities. If you were unable to attend last week's meeting, but would like to get involved, check the VPIRG office door in the North Lounge of Billings for more information, or call Judy Vanderryn at 656-4250 or Rob Wilke at 862-9497.

Psychic Consciousness

This and every Monday night for the following 4 weeks there will be a free intensive course in psychic consciousness and the beginning steps of meditation.

The course has no limits. It covers anything that you've ever wondered or thought about spirituality. Including concentration, reincarnation, mantras, how higher and lower forces affect you, love and more.

That's every Monday evening at 8:00 at UVM's Living/Learning Center in A162. All are welcome to attend. Made possible by Sri Chinmoy Centers.

Welcome To The Middle Ages

Campus Films This Week

SWEPT AWAY Feb. 23, 7:00 p.m., B106 Angell Hall, free with I.D.

Directed by Lina Wertmuller; Giancarlo Giannini, Mariangele Melatto. Raffaella, a rich, beautiful acid-tongued Milanese who has chartered a yacht, and Gennarino, a swarthy Sicilian deckhand, are marooned on an isolated island. She is a capitalist, he is a communist. Swept Away is the story of a different courtship.

CABIN IN THE SKY Feb. 25-26, Sat. 7:00; Sun. 8:00 p.m., Southwick Gym.

Cast: Eddie "Rochester" Anderson, Lena Horne, Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong and Ethel Waters. The Lord and the Devil struggle for the soul of Little Joe, aided on one side by his church-going wife, and on the other by a collection of gamblers, drinking companions and a seductress. A funny, funny movie.

DISHONORED Feb. 25, 7:00 & 9:00 p.m. Marsh Life Science, $1 with I.D. Dishonored is another of the rich films Dietrich made with the foremost visual stylist of all the American cinema, Josef Von Sternberg. Sternberg discovered Dietrich and then fashioned worlds for her to conquer. Dishonored, 1931, is another version and probably the best version of the Mata Hari story. It tells of a prostitute who becomes a secret agent and later falls in love.

TOM, DICK AND HARRY Feb. 26, 7:00 p.m. B-106 Angell Hall, $1 with I.D.

Directed by Garson Kanin; Ginger Rogers, George Murphy. Sincere Murphy, wealthy Alan Marshal, or nonconformist Burgess Meredith? Which suitor should Ginger choose? Phil Silvers has a good role in this spirited comedy as well.

IN THE YEAR OF THE PIG Feb. 28, 7:30 p.m., B106 Angell Hall, Admission free.

An edited account of the Vietnamese struggle for independence.

KING LEAR Feb. 28, 7:00 p.m., 101 Votey, $1 donation at the door.

GB, 1971. d. Peter Brook. Starring Paul Scofield as Lear, with Alan Webb as Gloucester, Irene Worth as Goneril, and Susan Engel as Regan. B&W. Acclaimed and denounced for its "reductive" treatment of the Lear tale, heavily influenced by the modern absurdist theater and Jan Kott study of Shakespeare as "our contemporary." An example of how Shakespeare in performance twists with the times.

PINK PANTHER STRIKES AGAIN Feb. 24, 7:00 & 9:00 p.m., B106 Angell Hall, $1 with I.D.

Directed by Blake Edwards; Peter Sellers, David Niven, Capucine, Robert Wagner, Claudia Cardinale. The film contains one of Sellers' best performances as Inspector Clouseau of the Paris police. He bungles his way through a jewel caper to discover who the culprit is. Excellent comedy full of subtle slapstick and deadpan humor.

Liberal Arts Career Night

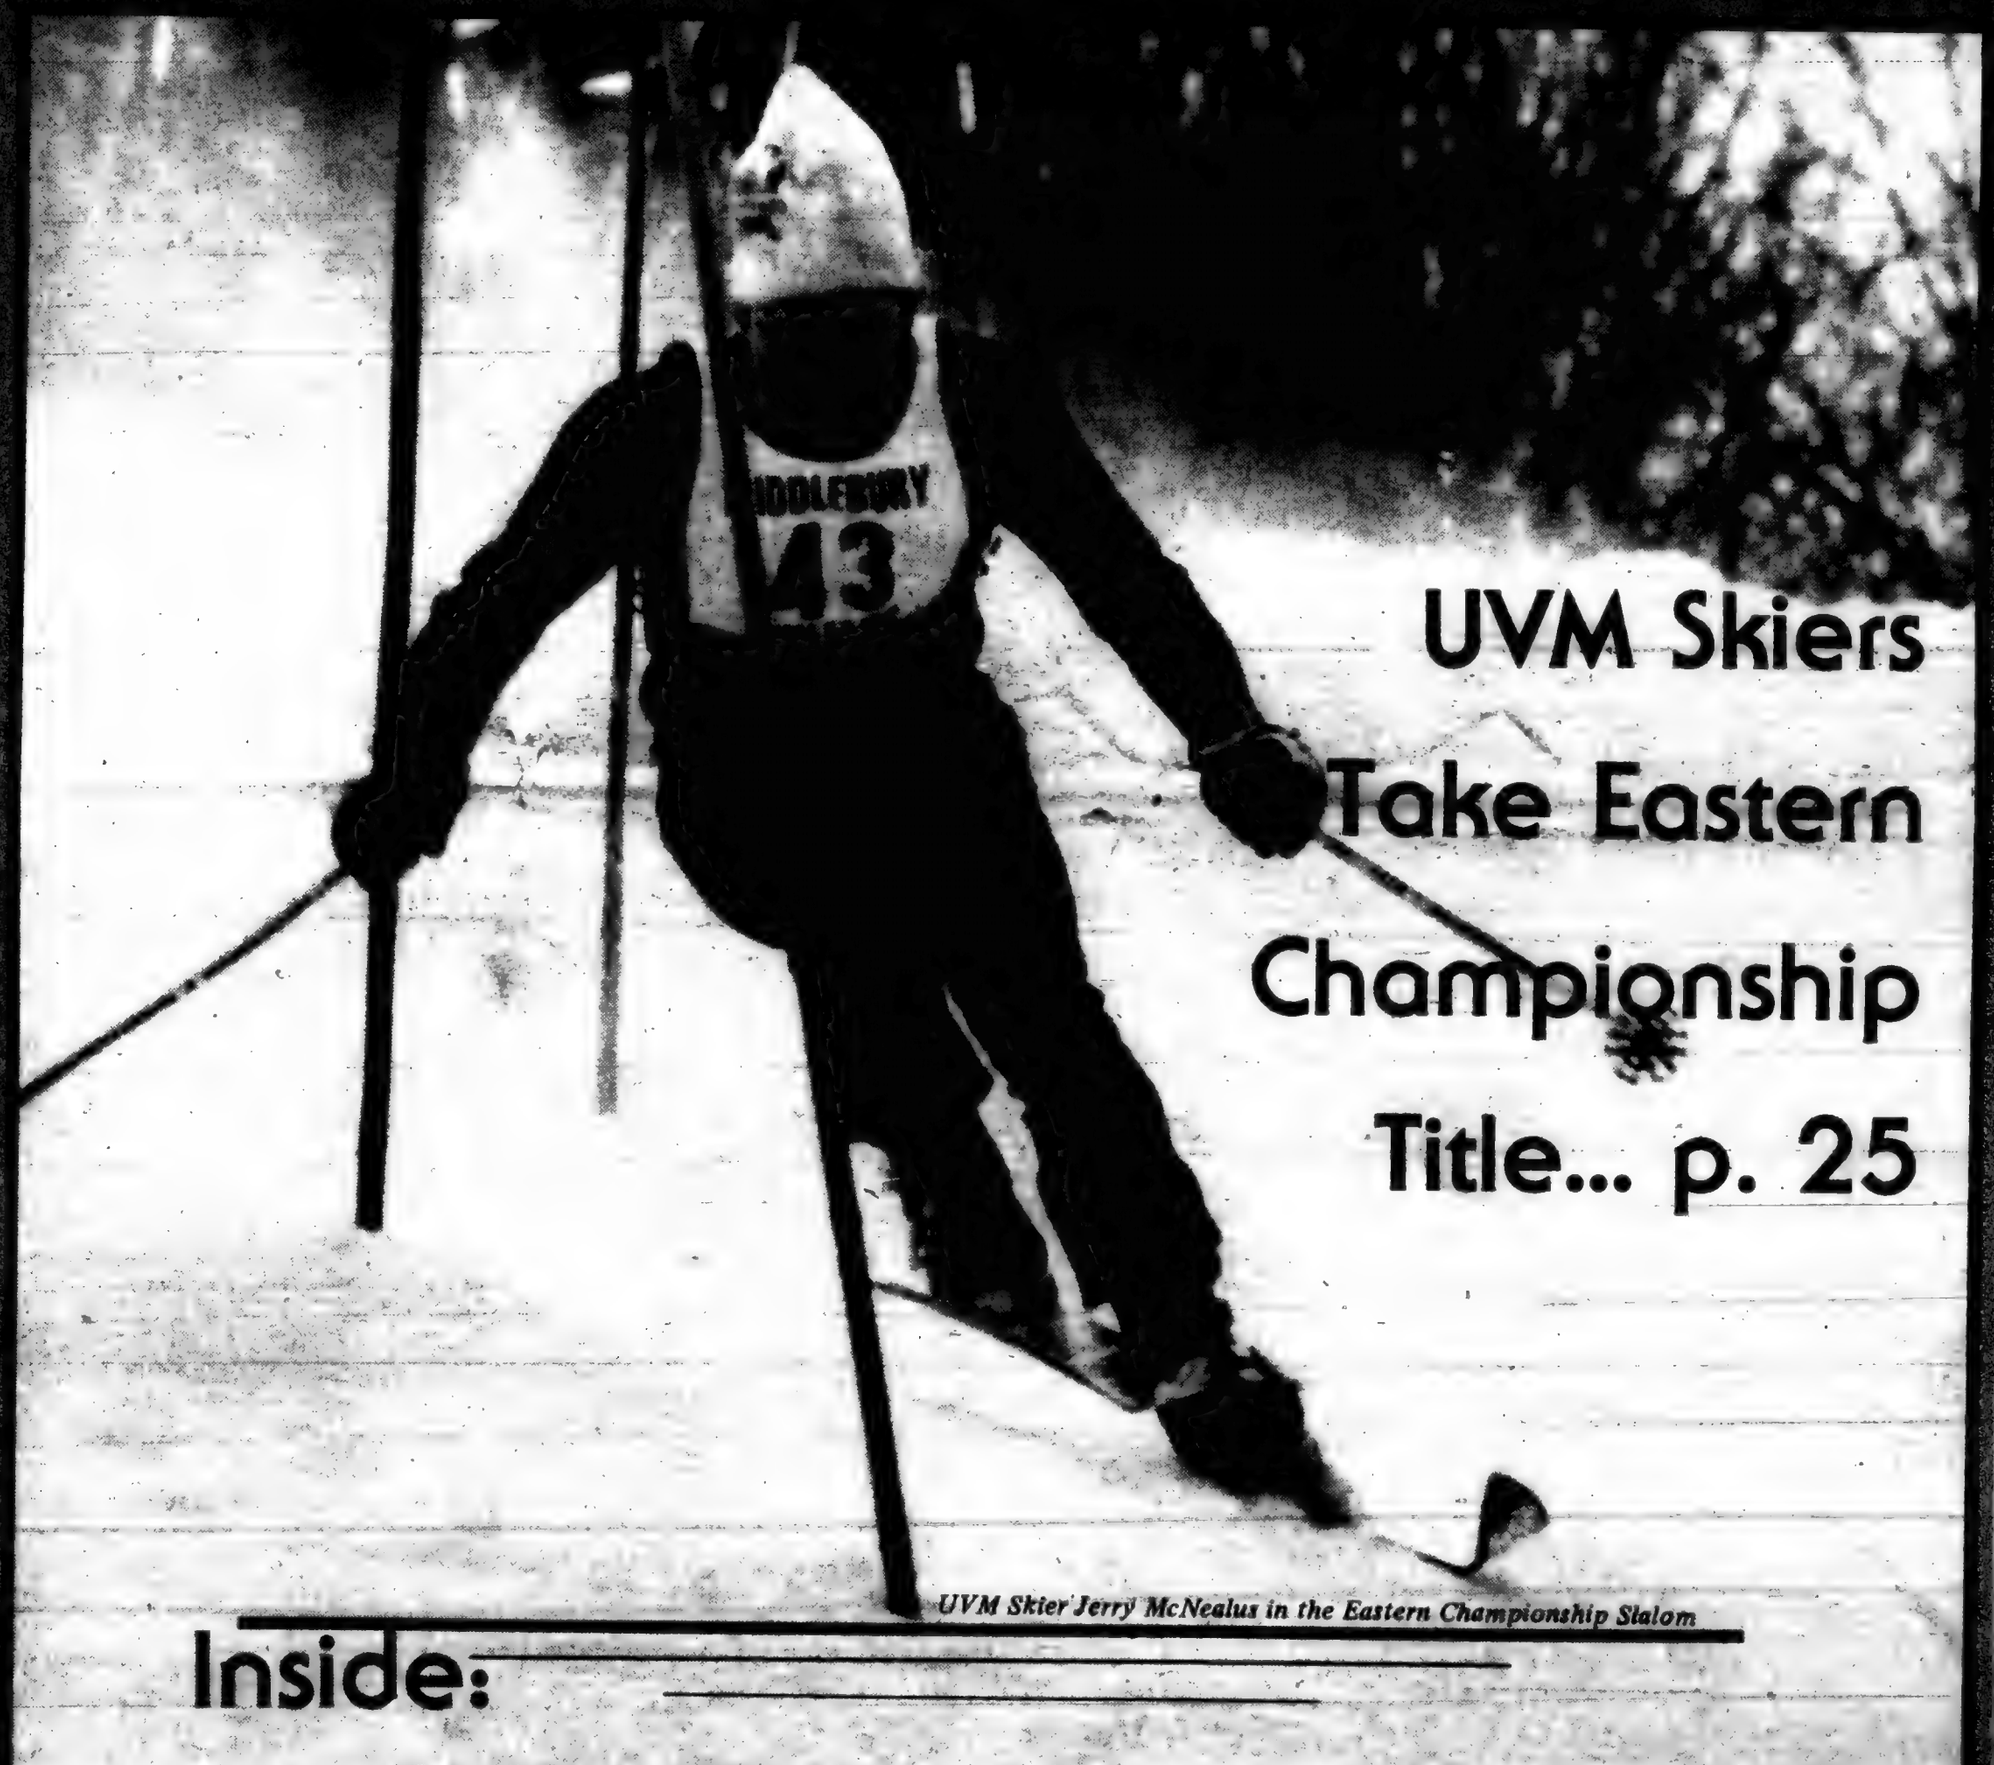
On Monday, February 27, from 7 – 9:30 p.m. students are invited to attend a panel discussion and reception centering on the issue of how to find the job you want with a non-specialized degree at Memorial Lounge, Waterman. The evening is directed primarily toward students in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Eight recent graduates of the University of Vermont will compose the panel. The moderator will be Larry Simmons, Director of the Career Planning and Placement Office. The eight alumni received their degrees from the College of Arts and Sciences and are now involved in a wide variety of careers including publishing, graphic arts, educational administration and television broadcasting. Among the topics for discussion will be "What kinds of jobs am I qualified for with a non-specialized degree?" "How can I identify the skills and talents I have developed as a student?" and "Where and how do I look for a job, and what can the University of Vermont do to help?"

Dean John Jewett will open the evening with a presentation.

Following the discussion, an informal reception will be held, refreshments served, and there will be an opportunity for students to meet with the panelists personally and ask additional questions.

Join the Liberal Arts Career Night on Monday, February 27 at 7:00 p.m. for an informative and enjoyable evening.



Students should register in advance by giving their name to the secretary in the Dean's office of the College of Arts & Sciences.

Fear of Chinese Communists Increased U.S. Intervention in Vietnam

William Bundy, former State Department official

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

The most important explanation for increased U.S. intervention in Vietnam during the mid 60's was the fear that the Chinese communists were thrusting outward to establish "hegemony" in Southeast Asia, William Bundy, editor of the Journal of Foreign Affairs, said Monday night.

Bundy, who spoke to about 200 UVM students and faculty, stressed that China "seemed to be a great, separate threat of its own" which has burned itself into the minds of Americans since the Korean War."

Nevertheless, Bundy said the war was "truly a North Vietnamese effort to take over the South" and the United States was acting in terms of a genuine desire to secure South Vietnam as an independent state. He asserted these actions by the United States were not based on economic motives or to expand territorial control, and that the war was not a violation by the United States of the U.N. Charter or of international law.

Bundy served as a policy maker during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and has been editor of Foreign Affairs since 1972. He was assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern Affairs from 1964 to 1967; staff director on the president's Commission on National Goals in 1960; and was deputy assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs from 1961 to 1963.

Bundy said the right of South Vietnam to defend itself was as clear as the right of South Korea to do likewise in 1950, and thus, the United States had not acted contrary to international law.

He added that from 1964 until after the 1968 Tet offensive other non-communist nations "unanimously and convincingly" supported our actions and were "jealous" of the fact that we were able to defend South Vietnam.

"Extraordinary American self-confidence in the mid-60's" as well as the fact that there were "no apparent theatres" in the world where U.S. forces had to be reserved both added to the total tragedy, he said.

Bundy compared the war's outcome to a tragedy in "the Shakespearean sense... a nation acting on perceptions, visions, and limitations that produced from the very beginning, a flaw in the enterprise – a flaw that was to bring the whole structure crashing down."

In terms of the conduct of the war, "every conceivable form of mistake was made." Bundy did, however, say that it was not a mistake to use a continual or gradual increase of power such as was done, because "one burst" of power – a nuclear attack – might have provoked China into the war. And China was our biggest fear at that time, he said. At the level that the United States was willing to pursue the war and commit itself, though, the war was unwinnable. He said the risk levels involved were too high and that after 1965, the war could not really have been won on the ground.

In the broad interpretation, the United States now realizes "that the judgment of China in the mid-60's was clearly exaggerated." No one really knew what the Chinese were thinking, he said.

On the lessons which have been learned by the United States, Bundy said U.S. government officials have learned that "American political stereotypes do not translate easily into Third World culture."

The Shuttle Bus Dies an Untimely Death

By Russell Flannery

Hailed only weeks ago as a possible solution to the on-campus parking dilemma, the UVM shuttle bus ceased operation last week due to a lack of ridership.

Financially, the projected operational cost of $25,000 to $30,000 per semester was not being secured by the roughly $1,200 in income from the sale of about eighty season passes, which cost fifteen dollars each. The daily operational expenditure of $200 was responsible for a loss of at least $3,200, publicity excluded.

If successful, the bus would have circled the major segments of the UVM campus every ten minutes from 7 a.m. through 12 p.m. A semester pass or payment of a fifteen cent fare assurred on-campus transportation for any UVM student, faculty or staff member. A semester pass also entitled the bearer to passage on any Chittenden County Transportation Authority (CCTA) bus route during off-peak hours, 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. to midnight. CCTA employed two 37 passenger buses on the shuttle route.

Failure to more specifically "address the faculty and the staff" was "a key problem," according to Steve Angel, Mass Transportation Planner for the Regional Planning Commission. The Shuttle program was "put together too quickly, with not enough time to market," added Angel.

Angel was "highly optimistic" that the Shuttle bus would return to UVM next semester. "I'd really like to see it go and so does the UVM administration," claimed Angel. According to Angel, the Shuttle bus would probably "gear around faculty and staff" to a greater degree. However, as Angel concluded, "We'll just have to see."

The idea of a shuttle bus was originally conceived four years ago and follows the recommendations made by the University Parking Commission on Peripheral Parking, in November of 1976. The Commission contended that a shuttle bus would aid their "peripheral plan" to "meet the immediate and long range parking needs of the University with the greatest flexibility, least cost, and greatest equity."

CCTA originally had three separate proposals for a bus route. After consulting IRA and individual students, the bus firm concluded that fifteen cents a ride and fifteen dollars a pass were reasonable fees. Obviously, however, the response of University students has not upheld that assessment.

Student reaction to the cancellation is apparently mixed. Although one Millis resident said, "It's too bad it didn't last. Things take time to get established," an off-campus student commented, "if they had run it on a specific schedule instead of claiming to be at every doorstep every ten minutes I think they could have been successful... I paid fifteen dollars for a pass and didn't use it once..." Refunds for students who did purchase semester passes will be available in the Billings Center on Friday, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.

Failure to more specifically "address the faculty and the staff" was "a key problem," according to Steve Angel, Mass Transportation Planner for the Regional Planning Commission. The Shuttle program was "put together too quickly, with not enough time to market."

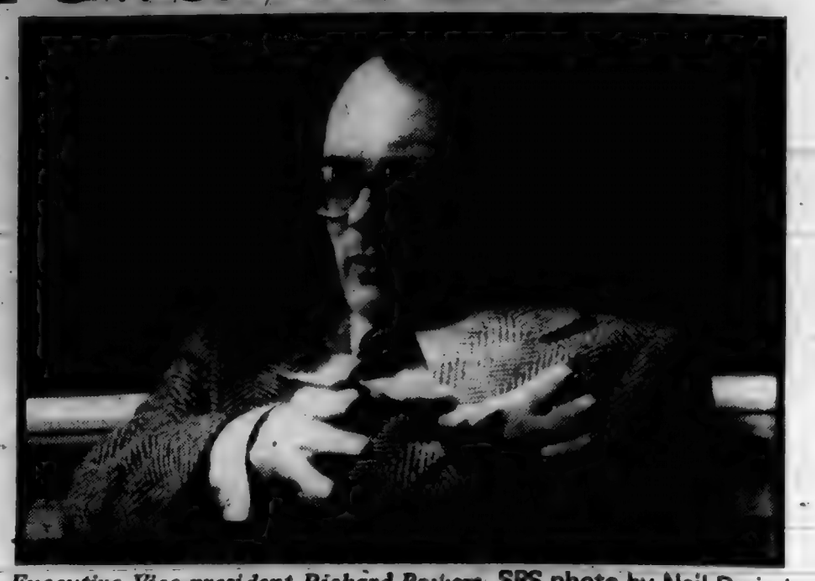
UVM Bureaucracy Shifts School's Power Structure

By Hamilton W. Sorrell

A recent trend among universities has been to combine financial planning and academic affairs underneath one roof, and UVM has been no exception.



Last October, a relatively unnoticed change within UVM's bureaucracy rearranged the school's power structure by shifting the responsibilities for financial planning and analysis, budgetary control, and institutional studies, from the office of the executive vice president to the office of the vice president for academic affairs.

The newly formed "agency" is called Budgeting and Institutional Studies, and reports to Robert Arns, academic affairs vice president. Before the shift, and before October when the new studies office was created, those persons performing these tasks reported to Richard Powers, executive vice president.

But despite speculation that the combination of academics and finances might not be in the best interest of the university, both Arns and Powers confirm the move is a beneficial one.

"We're very much concerned with integrating academic and fiscal planning," Arns said. "It's a natural arrangement... I think it's becoming more of a trend (among universities)," he added.

Powers agreed by saying, "I think the consolidation of the units is a good move. I think it makes sense." Powers noted that the work load in his office has been lessened by the move since "two less units" are reporting to him.

Bob Stanfield, executive assistant to the president, explained the rationale behind the move: "Direct programmatic concerns should be taken into account with financial planning. It's the principle that budgetary judgments should be related to the program mission of the university."

Stanfield, Powers, and Arns all agreed that such a move is not out of the ordinary for a school such as the University of Vermont. While Powers said that "less than a majority" of universities have combined these two areas, Arns noted, "I think it's becoming more of a trend!" to make this combination.

Even while the new studies office is reporting to Arns, he said the workload in his office has not increased appreciably.

The Budgeting and Institutional Studies office, called BIS, along with the office of Management Information and Computing, will be involved with the development of management information and budgetary control systems. In addition to the aforementioned areas, the new office is also concerned with cost studies, enrollment projections and reports, compilation of descriptive data concerning academic programs and departments including faculty counts and faculty load analysis, and student credit load analysis.

The director of the new office is Norman Blair, who has been financial planning and analysis director. The assistant director, Fred Curran, will also continue to hold his title of director of institutional studies.

UVM had a similar situation when Wayne Patterson was executive vice president under President Ed Andrews a number of years ago. Patterson's responsibilities included handling financial and student affairs.

"McCepp and the Movies"

This department has been alerted to an offer put together by McCepp and the Merrill Theatre people that is simply too good to pass up. McCepp and Mr. Merrill sat down and thrashed out the details in a room filled with "Blue Hawaii" movie posters.

Every Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday night you can come into McCepp's for a special dinner of Teriyaki Steak, Baked Stuffed Haddock, Barbecued Chicken, or Baked Stuffed Prok Chops all with baked potato, rice pilaf, or French fries, ice cream and beverage for $6.95. After you've polished off the last bit of coffee, McCepp will give you a coupon which gets you into any of several movies playing at the Merrill Theatres in Burlington.

Now this means you can take a date to dinner and the movies for just under $15.00. Try that on a weekend bunkie! It's such a good offer that McCepp is now being considered for an Academy Award. Can't you see Jane Fonda presenting the Oscar to McCepp as "Humanitarian of the year"?

This is just the latest in a whole array of special offers which McCepp is putting together in appreciation of all you fine readers and friends. The place may be a touch unusual, but you've made it one of Burlington's favorite dinner spots.

Criticism of Proposals Continues; Burlington Electric Defends Itself

By John Letteri

On March 7, Burlington voters will decide whether or not to allow the Burlington Electric Department to float $65 million in bonds to fund a wood-burning electrical generator and a trash incinerator along the Intervale in Burlington, and a hydro-electric facility on the Winooski River. The three plants, collectively termed the "Energy Park" by BED officials, would provide 60.6 megawatts of power. Approximately thirty of these megawatts would be used for the South Burlington community, and the remaining thirty megawatts would be sold to the other municipalities in the state.

"...more study needs to be done to finalize plans on these proposals."

-Administrative Assistant for Burlington Electric

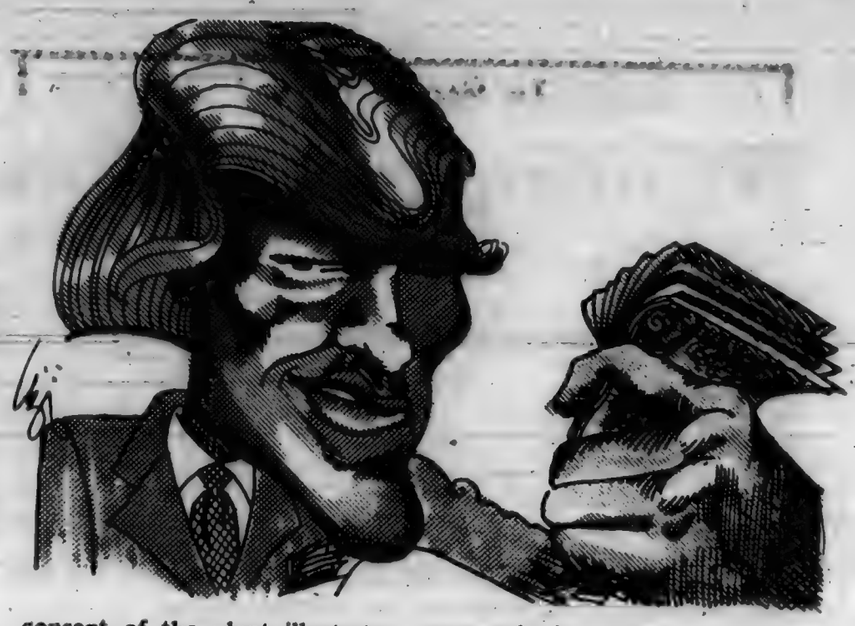
In an interview Monday, BED Administrative Assistant Ed Norse acknowledged that "more study needs to be done to finalize plans on these proposals." However, he contends that costs of these studies "will be covered with money from the bond proposal." This study caused delay would not only push the projected completion date from 1982, to present an increase in construction costs (currently increasing at 8% per year). If additional costs of any kind are incurred after the March 7 vote BED will be able to float bonds to cover the cost without going to the voters for approval. In the words of Solid Waste and Air Pollution expert Richard Valentenette, Burlington voters by approving the March 7 bond issue would be signing a "blank check" for BED.

BED bases the need for these plants on the assumption that the electrical demand in Burlington has been on the rise for the last five years and will continue, according to Norse, "to rise at about 5-7% per year." However, statistics from Green Mountain Power Corporation, Vermont Electrical Cooperative, and BED show that over the last five years demand for electricity has increased at about 1-1.2% per year. In fact, statistics from BED show that in terms of new electrical energy, Burlington actually used less energy in 1977 than in 1976.



BED maintains that Burlington has traditionally had the lowest electrical rates of any municipality in the state. They further claim that these three plants will "hold-the-line," which according to Norse means "increases of 8-10% per year as opposed to 11 to 13% without the plants." BED further states that with these three plants, Burlington will be "self-sufficient in terms of energy and free from imported fuels." Yet, Burlington Electric has contracts for power with Pasney plant in New York and Vermont Yankee nuclear plant until 1985 and 2000 respectively. Even with the three new plants by 1982, Burlington will still be purchasing at least twenty-four megawatts of power per year until 1985.

In Mr. Norse's words, the problems that will develop along the Winooski river caused by the hydro-electric facility "have to be overcome, because if we don't solve these problems, we won't have any project at all." The main problem along the Winooski lies in the sewage treatment plants on the river. Presently, these plants are all secondary. Secondary sewage treatment plants need a fast-flowing river to break down sewage and without the rapid flow of the Winooski, complete sewage breakdown would not be possible. Many contend this will be the case if the hydro-electric facility is built as proposed. This would necessitate the building of tertiary sewage plants all along the Winooski River. Tertiary plants break the sewage down completely before returning any material back to the river. However, they represent a large expense in both capital and energy consumption.

Even if Burlington voters approve the proposals, BED's "Energy Park" would still have to gain the approval of the Public Service Board, the

Residential Life Justifies Expenditures and Charges

By Russell F. Flannery

Individual on-campus students pay over $170 per school year for utilities charges, and nearly $22 per year for unassigned dormitory damages Department of Residental Life Director Steve Peterson announced in a 1977-78 budget address to the Inter-Residence Association (IRA) last Tuesday night.

The budget presentation, in which Peterson listed the 'per student' cost of all facets of operation within the Residential Life Department, further revealed that dormitory maintenance service must be performed by the allegedly incompetent UVM Physical Plant, the official title of UVM 'maintenance crew.'

THE HEATING BILL

The Residential Life yearly utility bill of $622,567 is only partially explained by unnecessary student use of lights, stereo equipment, and extended showers. The structural deficiency of nearly 70% of the residence halls also contributes to the high figure. Only Jeanne Mance Hall and the WDW complex have individual room thermostats – a necessary feature for any dormitory energy conservation project. Chittenden, Buckham, and Wills Halls are each regulated by a single thermostat. Since the renovation of Coolidge Hall this summer will physically drain the Residential Life surplus funds, an increase in room fee will be discussed by the Board of Trustees at their April meeting.

"MALICIOUS DAMAGE"

On-campus students are required to pay $21.90 to defray the estimated $80,000 cost of vandalism repair. Peterson said the cost was beyond his control, and told the student meeting, "You have to be accountable to yourselves."

The 1977 figure represents a decrease from the 1976 cost of $107,000. Peterson, who attributed the decline to an active program by floor R.A.'s to curb vandalism, speculated that most damage occurs between "two and four a.m. on weekends," and suggested an educational program on alcohol may be a partial solution to the problem.

Damage deposit fees, a frequent method of vandalism deterence in colleges and universities, was termed "a license to behave irresponsibly" by Peterson. He speculated that many students could either regard a $25 fee as trivial, and continue to vandalize, or question whether the money would ever be returned, and therefore "use it." A fee of "$200 or $300" was ruled out by the director, who said that such a fee was beyond the means of the average student. A student "judiciary" was mentioned by Peterson, who did not state whether this would bear any connection with the Student Association's proposed Student Grievance Committee.

CONTROVERSY SURROUNDS THE PHYSICAL PLANT

Nearly $70 of the room fee charge is absorbed by UVM maintenance or the Physical Plant. Although Peterson said the plant's operation is "considerably better than it used to be" controversy continues to surround the competency of the management. The Department of Residential Life has no control over the size of a work crew assigned by the plant for a particular project. The inability of the Department of Residential Life to schedule maintenance repairs without the consent of the plant illustrates that "a competitive edge does not exist in a university environment," according to Peterson. An IRA representative claimed the Plant had once assigned "five workers to change one light bulb." According to another, "I put in a request day after day after day. I had one light bulb (in my room). So they finally never came... I just took it upon my own initiative."

Additional student criticism was leveled at the apparently negligent energy conservation practices of the plant employees. "Main doors (of dormitories) are always open," charged an IRA representative. Peterson agreed that the situation was "frustrating," but he lacked proposals for overall operation at the Plant.

"I think there were a lot of areas that people were really surprised," IRA President Charlie Clark said following the meeting. He later stated, "It's amazing. I wonder how many people really care when it comes down to what they're paying."

Peterson expressed a hope for student feedback on the budget, and stressed that due to inflationary factors service cutbacks would be necessary in order to avoid an increase in room fees. Any feedback or questions concerning the budget should be directed to a dormitory IRA representative. (A list of the IRA officers is located on page twenty of this week's Cynic.)

The Budget (An Edited Version)

"What I have to share with you is complicated, but I hope you find it fascinating and of particular interest to you because you are, in fact, the people who pay the bills... In a sense, I come to you as a means of being accountable... I've been working on this information for a very long time. The budgets at the university are complicated, to say the least. They are in an unusual format to any (one) who is unfamiliar with budgeting... The real cost of some budget items are distributed across several categories, and to look at a budget like that just doesn't make any sense. I've tried to put the entire budget of the Department of Residential Life, in other words, what you pay for rent, into a format I hope you can understand. I've tried to do it by lumping things together, groups of people – like housekeeping and custodians, security, R.A.'s, and the professional staff. The only thing that I've done in grouping things together is that I haven't listed any one individual or small group in a way that an individual person's payment would be diagnosed. That's unfair to those people, and it really distorts what we're trying to accomplish. But in a broad sense, I think you'll find the information is useful to you."

NOTES

1 Stipends are essentially a salary paid to Hall and Resident Advisors. R.A.'s, as opposed to H.A.'s who receive cash, only get $620 credit against their University bill.

2 Fringe Benefits are, for example, life insurance, dental services, etc.

3 Summer staff fees are an investment. The roughly $10 invested by each student returns about $34 through summer session and conference housing.

4 The travel expenditure funds trips by resident personnel to attend informational conventions.

5 Vehicle UV–93 is a station wagon that transports furniture (ie. couches, chairs) from dorm to dorm.

6 Each on-campus student pays $21.90 to defray the cost of unpaid dormitory vandalism, whether it had occurred in his/her dorm or not.

7 Residential life anticipates financial reserves for future projects, i.e. Coolidge [illegible] renovations.

The Campaign for Funds:

Winning Some New Votes

By Kimberly Honza

What is a major fund-raising (capitol) campaign? What does it mean at the University of Vermont? What direction is it taking at UVM? Russell Carpenter, the Director of Development at UVM, explained, "A major campaign is a concerted effort, in this case by an institution (UVM) to raise funds for major needs which usually are termed buildings or endowments." Carpenter continued, "In recent history however, a major campaign is apt to include, if it is a determined major need of the institution, large academic projects or operating expenses."

Indeed, the development organization at UVM is all recent history. In 1966, a consulting firm conducted a feasibility study of development potential and personnel and organization requirements which resulted in the appointment of a full-time Director of Development. The following year a formal bequest program, alumni fund, and parents fund began, all of which were the responsibility of the Director. From 1968 to 1973, several organizational changes were made. The position of a Development associate was created, and the Director of Development was promoted to Vice-President for Development. That position later evolved into the Vice-President for Development and External Affairs, a position now held by Barbara Snelling. The Pooled Life Income Fund was also initiated in 1973. 1974 saw the specific development functions assigned to staff: Alumni Fund, Parents Fund/Bequests and Planned Gifts. Previously, all functions had been assigned to the staff on a geographical basis.

Russ Carpenter.

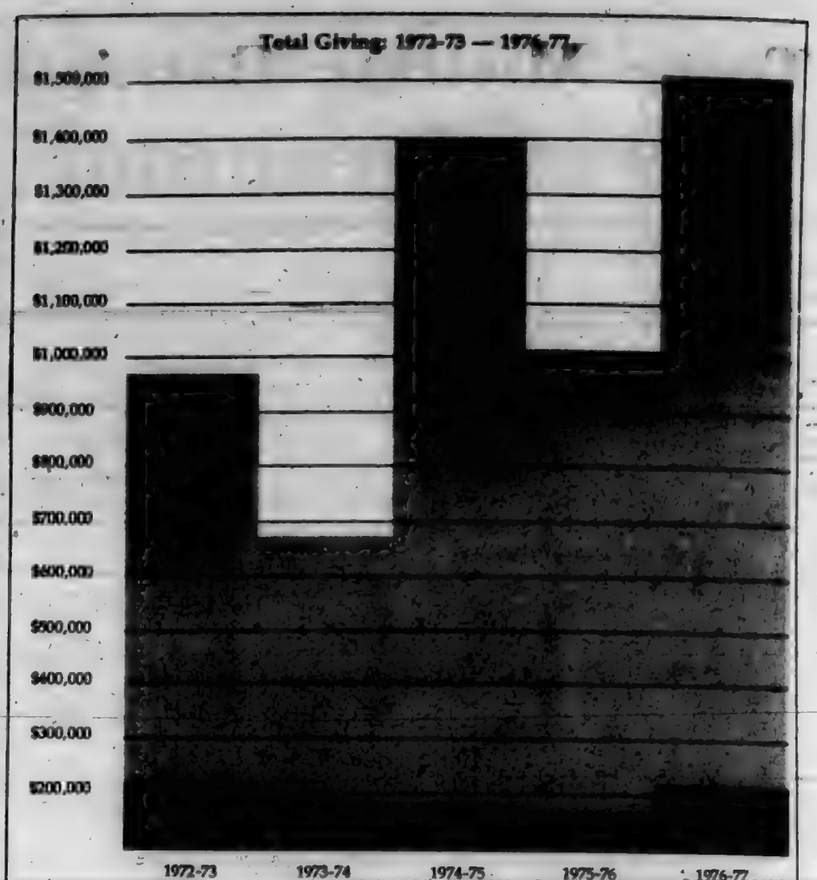
Russell Carpenter arrived on the scene in 1975 as the Director of Development. Development, Alumni, and Gift Record functions were consolidated. Most recently, the University of Vermont Fund has separated itself from the rest of the development operations. It is spearheaded by Arthur Brinks, and is responsible for the annual giving efforts from alumni and parents.



Carpenter however, does not like to use such a fine line to separate the two functions, finding them complimentary. "I use the following analogy when comparing the two (major and annual funding campaigns)," said Carpenter. "An annual fund is very much like a Sunday collection plate, and a major campaign is very much like the church father standing up and saying, 'The burner is about to blow up, and we need an extra special effort to put in a new furnace.' You still give money to the collection plate, but you dig in a little deeper to take care of the capital need," he explained.

Planning was the emphasis of Carpenter's story. It takes time and persistence, and often cannot be accomplished without outside help. "We have employed a consulting firm (Barnes & Roche of Philadelphia) to do a study on the University's readiness to mount a major funding campaign," he said. "They interviewed members of the institutional advancement team and several trustees who have been involved in fund-raising and several members of the community."

The process can be slow. Carpenter estimated that it can take three years to get a campaign off the ground. The marketing or general public relations are the first step of the fund drive. This is to insure that donors are receptive to the campaign's goals.

"A major campaign involving all potential donors" continued Carpenter, "which the University has never really had – starts with a list of objectives well thought out ahead of time, laid out in a brochure and announced at all sorts of meetings of parents, alumni, small groups and large groups, with everyone having the opportunity to contribute."

But patience and persistence has paid off for the development program at UVM. Last year, $166,280 of the $1,365,187 raised by the University, was received from only ten bequests. In addition, five new participants increased the Pooled Life Income Fund by $35,481. The growth of the Ira Allen Society is another indicator of success. Since it was formed in 1967, membership has grown from seven to over 185 individuals, businesses, foundations and organizations who have given $1,000 or more.

"The marketing for any major campaign must start with efforts to establish the confidence that a potential donor must have in the institution and all that serve it," said Carpenter. "It's really telling the institutional story in very positive but realistic terms. By realistic, I mean – if you've got a problem, you state it in very positive terms, and what you hope to do about it, and what it takes to do that." He continued, "People want to feel secure – in the fact that they're giving to an institution or a collection of people who personalize an institution to them – that they are going to be proper stewards of their money."

Carpenter then focused on

Town Meeting Retains Many Old Traditions

By Curtis Haynes

Next week, an age-old Yankee tradition repeats itself: Town Meeting. Originally called 'Freemen's Meeting Day' in the Vermont Constitution of 1777, the first Tuesday in March is set aside as a day of stock taking, speeches, and eventual voting. The new town populace congregates in the local church, school gym, or town meeting hall for what to many seems an endurance contest. The issues are about the same every year – the town budget, schools, property taxes, roads, and development. But for one day, the politicking is somehow bearable, even for the most reticent of Vermonters. Everyone has the chance to say his or her peace, though a few folks do get carried away at the sound of their own voices. Nonetheless, it is refreshing to witness local control and responsibility in this era of big, faceless government.

Town Meeting is also a social occasion. Families bring their children, the coffee flows freely, reunions with old friends, scrutinizing new-comers, and, of course, the big dinner largely agreed to be the year's best. This gathering of young and old alike maintains a community spirit (or dissention) and is often compared to the participatory democracy of old Athens, which some say is the most perfect form of government the world has ever known. Chances are no Vermonter would claim the Town Meeting system is perfect, but somehow, it works. As Vermont historian Hiland Hall once wrote, "This frame of government continued in operation long after the State had become a member of the Federal Union, furnishing the people with as much security for their persons and property as was enjoyed by those of other States, and allowing to each individual citizen all the liberty which was consistent with the welfare of others."

Women's Referral Service:

What Goes On There?

By Susan Heller

"Our main objective is gathering information pertaining to women's issues, specifically health information, counseling, career opportunities, that kind of thing," said Jody Plumber, one of the originators of the Women's Referral Center. The purpose of the Center is to direct women to various agencies and resources in the Burlington area where their individual needs can be accommodated.

Located at Billings 3rd floor balcony, the Center is open Monday – Thursday from 9:00 – 4:00 and Friday 9:00 – 12:00 for students to drop in for referrals, informal counseling, educational programs, legislative information, statistics pertaining to women, and someone who will listen objectively.

The Center is equipped to deal with various problems by means of an extensive reference file, including a booklet called "Burlington Services for Women" compiled by Dana Gallagher. Ms. Gallagher, another Referral Center counselor, acknowledged that many problems they have confronted are sexual in nature. Her first referral involved a Middlebury woman who was "trying to come to grips with her own homosexuality... I put her in touch with the chairperson of the Gay Student Union. I think that might have helped her just to make contacts with people," Ms. Gallagher explained.

Jody Plumber is now working on a survey trying to determine where the needs of women at this university exist. Ms. Plumber is trying to determine which health, recreation and counseling facilities women are aware of. Ms. Plumber is also interested in arranging a Forum on the ERA because it is "such a volatile issue."

The main problems that these women have encountered are lack of publicity and false notions concerning the Women's Center. "When the women's issue comes up, there are so many misconceptions about bra-burning, radical lesbian man-haters, people just can't identify with that and we don't either," Ms. Gallagher stated. The Center has a neutral political base, and is willing to deal with any problem regardless of the sex of the individual. Ms. Plumber elaborated that "because of the women's movement so many men are feeling alienated, it is a feeling of mine that the women's movement will never accomplish anything without the support and interest of men."

The Women's Referral Center has developed numerous contacts and can recommend and describe the function of each organization. They want to "act as a clearing house for all these places and try and have some good contact with all of them and no competition."

City Will Refund Illegal Tow Charges

By Robert J. Moore

Refund applications will soon be available for motorists whose autos were towed while the towing fee was at the increased rate of twenty-five dollars, city officials said Thursday.

According to City Treasurer F. Lee Austin, the city attorney will draw up the forms and make them available in City Hall on March 15. Although the towing companies pocketed the entire $25, the city will refund the money—because city boards authorized the ten dollar demanded increase which was later discovered to be illegal.

Until the increase at the beginning of January, the city's two towing establishments charged fifteen dollars per tow and one dollar a day for storage. When the city approved the increase, these rates rose to $25 and $2 respectively. Of the two towing establishments, only Ed's Auto remains employed by the city. Charlebois Garage is no longer used by the city due to numerous complaints from city residents concerning their towing practices.

A few weeks after the rate hikes, a state statute was found which prohibited charging more than fifteen dollars for towing. It is this statute that has prompted repeal of the increase, and induced the city to offer restitution for the differences in rates for towing ($15 vs. $25) and storage ($1 a day vs. $2 a day). The city will pay out approximately $4,000 to make up the differences between the fees.

According to Burlington Police records, 371 autos were towed during the first three weeks in January, the time period when the increased fee was being charged. Because Burlington police initiated the towing and keep a record of all cars towed, the city will be able to use these records as a check on those persons applying for refunds. The applicants' car registration number will be compared against those in the police records.

Mayor Gordon Paquette contends that the rebate money will probably come from the city's fines account. The account contains money the city has received from the state as its share of paid traffic tickets.

The refunds will not be available earlier than March 15 because Treasurer Austin's office is presently concentrating its efforts on the quarterly tax collection.

Since the beginning of the winter parking ban November 1, approximately 1,000 cars have been removed from city streets by tow trucks.

University Campus Scoured for Energy Waste

Energy efficiency is the goal of an "Energy Waste Hunt" being conducted on the UVM campus. Forty buildings will be examined in conjunction with a campaign to increase personal awareness of energy use. The project is under the direction of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) and is led by UVM sophomores Krista Billings and Nicole Noyes.

"The University has already decided where to spend millions of dollars for insulation and new storm windows," Billings said, "but according to some administration officials we have interviewed, there has not yet been time to focus on the hundreds of small changes that would cut energy use significantly in the near future."

The women estimate that the University would save over $100,000 each year by implementing these small changes. In each of the buildings the "hunt" teams will be on the lookout for broken windows, the lack of storm windows, and damaged caulking and weatherstripping. Building insulation will be checked, along with door types and their defects. Hot water systems will be evaluated for efficiency, and the number of gallons of water per minute in showers and flush toilets will be measured. Lighting efficiency will be examined in different use situations throughout the building.

VPIRG President, David White, feels the Waste Hunt is a good example of the students of UVM working together with the administration on a matter of mutual concern.

Concerning the personal energy awareness campaign Noyes said "We hope to sensitize students and faculty to the fact that they must also help reduce energy use on campus. Most people overlook the obvious — thermostats are set too high, doors are left open, and lights are left on in empty classrooms."

A similar search for energy waste is being conducted in Vermont's public and private schools. Through financing from the State Energy Office in Montpelier, Mr. Vernon Krause, a Mechanical Engineering professor, is supervising Engineering students doing the audits.

Of the 525 schools the teams hope to audit, sixty-five have already been completed. The project has shown results — waste has been found. One school was extremely overheated because the only thermostat in the school was by the outside door!

Significant savings of money are expected. Though a school may have to invest $40 on an additional thermostat, it may pay that $40 each month on its heating bill because of wasted energy.

When asked about the future of such projects in Vermont, Krause said that he cannot help but think that energy auditing of all public buildings will be a "normal outgrowth" of this project.

Many people are encouraged by what they describe as realistic action to reduce energy waste and save money in a state facing severe and controversial energy problems.

Wood Burning Generator Comes Under Fire

By Diana Palazzolo

Challenging questions have been raised by local and state environment experts to Burlington Electric Department as to the economic and environmental effects of the proposed 50 megawatt wood burning generator. The $80 million wood fire plant, of which one-half is financed by Burlington, is one of the three proposed bond issues pending approval on the March 7 referendum. The additional bonds include a $15 million trash burning facility and the proposed $15 million Chase Mill Hydroelectric station on the Winooski River.

The BED Moran plant recently converted its No 1 10-MG boiler to full wood chip burning capacity. The operation of the plant would require 470,000 tons of low quality wood chips per year to supply 100 percent energy output. The wood is presently supplied from an experimental whole tree harvesting project in N. Fayston where on-site wood is cut and run through large chipping machines producing wood chips.

Samuel Lloyd, Director of the Forest Recreation and Advisory Council, is concerned with the present forest management practices which harvesters are presently operating under in Vermont's forests. He explained, "If we do not have in place some means of controlling this harvesting throughout the state, Vermont forests will be in serious shape in two year's time. The potential of the whole tree harvesting is feasible but time is needed to answer forest management problems in a rational and deliberate fashion." He explained that the history of Vermont's forests is dismal due to the massive agricultural clear cut which took place 50 years ago and has left 50 percent of Vermont's forested regions unmarketable.

Robert Young, General Manager of BED, explained the future harvesting plans: "All waste wood harvesting projects in the state will be strictly monitored by state and federal foresters. At each harvesting site on land owned or leased by companies, plans call for professional foresters to mark all trees that can be cut."

Questions as to who will bear the economic cost of hiring additional foresters at each harvesting site to manage the extraction of wood for the power plant were raised by the assistant forester of Chittenden County, Russell Ray. "Who will pay the bill for professional foresters? Burlington Electric has not included the cost in their proposed budget. If state or counties pay, essentially taxpayers will foot the bill in the end. If suppliers pay for the regulation, the cost of wood will increase and reflect in unforeseen costs not presented to the voters," he said.

Prof. of Environmental Studies Mark Lapping from UVM is not convinced the wood management will be handled the way people have suggested. According to Lapping: "I am not sure the increased harvesting of cull wood will be harvested in a method that is productive in terms of economic efficiency so it will not be detrimental to the quality of forests." He continued, "There is a great deal of potential for using wood as energy, but what happens when the people living in harvested areas have to pay money to restore stream damage, and other environmental damages."

"If we do not have in place some means of controlling this harvesting throughout the State, Vermont forests will be in serious shape in two years time."

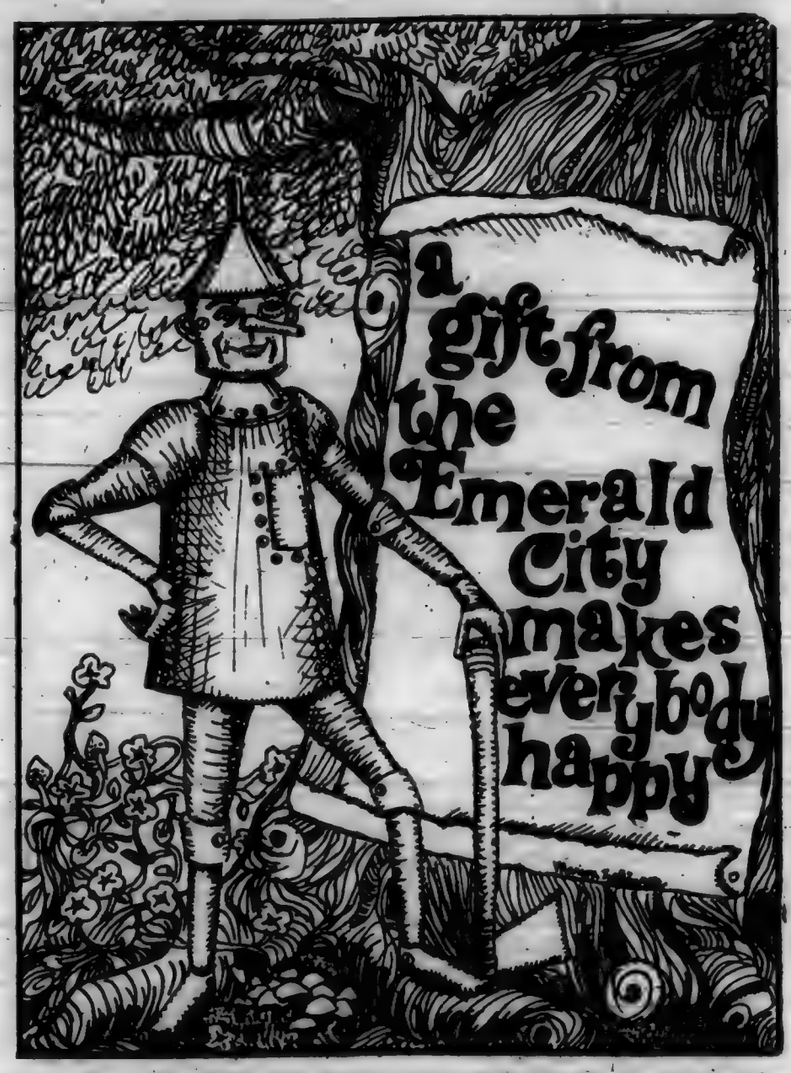
The "Wood for Energy Interim Report on Whole Tree Harvesting" experiment in S. Duxbury was conducted last summer by a team of state and local environmental researchers. The results of the report proved whole tree harvesting (WTC) feasible but many questions were raised by researchers as a result of the study. The report states "Sixteen acres of harvesting is not a sufficient sample to reach firm conclusions, and important information concerning impact on forest resource will not become fully known until after several growing seasons have passed."



Susan Knight, a Dartmouth researcher, commenting on the results of her studies, said "The losses of organic matter and nutrient through WTC of fuel wood presents the largest single problem in the environmental impact assessment. Few good long-termed forested ecosystem nutrient studies have been conducted to ensure

End of Slavery Sparked "Negro Movement" - Bennett

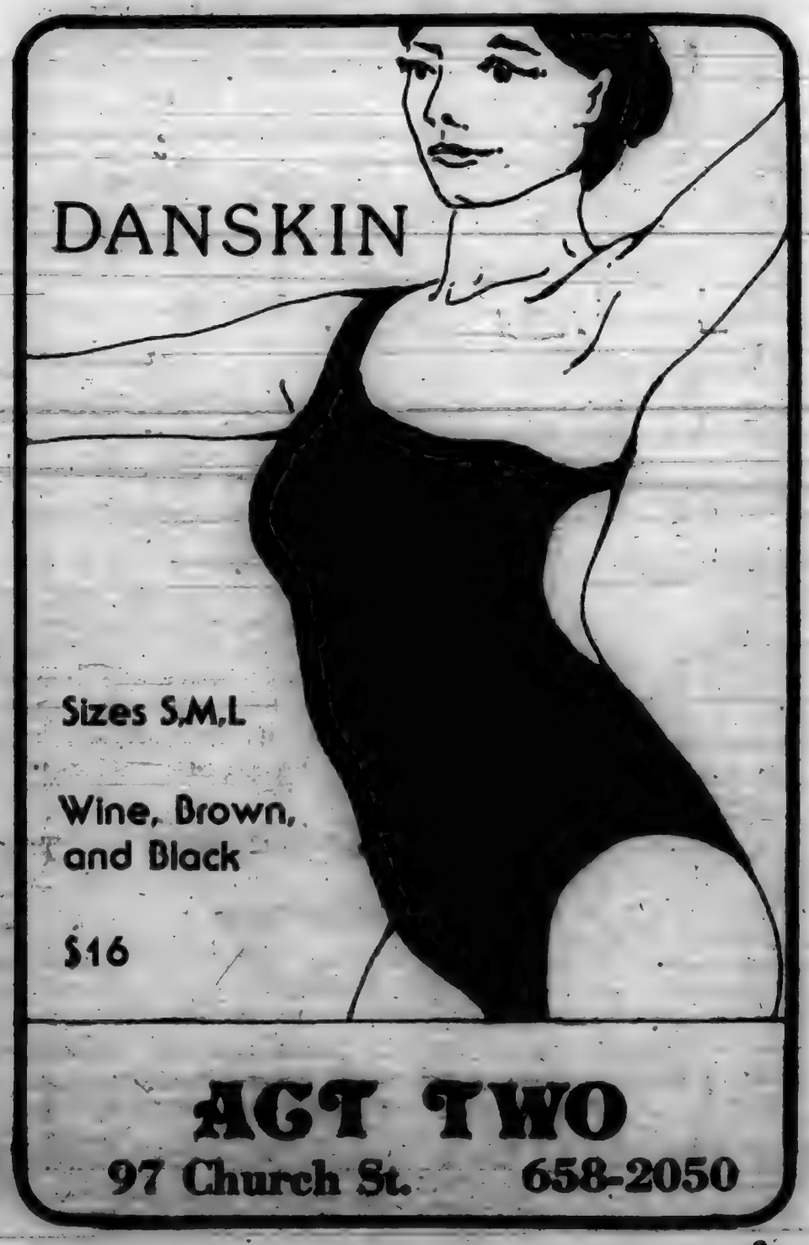
By Scott Greb

The Negro movement during the 1920's and 1960's was a direct result of the end to slavery in 1865, which gave way to a new identity, a new "free" state of mind for blacks, according to Lerone Bennett, editor of Ebony magazine, who spoke at the Royall Tyler Theatre Monday night.

The phrase "Harlem Renaissance" Bennett contends, should not be taken literally. The new identity was seen as a "fundamental change and being of consciousness among blacks." As blacks began traveling northward following 1915, leaving behind their "Jim Crow" South, Bennett said this "total phenomenon" originally centered around Harlem. The burgeoning movement of black masses also occupied areas in Chicago, Atlanta, Washington and Philadelphia. For this reason, Bennett said, the southern exodus "was an experience of the whole of the black people grander than only Harlem."

The 1920's, the decade of the Negro Renaissance, was seen as a magical era according to Bennett. He explained it was vogue to believe blacks and whites would walk hand in hand, together into the sunset, through the "sounds of silence." He stipulated that the full white commitment towards accepting the blacks' "new image" was not yet present, as demonstrated by the fifty-four black lynchings in 1927.

One of the highlights of the 1920's, Bennett commented, was the organization of the first negro history, illustrated through prolific black writers and poets of the period. Bennett cited the magazine "Crisis" as an excellent example of black intelligence. Godley, with his massive number of black followers, formed the backbone to the black nationalist movement. In addition, the business world became infiltrated by energetic black entrepeneurs. "The blacks were willing to work in community with the whites if possible, in conflict if necessary," Bennett said.



A major deterrent to the Negro movement, Bennett stated, has been the incessant "move after move" of immigrants into this country, which began in 1840. During the 1920's, due to restrictive quotas established within the work contracts, blacks were pushed out of the steel and carpentry trades. What was once a 10:1 ratio of black skilled laborers to white in the south dramatically reversed four years later to a white domination of 4:1. "The immigrants displaced the blacks and rose to security on the bloody backs of the blacks," Bennett said.

The 1960's saw a reawakening of the rhythmic Negro Movement. The unresolved problems of the twenties, Bennett concluded, are still being dealt with, yet at a higher level of progress. Colleges were offering black oriented seminars, yet the white acceptance, the white commitment, was still holding back. The evil instincts and habits of the white attitude certainly had firm bases, he said.

Looking to the future, Bennett sees affirmative action as an effective and necessary way of solving the problems and conflicts of these past 200 years. Bennett concluded, hovering over the lecturn with his left hand resting Napoleon style, "We still have to wait and tend our own agonizing seas. Now are we tough enough?"

Shipyard Radiation Investigation

Dr. Thomas Najarian, a veteran administration blood specialist, said nuclear employees at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard have a cancer death rate twice the national average. He told a congressional committee Tuesday that the Navy and his own agency tried to hamper his investigation.

Najarian said he was forced to conduct the investigation himself, with the help of a Boston Globe reporting team, because of Federal Government roadblocks.

He testified before Health subcommittees of the House and Senate looking into Najarian's claim of an alarming rate of cancer deaths among shipyard employees who worked on some of the nation's early nuclear submarines.

Admiral Hyman Rickover, Deputy Commander for Nuclear Power in the Navy, presented the Navy's side of the issue. He called for a full nationwide investigation into the matter.

Najarian said that after he began his investigation, his superiors at the Boston Veterans Administration said they would not support his efforts.

Senator Thomas McIntyre of New Hampshire testified that there are growing suspicions that the government is trying to, in his words, "stonewall" efforts by the National Center for Disease Control to determine if there is a problem at Portsmouth and eight other shipyards.

Presence Of Soviet Subs Upsets Swedish Officials

The Swedish Foreign Ministry said Tuesday that Sweden will express concern to the Soviet Union about six Russian submarines which patrol the Baltic Sea carrying nuclear missiles.

Swedish Foreign Ministry spokesman Lars Rohmert said the flotilla was stationed permanently in the Sea between Sweden and Russia about one year ago. He said it is "significant from a point of security policy, since it's a new weapon in the Baltic." He added: "We plan to take up this question on a diplomatic level."

Bertil Lagervall, a spokesman for the Swedish National Defense Staff, said, "This does not alter our strategic situation. It would hardly be of any importance from military aspects." He said it makes no difference whether a missile armed with a nuclear warhead is fired from the Baltic, the North Sea or from ashore in some eastern state.

Foreign Minister Karin Soder revealed the presence of the Russian subs in an interview published Tuesday in a Stockholm newspaper, Svenska Dagbladet. The paper said the submarines carried missiles with a range of 745 miles that could reach south to Paris and north to the tip of Scandinavia.

The newspaper also reports that Swedish defense units have observed the submarines close to Swedish territorial limits while patroling the Southern Baltic. But Rohmert said, "They sail in Russian and international waters and there is no legal way to act as long as they do so."

Lagervall said the submarines, of the so-called Golf class, were built in the late 1950's and early 1960's.

Both the Soviet Union and the United States deploy submarines armed with nuclear missiles in international waters throughout the world. Both powers are known to maintain a substantial sub presence off each other's coasts.

Sweden traditionally follows an independent foreign policy and has not engaged in war since it joined the European alliance against Napoleon in 1813.

Obesity More Dangerous Than Saccharin

A University of Pittsburgh physicist said the dangers of obesity are greater than the dangers of cancer from saccharin. Dr. Bernard Cohen said in an interview with Science magazine that a 45-year-old man, 10% overweight, has a decreased life expectancy of 29 days for each excess pount. But Cohen says a person who drinks a diet soda daily during a lifetime cuts life expectancy by nine seconds per 12 ounce serving.

Nicaraguan Students Killed

Witnesses say National Guard troops killed three college students and wounded two others in Managua, Nicaragua Monday night. The witnesses said the troops opened fire with machine guns and rifles when about one thousand students marched from the campus of the University of Nicaragua in an anti-Government demonstration. The protest came in the wake of a new refusal by President Anastasio Somoza to resign before his term ends in 1981.

Police report seven guerillas were killed and 15 wounded in fighting earlier Monday in a city about 40 miles south of the capitol. Demonstrations against Somoza were reported in four other cities.

Debate Continues On Canal Treaties

The Senate held its tenth day of debate on the Panama Canal Treaties Tuesday and the leadership is showing signs of impatience, saying it may take steps to speed the process. Democratic majority leader Robert Byrd said, "About everything that can be said has been said." And Republican leader Howard Baker said he will seek a limit to the time spent on each proposed amendment.

Both men support the treaties, which would turn the canal over to Panama in the year 2000. A two-thirds majority is needed for passage.

A survey by the Associated Press and NBC News shows that popular support for the Panama Canal treaties has eroded in recent weeks. But the poll shows 54% of Americans who are familiar with the agreement still support senate ratification if proposed amendments are included. In a January survey, 65% supported such amended treaties.

The amendments would guarantee U.S. defense rights and priority passage for American ships in crisis periods after Panama takes over the canal.

UMWA Officials Wage Campaign For Contract Approval

Officials of the United Mine Workers Union conceded today (Tuesday) there is a tough fight ahead to get membership approval of the new UMW contract. The tentative pact includes sought-after wage increases and guaranteed health and pension benefits, but it keeps restrictions on the right to hold wildcat strikes at the local level.

Union officials say they are counting on what they call a "silent majority" to ratify the pact. They are also willing to spend some $40,000 on a television promotion campaign.

Anti-Palestinian Sentiment High In Israel

Anti-Palestinian feeling is running high in Egypt, and observers say Egyptian President Sadat may be trying to separate himself from the Palestine Liberation Organization. The Cairo Govermnent took steps to reduce the special tax and travel privileges of the 150,000 Palestinians living in Egypt. There has also been significant Anti-PLO sentiment in the Egyptian press since the murder of a leading Egyptian editor by two self-proclaimed Palestinians on Cyprus more than a week ago.

The PLO condemned the murder of the Egyptian editor on Cyprus and insisted it had taken no part in the affair.

VPIRG Objects To Pesticide Spray Program

A recent state proposal to spray sugar maple trees with the pesticide carbaryl drew strong criticism today from the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG). VPIRG charged large scale aerial spraying of the chemical agent may endanger public health, contaminate the state's maple syrup and be ineffective in controlling caterpillars that have been defoliating Vermont's woodlands.

VPIRG Assistant Director Leigh Seddon contends serious health questions surround the use of carbaryl. "Studies have found carbaryl to interfere with the reproductive systems of mammals and suggest that it may be a teratogen (capable of causing birth defects), Seddon said. Carbaryl is currently under review by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) because of evidence that it caused birth defects when fed to dogs.

Seddon noted using the chemical on Vermont's maple trees may lead to contamination of the maple syrup. "The presence of this controversial chemical in our maple syrup products certainly won't help their sale," Seddon said. "It may be the cure is worse than the problem, especially if EPA confirms the health hazards of carbaryl."

The proposed spray program is directed at the tent caterpillar which defoliated close to 30,000 acres of woodland last year. Seddon noted, however, that carbaryl is a broad spectrum insecticide that kills not only the target insect but most others as well. Because carbaryl is a indiscriminate killer, its use has often caused more problems than it solved, he said.

"By eliminating beneficial insects along with the target insect, carbaryl creates an ecological vacuum in which the target insect can later multiply without the check of other insect predators," Seddon explained. "A Massachusetts' spray program for the gypsy moth backfired for just this reason."

According to the VPIRG researcher use of a biological agent (Bacillus thuringiensis) is preferable from an environmental and health perspective. "Even though use of a biological agent is more expensive per acre, in the long run it may be the most cost-effective method of control."

Carter Budget Increases Aid To Education

Carter promised to seek ways to allow parochial and other private schools to participate more in the programs for the disadvantaged. But he reiterated his opposition to moves in Congress to give parents of private school children a tax credit for the tuition they pay.

Carter disclosed in his fiscal 1979 budget proposals in January that he would seek to raise spending for education to $11.6 billion, up from $10.4 billion in the current year. But he recently announced a new $1.5 billion package of increased aid to college students primarily from the middle class that raised the total to $12.9 billion.

Miller Facing Opposition

William Miller told the Senate Banking Committee Tuesday he was unaware that payments his firm made in 1973 to its sales agent in Iran were questionable. The panel, weighing Miller's nomination to chair the Federal Reserve Board, is probing the alleged relationship between an Iranian military official and the firm which received the payments.

Miller said the company he heads, Textron, was unaware of any such relationship. He said if Textron was deceived by the Iranians, neither the company nor he should be penalized.

Committee Chairman William Proxmire and other members have voiced concern over the payment by a Textron subsidiary in connection with the sale of helicopters to Iran.

Apartheid:

Does UVM Support It?

By Eric Kilburn

Apartheid, or the institutionalized repression of black people in South Africa, is a topic that at first glance appears almost totally removed from UVM, or for that matter, any other university. In recent months, however, students at several schools around the country, most notably UCLA and UMass, have succeeded in forcing the University to withdraw its investments in companies with South African holdings. The students claim that corporations with investments in South Africa are directly or indirectly supporting apartheid, and that institutions of higher learning (and ethics) should not be in any way involved with such practices. The corporations involved maintain they can be more effective in bringing socioeconomic equality by remaining in South Africa, and despite numerous shareholder resolutions to the contrary, to date most have refused to leave. An examination of corporate involvement in South Africa and its relationship to apartheid, particularly in the context of UVM's sixteen million dollar investment portfolio, seems in order.

South Africa is endowed with a plethora of mineral resources – gold, diamonds, iron ore, uanadium, asbestos, copper, uranium, titanium and manganese, and for years has proven to be one of the highest returns per investment of any foreign country. About 350 companies, comprising a virtual who's who of U.S. industry, currently have branches or subsidiaries in South Africa. Their holdings are valued at nearly 1.7 billion dollars, constituting an estimated seventeen percent of the total foreign investment in that country. In addition, U.S. banks have at least 2.2 billion in outstanding loans to the industry and government of South Africa. In 1976, American exports to South Africa totaled 1.35 billion against .93 billion in imports, a ratio that contrasts markedly with the U.S. world trade balance. Undoubtedly, the extent of U.S. financial commitment, and the concomitant trade surplus were crucial factors in the U.S. decision not to support the economic sanctions against South Africa that were proposed in the United Nations in October, 1977.

With the escalation of racial tension and demands for the end of apartheid, companies with South African holdings have begun to feel internal and external pressure for a change in corporate policy. Their response has been to draft a document known as the Sullivan Principles, a set of six resolutions aimed at promoting fair employment practices, to which fifty-six companies are now signatory. Almost from the beginning the principles have been criticized as "bland" and "inadequate."

A report released in January 1978 by the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on African Affairs dropped a bombshell on the purportedly good intentions of American companies by concluding that the U.S. corporate record in South Africa is "abysmal." The report observes that "the leniency with which the (South African) government has treated U.S. firms suggests that they operate well within the laws and customs of society." Furthermore, the study definitively states that "collectively, U.S. corporations... have made no significant impact on either relaxing apartheid or in establishing company policies which would offer a model of multinational responsibility." Perhaps the best summary of corporate attitudes regarding political change can be offered by George Vogta, Executive Vice-President of Citibank, the nation's second largest. In an article on South Africa that appeared in America on February 12, 1977, he stated that "In the strictly political context, there has to be one rule for American multinational corporations wherever they operate. That rule is 'hands-off'."

Faced with an apparent lack of concern by corporate heads on the apartheid question, activist individuals and groups have urged that shareholders sell their interest in firms with South African holdings and make their reasons for selling known to the company. This 'wash my hands of sin' mode of action has a practical offshoot in that if large quantities of stock in a given company are dumped on the market over a short time, the value of a share drops and new investment in the company is discouraged. If for example, twenty percent of the stockholders of General Motors joined forces and drafted a letter to GM stating that unless GM sold its $160 million South African investments by a certain date, a mass divestiture would occur, GM would probably leave in a hurry. Of course, such a unified action is very unlikely, and parties who sell their stock in multinationals with South African interests do so mainly for moralistic reasons.

"The link between South Africa and UVM stems from the University's $16 million stock portfolio, which, depending upon market conditions, pays yearly dividends in the area of $500,000."

The link between South Africa and UVM stems from the University's sixteen million stock portfolio, which, depending on market conditions, pays yearly dividends in the area of $500,000. In a recent interview with the author, UVM Treasurer Gordon Paterson disclosed the names of five companies (Ford, IBM, Caterpillar, Exxon, and Schlumberger) with holdings in South Africa, in which UVM had a total investment of $702,000. In emphasizing that four of the five companies subscribed to the Sullivan principals (the remaining one has issued a statement of equal employment policies), Mr. Paterson stated

Burlington's Energy "Park"

A Nice Idea, But...

By Randy McMullen

Burlington voters will be deciding on March 7th whether their municipal electrical company should get the go-ahead to construct an "energy park," consisting of a wood-burning generator and a trash incinerator (both along the Intervale), as well as a hydro-electric facility on the Winooski River. Should all three proposals – one for each facility – pass, then Burlington Electric could become the first power company in the country to invest extensively in alternative energy sources.

For this reason, Burlington Electric has been courting its ratepayers with a series of pamphlets and posters, high in aesthetic quality, but low in informational value. Their campaign has announced that rates and taxes will both remain stable. It has been promised that pollution will not be a problem, and that the freedom from foreign fuel sources will bring security for the future.

Opponents have countered that there are still too many unanswered questions and that Burlington Electric may be moving ahead too fast with what could someday be a good idea.

Some opponents, such as Steve Lange, a former Washington State planner, question whether the proposed plants are at all needed. Lange cites Burlington Electric's feasibility report – done by the engineering firm of Henningson, Durham and Richardson – as being inaccurate in its electrical demand projections. The report states that 5–7% more electricity will be needed for the future, and part of this projection is based on calculations to compensate for what was referred to as a mild winter in 1976. Lange says that electrical demand is growing only around 1% per year and that the electricity used by each person has decreased since the oil embargo in the early 70's.

Lange's statistics are taken from a study done by Green Mountain Power, which also disclosed that Burlington used less electricity in 1977 than it did in 1976. Whether or not the winter of 1977 can be determined as "mild" is still a question.

All three of the proposed plants would be funded in part by the issuance of electrical bonds. That is, the total cost for the three plants is estimated at $105 million, and Burlington Electric plans to float around $65 million in bonds. Where the other $40 million will come from is not clear.

Some complaints have been raised against the proposals, all of which state that voter approval would not be needed for the issuance of more bonds, should the construction and operational costs turn out to be higher than expected. Richard Valentinetti, of the Solid Waste and Air Pollution division of the Agency of Environmental Conservation, calls the proposal a "blank check" for Burlington Electric. He adds that some costs – such as air pollution equipment for the proposed wood burning plant which could run close to $1 million – have not yet been considered in the estimations.

Burlington Electric, however, seems to feel that funding will not be a problem. They explain that the ratepayer will not face the brunt of the costs, because the bonds will be paid back from the revenue accrued through the sale of excess electricity. Edmund Norse, a spokesman for the municipal power company, also states that the plants would "hold the line" on electric bills, meaning that the rates would only increase 8-10% per year instead of the 11-13% yearly hike that he forsees without the construction of the energy park. Norse does feel, though, that more study is needed to "finalize plans." Valentinetti agrees with him, and speculates that a thorough study would cost between $3 and 5 million. Can this be covered by the bonds? And how much would it delay the final completion of the proposed plants? An important statistic here is that construction costs have been escalating about 8% a year.

Most critics of the proposed energy park argue that its possible environmental consequences demand attention. Valentinetti explains that the smoke stacks from the wood chip plant would rise just high enough to smile down upon the residents along Manhatten Drive in Burlington, and greet them with some 50 pounds of particulate matter an hour. The Clean Air Act amendment of 1977 poses regulations that Burlington Electric's Moran plant (located on Lake Champlain) can barely handle by itself. If the proposed wood chip plant became a reality, the Moran plant would either have to be virtually shut down or its air pollution control devices drastically improved in order to meet these federal regulations. To complicate matters further, Valentinetti explains, the air pollution control mechanisms for the proposed wood chip plant have not yet been tested anywhere in the country.

The proposed hydro-electric plant – which would be located near the Chace Mill building in Winooski – has found opposition from city planners there, who feel that it would interfere with the redevelopment plans being made for the area. City Manager Peter Clavelle feels that the flow of the Winooski River would be reduced to a quiet pool, which wouldn't exactly entice potential developers and businessmen. Clavelle is also concerned about the possibility that the construction of a dam could cause flooding problems and lower the quality of the water.

The Winooski River is also a dumping ground for the treated waste that comes from the towns of Winooski and Colchester. And Francis Taginski, Assistant Town Manager of Colchester, has said that cutting down the flow of the Winooski could hamper that river's capability of handling the waste. Taginski has not directly stated that he is against the hydro-electric plant, but he does want to see more information.

It seems that there are many who want to see more information, and this writer is one of them. The questions raised in this article point to the unquestionable fact that the proposed plants need to stay just where they are: on the drawing board.

Wood and trash burning, as well as hydro-electricity, are sources that will be needed in the future, and in many ways, they seem more desirable than the sources that are relied upon now. But without the right analysis and preparation, any idea, no matter how promising, can backfire. When voters go to the polls on March 7th, they should remember that what they are voting on, and that what Burlington Electric has been promoting, is a concept and not a reality.

Snelling Signs Generic Drug Bill Into Law

By Robert J. Moore

The generic or lower priced equivalent drug bill requiring pharmacists to replace brand name prescription drugs with the most inexpensive chemical and therapeutic substitute was signed into law last Thursday by governor Richard Snelling.

Under the new law, if a doctor desires a brand name drug, he will be required to make it specifically clear in the prescription that no substitution is to be made. Snelling had termed passage of the bill one of his most important legislative concerns.

The law provides for the establishment of a "formulary" committee which will determine which drugs will be designated as substitutes. At least 50-100 drugs will be affected by the bill.

Experts have estimated that Vermonters will save approximately one million dollars a year by purchasing generic drug substitutes instead of higher priced brand name drugs. The bill, drafted by a committee including representatives of the Vermont State Medical Society, Vermont Pharmaceutical Association, Department of Social Welfare, and the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG), was also supported by prominent consumer groups and important health organizations.

The Vermont Senate overwhelmingly approved the bill February 16 in a lopsided 27-2 vote. This endorsement followed the unanimous approval by the House in a roll call vote earlier in the month.

The bill has been vehemently attacked by Senator Madeline Harwood (R-Bennington) who questioned where legal responsibility lay if a person were harmed by a generic substitute. When confronted with this question, Senator Robert Bloomer (R-Rutland) responded that pharmacists, physicians, the state human services secretary, and the recently established "formulary" committee, which determines which drugs can be substituted, all could possibly be sued by the injured individual. According to Senator Thomas E. McGregor, (D-Grand Isle), a pharmacist and sponsor of the bill, "the pharmacist is responsible for any drug that goes out his door."

The bill was termed "a major victory for consumers in Vermont" by Deborah Katz, Health researcher for VPIRG.

Environmental Protection Agency, and comply with Act 250, Vermont's land use and development law. And the time factor for these processes is long. In order for BED to get this approval, their plans will have to be finalized and studied thoroughly. According to BED estimates, the studies alone will take another year. Approval from the three bodies above will push the construction date further into the future. Construction costs will rise, according to BED estimates approximately 8% per year. With the projected cost of $105 million, annual increases of 8% represent 8.4 million dollars per year.

Campaign for Funds

the campaign for funds to expand the library. "The library campaign to date is being conducted with a very selective list of donors, so it's very much a one-to-one marketing effort. You don't have a problem marketing the library locally, because everyone can just walk into the library and see exactly what the need is. It's those who aren't aware of it on a daily basis..."

There are other problems inherent in major campaigning that result from the structural make-up of the university itself. Carpenter explained the University's predicament. "Most institutions, when they go to foundations, probably have to sell two things: they have to sell the institution and its worth for support, and then they have to sell the project they want supported specifically. The University of Vermont, in most foundations, has to start with a third one – giving to our type of institution." He then read excerpts from several foundation guidelines. The most lenient of them stated, "Traditionally give to private institutions." There were no state schools listed as recipients of donations. No one donated to "sort of" private institutions like the University of Vermont.

Another question fund-raisers have to answer is how to prioritize their needs once they are established. "Fund raisers should certainly listen to those who are responsible for the future of the institution. On the whole, the entire university is apt to get involved in it (the decision process)," explained Carpenter. "Needs get translated into priorities, and those get translated into costs. Then the development people, working with a host of volunteers and maybe even professional consultants, have to look at those needs and cost objectives and say indeed, 'Can we do it?'"

Carpenter philosophized on the development process: "Development itself has gone through so many phases and redefinitions, that what was proper one era is not the way to look at it in another. If you look at development in today's terms, it really includes all fund-raising." He continued, "Development should start the first time a prospective applicant sets foot on campus. Because that encounter can set an emotional feeling and spirit that continues and is built on right through and beyond the four / years here."

Carpenter concluded his remarks by stating, "A development effort at an institution is a long slow patient process. It's the old iceberg; an awful large percentage of it is below the surface. If you're starting out fresh and beginning to put it all together, which is essentially the case here, it seems like a pretty big iceberg."

regeneration of Vermont forests. More research is needed." Ms. Knight also noted that "the impacts are highly interrelated and dependent upon management of the harvested site and the type of equipment used."

The Interim report raised further questions on the experimental harvesting site. "How will the wood be harvested in an environmentally sound manner? Adverse impact can be severe if the supplier is not sensitive to environmental and aesthetic values as well as the limitations of the resource."

Richard Valentennette, Director of Solid Waste and Air Pollution, spoke at a recent Church Street Center Resource Recovery meeting and emphasized the need to expose the voters to the true costs and trade offs the project will have on Vermont. "I question the amount of speculated growth rates BED has stated. Do we really need this vast amount of energy? Wouldn't it seem more logical and less trade offs involved to have a labor intensive versus capital intensive wood burning operation," he said.

Bundy

He added that the United States now has a much more "profound" respect for trying to understand the "dynamics" of a local situation.

Another lesson learned is that decisions to intervene in foreign conflicts must be more carefully considered. He warned against the United States making "sweeping judgments" about nations deemed hostile.

One profound flaw Bundy noted was the lack of a "great debate" in Congress during that period over the issue. The country did not have a sense of what was involved, he said, adding that the flaw widened into an abscess and eventually became "one of the greatest wounds of all time."

Alaska: The Battle for the Wilderness

By Jonathan Roth

with Eric Swanson and Tom Storrow

Alaska is "one of the few remaining places where man can find genuine wilderness, tranquility, and solitude," expressed Walter Kiknuss, a former Alaskan fish and game commissioner. Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus calls it a "rejuvination for us as a country." Oil and mining interests see it as an incredible mineral resource.

Whether these individuals converge or conflict in their perceptions of what Alaska is and how it should be used, one thing is certain: all agree the state is a very valuable piece of real estate.

The days in the mid-nineteenth century when Secretary of State William Seward had to rationalize his purchase of the Alaskan Territory from Russia for $7.2 million are long gone. The Great State (the meaning in Aleut of Alaska) has overwhelmingly proven its value in the eyes of many diverse interests. The federal government, in recognition of the unrivaled quality of Alaska's fragile environment, under seige by development interests, has decided to protect vast spanses of the state's remaining wilderness.

In January 1977, Representative Morris Udall (D-Arizona), Chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, introduced "The Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act" (H.R. 39), currently being debated by the House. Seventy-six House members co-sponsored the bill.

H.R. 39 originally called for protection of 114 million acres of federally controlled land within the state, but this has now been cut to 97 million. The bill includes a total of 13 new and expanded national parks doubling the existing national park acreage, 14 wildlife refuges, and 23 wild and scenic rivers which highlight the legislation drafted primarily by the Alaskan Coalition. The Coalition is a pooling of twenty-four of the nation's major environmental forces, including the Friends of the Earth, the Sierra Club, and Wilderness Society.

THE NEWBORN STATE

A dramatic history of events has laid the groundwork for the Conservation proposals of the 375 million acres of wildlife packed Alaska. In 1959 ninety-two years after the U.S. purchased the territory, Alaska was voted the forty-ninth state in the union. Upon statehood, the federal government relinquished claim of 105 million acres (about the size of California) to be chosen by the state at their discretion from the 375 million which comprises the territory.

The new and sudden change in legal rule neglected one interested faction. Alaskan natives living throughout the entire territory were given little or no voice in the allotment of the state's lands. Finally, cries from the disgruntled group to regain claim to their land rights rang in the corridors of the Washington bureaucracy. The natives were being restrained from living off the land, their projects as the Alaska Coast of Engineers' plans for the project on the Yukon River were making it difficult for natives to live off the land. Secretary of the Interior Stewart Udall, a noted environmentalist, responded in 1966 by calling for a moratorium on all land development in Alaska until the issue was resolved. Not until natives' protests threatened the building of the Alaska Pipeline did the U.S. Congress quickly decide the issue.

> "Hence the basic issue is not whether those public lands should be protected, but how extensive the protected areas should be, where they should be, and how they should be managed."

The resulting Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, enacted in 1971, awarded forty-four million acres — not adequate space for all of them — of federally controlled land to the region's Eskimos, Aleuts, and Indians. An amendment to this Act (not directly related to the Natives) — 17 (d) (1) — directed the Secretary of the Interior to delineate 137 million acres of remaining federal land for study as possible areas for future national protection. 17(d)(2) of the Act stipulated that eighty million acres of those 137 million must be designated as protected federal lands by December 1978. In Congress these areas consequently have been nicknamed the "D-2" lands.

NATIONAL CONSENSUS

An indirect outgrowth of Congress' December 1978 deadline to declare the eighty million acres is the Alaskan National Interest Land's Conservation Act. H.R. 39 was drafted and referred to the House Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands, chaired by John Seiberling (D—Ohio). To determine the national consensus of the lands in question, the subcommittee held sixteen major hearings in states from Alaska to Georgia. Besides energy, mineral, and timber interests and conservationists, more than half of the 2300 witnesses in the hearings were native Alaskans who expressed differing views on the Lands Conservation Act.

According to Mike Hickok, reporter for the Anchorage Daily News, "So far there has been no clear majority (of Alaskans) for or against the bill." However, Chairman Seiberling in his own testimony stated, "Although there was disagreement on the specifics of the legislation, there was, throughout Alaska, near unanimity on the importance of preserving Alaska's grandeur and undeveloped beauty. Hence the basic issue is not whether those public lands should be protected, but how extensive the protected areas should be, where they should be, and how they should be managed."

One of the major concerns of Natives evident in hearings, said Seiberling, is the future loss of preserving the subsistance lifestyle they have practiced for centuries. Says the Ohio Democrat, "Subsistence uses of renewable resources on the public lands in Alaska represent an integral part of the native culture and an important source of food, clothing, and shelter for many residents." H.R. 39 has been written to accommodate these rights by giving subsistence land use priority in conservation districts, establishing the commitment by preserving the resource base in these areas.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONCERNS

Environmental and conservation interests waging the "battle for the wilderness" are arguing primarily that the bill's original intent — to conserve entire ecosystems — has been obscured. Pressures from influential oil, timber, and mineral lobbies have been attributed as the causes of considerable cutbacks.

Michael Frome, a well-known environmental journalist and visiting professor in UVM's Environmental Program this semester, emphasized in his L.A. Times Environmental Trails column last month that "updated plans have broken up areas that ought to be intact." Cited as an example was the extraction of lower reaches of the proposed Noatak National Ecological Preserve in Northwest Alaska from the bill's original draft. The preserve was planned initially to encompass "the largest complete river system still free from intrusion by man."

Challenges of the value of additional changes in the bill's latest draft are many. Reduction in wilderness designations by nearly one-half has inflamed the conservation community. Also, provisions such as the one to provide, as the need arises, major transportation and utility rights-of-way across conservation system units have inspired criticism.

DEVELOPING INTERESTS

Finally, there are H.R. 39's opponents. These are primarily mining and oil interests. Alaska has large coal and nickel deposits to add to its sixteen billion barrels of known oil reserves and forty-six trillion cubic feet of proven natural gas reserves. Despite the proposed act's allowance for seventy-five percent of the state's land to be open to mineral development, they charge that Alaska's resources would be "locked up" in the Land Conservation Act is passed.

Alaska Governor Jay Hammond backs this notion: "It is not easy to be both oil barrel to the nation and national park to the world." Don Young, the forty-ninth state's only representative, equates the legislation with "colonial rule from Washington, D.C." Many Alaskan politicians are likewise against the Udall bill, and over one hundred amendments have been introduced in Committee to erode its strength.

Senator Ted Stevens (D—Alaska) has tried to work towards this end in the Senate. Asking for a more "diversified land-use policy," he introduced bill S.1787, in hopes of replacing S.1500, the Senate Counterpart to H.R.39. S.1787 proposed protection of only 25 million acres.

The time is drawing near. December 1978 is only ten months away, and Alaska waits for a decision: conserve or develop? This is the most basic question to be answered. Whatever the outcome, the battle for Alaska, as Secretary of the Interior Andrus puts it, "is the most important land conservation program in the history of this country."

Sucrose
A Sweet Enemy

By Barry Gustin

Sucrose, the major constituent of sugar, honey, molasses, maple and corn syrup, has been a ubiquitous companion for most of us since our early childhood. The average American consumes more than 100 lbs. of sucrose a year, not only in coffee, soft drinks, and rich desserts, but in hidden form as a flavor enhancer added to such foods as canned vegetables and fruits, breads, smoked meats, and salad dressings. This simple substance now comprises approximately 25% of what we eat in a given day.

Recently, scientific studies have implicated sucrose as being one of the dietary factors responsible for obesity, diabetes, heart disease, and other forms of degenerative disease in this country. The Senate Select Committee on Nutrition headed by George McGovern has called for major modifications in eating habits. They specifically recommend that foods containing a notable percentage of sucrose be dropped from the diet and replaced by complex carbohydrates so that the total intake of sucrose in the diet is less than 15% while the intake of complex carbohydrates (grains and vegetables) constitute at least 45% of the diet.

The impetus for these recommendations comes from the findings of numerous studies. The most immediate problem often cited by nutritionists is the danger in displacing complex carbohydrates which are high in micro-nutrients, (minerals and vitamins), with sucrose, which is essentially an energy source offering little other nutritional value. This not only increases the potential for depriving the body of essential minerals and vitamins but sucrose actually increases the body's need for these nutrients since it interferes with their absorption. Minerals and vitamins such as chromium and thiamin that are necessary for the metabolism of glucose (a constituent of sucrose) are not sufficiently abundant to handle large quantities of dietary sucrose.

Sucrose differs from the nutritionally abundant complex carbohydrates in another way. If one was to eat a bowl of sugar, the body would not feel the same as it does when a bowl of rice is eaten. Sure, the sugar and rice are both carbohydrates, but the rice is a carbohydrate made up of long chains of simple sugars, such as glucose, while the sugar is composed of 99% sucrose. The simple sucrose is metabolized too quickly; it turns the system into a hormonal hot-rod in which large amounts of insulin and other related hormones are secreted. We feel an initial surge of energy. On the other hand, the carbohydrates in the rice are metabolized quite slowly and evenly allowing small amounts of simple sugars (glucose for ex.) to trickle into the blood stream while still providing bountiful energy for bodily processes.

The overall effect of high sucrose consumption is just the opposite of what one would expect – low blood sugar (hypoglycemia). Many experts claim that a vast majority of the American populace have hypoglycemia to some degree. If you consume a lot of sucrose and you find yourself feeling weak, tired, moody, sleeping long hours, and constantly hungry, the chances are that you may have hypoglycemia.

Various studies have also shown that a high sucrose consumption raises blood fat and cholesterol levels. These high levels of fat and cholesterol in the blood are directly correlated with vascular disease and diabetes. The Yemenite Jews before they immigrated to Israel 30 years ago had an extremely low incidence of diabetes. But since then, there has been a tragic rise in the disease and this has occurred without a significant rise in saturated fat intake and is traceable to one and only one factor: a marked increase in the consumption of sucrose since they entered Israel.

Already, diabetes and heart disease are two of the leading killers in our country, while their occurrence in other countries having different dietary habits is quite low. It's time for people to awaken to the potential dangers in their diet. For years it was known that sucrose was the major cause of tooth decay but for many people, this was easily overlooked. But now, the increasing incidence of degenerative disease in our society is forcing us to confront the problem. Only a change in dietary habits will save us from an inevitable epidemic of these nutritionally related diseases.

With regard to sucrose, it is strongly recommended that its intake from all sources except fresh or unsweetened processed fruit be decreased by at least 50% and be replaced by complex carbohydrate from foods such as vegetables and whole grains. Let's get together and pass the word!

Onion River Coop

A Successful Consumer Owned Food Cooperative

By Tim Traver

Archibald Street is the home of the Onion River Cooperative, a diminuitive white house with a porch with broken furniture, windows, and stored sleds facing the street. It is perhaps the most successful consumer owned food cooperative in Vermont, though in the past year it has faced a drastic decline in its membership of nearly two thousand families.

I have come for the monthly coordinators meeting during which time representatives from each of the buying groups meet with the six paid coordinators to discuss monthly business, work scheduling, and miscellaneous news. I enter the office and dust the white wings of the snow storm off my shoulders. The blue flame of the space heater warms me immediately, and I look around at some of the familiar faces milling about the small space. Everyone is talking about the storm.

The office itself feels like a vestige of the sixties — a Eugene McCarthy campaign headquarters. A ragged couch holds a sleeping child. Books seem to be falling from the shelves and papers occur in various piles here and there. It is not the office you would find in an A&P or Grand Union. Signs on the wall are expressively hand done.

A look at the people in the office warns something other than a sixties vestige. Most of the faces look strikingly normal, and people are dressed conservatively. The Onion River Coop is an organization whose heart is the middle class family, whose providers more than likely have a keen concern for purchasing the cheapest and best quality produce and whole grain foods available to them.

If there is an over-riding philosophy, it certainly does not grip its participants with the fervor of earlier organizational years. Perhaps no one present could admit a true understanding of what that philosophy is today, but no doubt the experience of working together over the years has had a profoundly positive affect on the lives and good health of the members. Why the decline in numbers then?

The philosophy grew directly from social and political movements of the sixties. The coop philosophers wrote, "People should begin taking control of the various aspects that affect their lives... that the interests of the masses of people should come before the interests of profit... that through cooperation and sharing we will learn to breakdown the isolation and alienation many in our society feel today." When you are working with three other volunteers and someone asks you if they should cut a banana in half so the scale will read perfectly, or two people help you chase the grapefruit from the case you have just picked up the wrong way, consequently tumbling them on the lettuce strewn floor, you experience a kind of social healing. "Working with all age groups when you are used to being only with your own is a kind of eye-opener," the girl that then ate the half banana said.

From the office I go into the large bare room and sit down on the floor beside a woman knitting blue baby socks. "A boy baby," she hopes. The room that was filled with crates of vegetables and chaos the day before is swept clean now and a sheet taped to the far wall lists tonight's topics. People continue to filter into the room which is by then pulsing with the din of gossip. Neal, the senior coordinator, is up front introducing a perky middle-aged lady who has set up coop groups in some of the senior citizens homes in Burlington. I had worked next to her putting orders up the week before and it had been like standing next to a whirlwind. "The arrival of the food is the highpoint of their day," she says with twinkling blue eyes, going on to tell percentages of the people in the homes now utilizing the service. She describes plans to set up programs in other centers and other towns before sitting down. The woman knitting socks nudges me saying, "The high point of their day is eating the food, believe me."

One coordinator, Michele, believes the decline in numbers over last year to be related to personnel transitions on the staff. Most of the coordinators working now have been around less than a year. When ordering was made slightly more difficult due to changing state-wide purchasing schedules, a lot of families quit and returned to the market where buying prepackaged food was easier. The wave or movement that sprouted little coops in its wake across the nation, giving birth to books and all kinds of cooperative offshoots, is settling down again, but not back into obscurity. As the overhead of the organization increased, prices did too. All these factors contributed to a decline in participation, but the basics have been laid, and are here to stay.

How does the cooperative work? The simplest unit is the household. An assemblage of households, that could also be the floor of a dormitory or a combination of several suites, or just a handful of friends, makes a group and consolidates their order. Orders for produce coming from the Boston market are taken to the coop one week and the food arrives on the following week. Grain orders have a cycle of four weeks. Members of the group take turns picking up and distributing food to other members and every ten months each member puts in a four hour work commitment at 77 Archibald. If you can afford it, there is also a building donation of five dollars requested per family.

Though much of the work, such as unloading the truck and putting up orders is done by the members, six paid coordinators handle most of the book keeping, ordering, research and buying. Making all decisions together, they embody, perhaps more than any other aspect of the coop, the spirit of a true collective, sharing the burden and relying on the trust and openness of the others. Trust on the part of the coop members, when accountability is so difficult is also an important factor if the coop is to remain a cooperative at all. As the coop grows, it demands more organization and clear communication. As it grows, it also slowly transforms, out of necessity, into what begins to look like a typical big business. Many would argue that this is what the Onion River Coop is becoming, in the aftermath of its earlier, idealistic years. But the essential trust and the form of cooperative leadership remain, and separate it from any business.

Yesterday morning I entered the office of the coop, while a rusty-bearded coordinator went through the store-front procedure with two bewildered looking women who'd come to put in eight volunteer hours of work apiece. "Eight hours," he muttered as he brushed past, "no one does that anymore." He moved to a man from Jericho and his son and began educating them in the use of the adding machine. "But how does it subtract?" they were saying, as he walked back into the store. I waited for twenty minutes and never had a word with him. When I left, a voice was explaining that it knew all about roofing and could volunteer hours to finish roofing work that had been started last summer.

Nationally Known Environmentalist At UVM

By Alan Marshall

A noted journalist and one of the most active conservationists in the U.S., Michael Frome is a visiting professor at UVM this semester lecturing two classes — Environmental Journalism and Environmental Politics.

The articles on the Burlington Electric Department's (BED) Bond proposals and Alaskan Land Conservation Acts in this week's Cynic were both authored by students in his journalism class. The class, numbering thirty — though fifty others attempted to enroll — "has made a lot of progress" according to Frome.

"We're trying to have everyone tackle an issue in Vermont." The South End Connector, National Forests in Vermont, and Restoration of Atlantic Salmon in the Connecticut River are prime examples of projects students are investigating. One particular scholar in training is attempting to estimate the environmental and social costs of the paper that is wasted in wrapping McDonalds' products, particularly in terms of lost trees.

Mr. Frome has been encouraging his students to seek publication of their works and to write letters to the editer on various environmental aspects in local and statewide papers. "At first they were writing in cosmic terms," remarked Mr. Frome. However, he added, "the BED stories were an example of first class investigative reporting where they were not afraid to ask questions."

Distraught with the fact that UVM lacks any form of a journalism program, Frome seems happy with the enthusiasm and effort his students have portrayed. "A journalism major would be a tremendous asset to the University," he expressed.

Alaskan Seminar

A film presentation and discussion of the Alaska Lands Controversy will be held on Thursday, March 9, at 7:30 p.m. in 235 Marsh Life Science Building.

Rita Molneany, public relations representative on Alaska for the Wilderness Society, and Loretta Neumann, staff member of the House Subcommittee on Alaska Lands, will be here from Washington to make the presentation.

This is co-sponsored by the UVM Environmental program and the Sierra Club. Admission is free, and all interested parties are invited to take part.

Volunteering And Internships

The Center For Service Learning

The Center for Service-Learning in the Mansfield House will be conducting an informational week from March 8th through the 15th, introducing both students and faculty to the many internship possibilities offered through Center for Service-Learning programs at UVM.

Formerly known as OVP (Office of Volunteer Programs) the Center for Service-Learning is seeking to acquaint the UVM campus with not only volunteer opportunities, but with internship programs designed to enhance learning capabilities with on-the-job experience.

The two major internships are University Year for Action (UYA) and Service-Learning Internship Program. (SLIP).

UYA is an intense, full year, 40 hour a week job experience with a Vermont human service agency. While learning to adjust to a working situation, the student also participates in a Core-Seminar conducted through CS-L. The seminar is designed to aid the student in maximizing the learning component of the UYA experience. This program also includes a $2500 living allowance.

SLIP is a less intense, one semester program. It is designed for the student who is not able to fulfill a full-year commitment but who would like to derive the learning benefits of an experiential internship. Though there is no formal Core Seminar in this program, the student receives support from the individual members of the CS-L staff.

The informational week schedule will include discussions on the above and other services offered by the Center for Service-Learning.

Thursday, March 9 – Center for Service-Learning at UVM: Informational meeting for internship programs, 7:30 – 9:30 p.m. in the Fireplace Lounge at Living/Learning Center, UVM.

Friday, March 10 – New Games, sponsored by the Center for Service-Learning at UVM: 115 Living/Learning from 3:00 – 5:00 p.m.

Monday, March 13 – Center for Service-Learning at UVM: Informational meeting for internship programs, 7:30 – 9:30 p.m. at the Center for Cultural Pluralism (Blundell House), Redstone Campus, UVM.

Tuesday, March 14 – Center for Service-Learning at UVM: Informational meeting for all faculty members in the President's Dining Room, UVM from 3:00 – 5:00 p.m.

Wednesday, March 15 – Center for Service-Learning at UVM: UYA interns discuss the University Year for Action program in Billings South Lounge, UVM, from 9:00 – 1:00.

Big Brother/ Big Sister Program:

All It Takes Is Time

By Sharon Otto

After six years away from his real family Rick was returned to his father's and stepmother's custody. A year later his sister, Billy Jo, was also returned home and the tension began to mount causing rivalry between the two children. Rick had been the only child and now he had to compete for his lost attention. What Rick needs is someone who can give him that extra attention he alone needs.

For Rick and many more like him, there is a way to attain this special attention they need. The Big Brother/Big Sister program, centered out of the Mansfield House at 25 Colchester Ave. tries to help these kids by placing them with an older figure that can be their own special friend. By getting a child like Rick together with someone who shares his interests and is willing to devote some time, a rewarding friendship can form.

To be involved in this program there is only one major requirement: time. If one can devote a few hours a week for at least one academic year then they can have a little brother or a little sister. The program provides bus tokens for any transportation problems and meal passes at the UVM dining halls to get little brothers or sisters in free. Sledding, playing basketball and cooking meals are common examples of activities that can be done together. Groups of big brothers and sisters have gone to the Discovery Museum in Essex in the past. But of course the most important part of your new relationship is that special bond that over time will grow between you and your little brother or sister.

Presently, there is a need for big brothers and big sisters. Approximately 95% of the volunteers are students from the University with the rest coming from the Burlington community. The kids are referred to the program by social workers, teachers and sometimes parents who see a need for the child to receive extra attention. Most are from the low income areas of Burlington and range from ages 5 to 17 years old.

Along with David Clark, one of the coordinators of the program, Candy Perrault explained why the program was started: "A need was seen to help children like Rick find the friends he needed." The Big Brother/Big Sister program can help keep a child off the streets and out of trouble while teaching him new skills or exposing him to new things,

ESSAY

Jerry Brown

Waiting in the Shadows

By Tom Daniels

"Brown epitomizes the often heard notion, 'Hang loose and go with the flow.' His attitude and performance (and sometimes lack of it) have won him overwhelming popularity in a vast and diverse state."

Remember Edmund G. (Jerry) Brown Jr.? He's the one who made a run for the Presidency after only two years as Governor of California. Brown won every primary he entered and finished second in delegates to Jimmy Carter. If 1976 illustrated a lack of leadership from old guard politicians, it also discovered the appeal of the new and unorthodox. Jerry Brown started too late in 1976, but he achieved, in part, what he had set out to do – he "captured the imagination" of millions of voters.

If Jimmy Carter and his family seem to have been rented from a drama casting company, Jerry Brown has enough idiosyncrasies of his own. An ordained Jesuit priest, Brown has been nicknamed "The Mad Monk," though his evangelical proselytizing is second to Carter's But more importantly, Brown serves as something of a counter-culture figure, a holdout of the halcyon 60's when anything seemed possible. He has refused to reside in the Governor's mansion preferring instead an apartment; and he shunned the Governor's gas guzzling limosine in favor of a fuel economy car. At 37, he's a bachelor, though he has been known to date rock superstar Linda Ronstadt. In addition, Brown reportedly sleeps on the floor and practices Zen Buddhism.

One wonders if Jerry Brown could get away with this lifestyle if he were governor of an East Coast state (not to mention Mid-West or South). This is not to imply that Brown is not a hard worker. The East Coast style of politics emphasizes control; Brown, on the other hand, epitomizes the often heard notion "Hang loose and go with the flow." His attitude and performance (and sometimes lack of it) have won him overwhelming popularity in a vast and diverse state. Most political analysts agree that come November, Brown will be California's Governor for another four years.

IS HE FOR REAL?

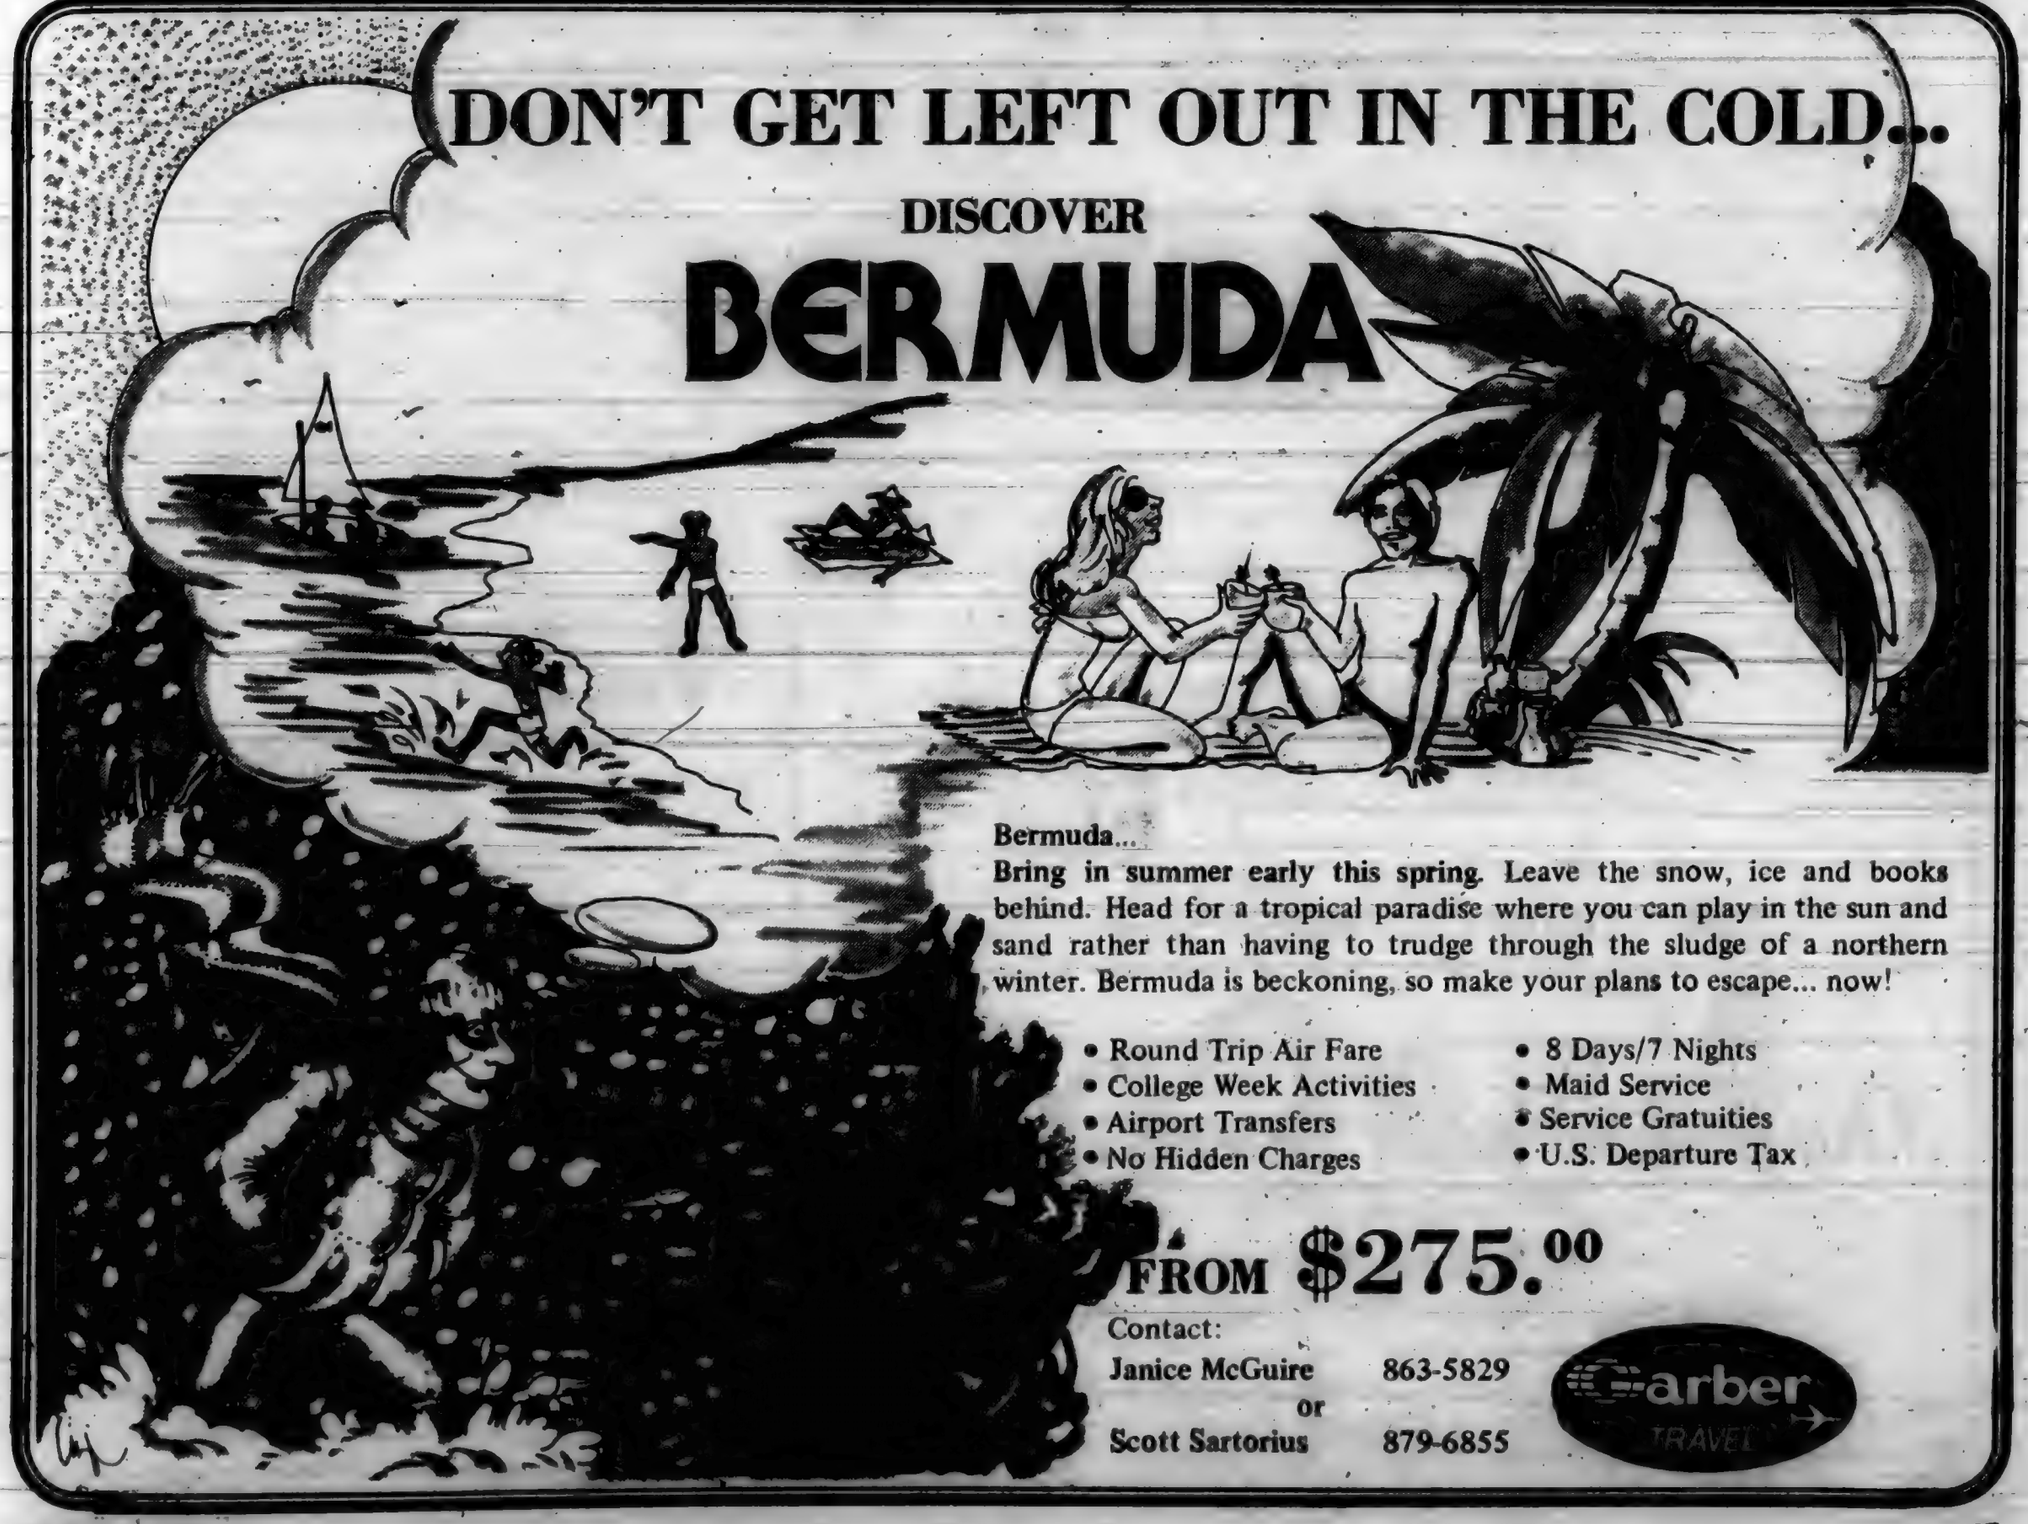
In many ways Jerry Brown has the style of the philosopher king of Plato's mythical Republic.

Brown theorizes where other politicians want to know the bottom line, the bare facts. This means that sometimes Brown substitutes thought for action, but he doesn't ignore the problem. He worries about 'the rate of change' and wants to 'de-institutionalize society.' Repeatedly, Brown tells people not to rely on government to solve all their problems. Perhaps he wants to have a margin of error, or the chance to change his mind the way Carter does.



Unlike most politicians, Brown is in tune with the great minds of his day. He's a fan of Ivan Illich and Thomas Szasz, and he's not afraid of intellectual heavy-weights. He has running raps with the best – most recently Marshall McLuhan – in Co-Evolution Quarterly. Brown earned his popularity while Secretary of State in the early 1970's by standing against oil company drilling off the Santa Barbara Channel, site of an enormous oil spill in 1967. But Brown is also the son of two-term Governor Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, who defeated Richard Nixon in 1962, but lost to Ronald Reagan in 1966. In his run for governor, the younger Brown had name recognition but downplayed links to his father. The situation was somewhat similar to Robert Redford in The Candidate, only Brown was expected to win and did.

If Jerry Brown has a weakness, it is his sophistication. A handsome, shrewd politician he is; a handpumping, back-slapping man of the people he is not. And there are questions of how much he is a cult figure in the Hollywood tradition and how much substance he really has. However, to many he remains a figure of hope. Intellectual politicians are a rare breed, and those of Presidential stature seem to side with the Democrats (Wilson, FDR, Kennedy). Whether Jerry Brown will be the next President, no one cay say; even Jimmy the Greek isn't making book on it yet.

In the meantime, Jerry Brown continues to exude confidence and avoid conflict, and end up in consensus (every politician's dream). For example, despite his support of environmental causes, Gov. Brown was upset when Dow Chemical decided against building a half billion dollar plant near San Francisco. Dow complained that environmental hearings were delaying construction and raising bad feelings against the company. Immediately, Brown announced that California was not anti-business and personally tried to persuade Dow to stay. All in all, Brown emerged looking okay.

It is difficult to hang a label on Brown. Liberal? Yes, at times. Conservative? When it fits. In short, Jerry Brown strives to be a pragmatist – whatever works, especially with public opinion. In this sense, Brown shares a trait with fellow-Californian Richard Nixon, who floated with public opinion until the tide of Watergate swamped him. Even so, Brown is a much more original politician, and hence, more exciting.

If Jerry Brown aims for the White House in 1980 (should Carter falter badly), 1984, or beyond, America will want to take a closer look at him. But in past years, it has been painfully obvious that a President cannot count a lack of previous Washington experience as an asset.

The TM Program

Ideal Education and Invincibility

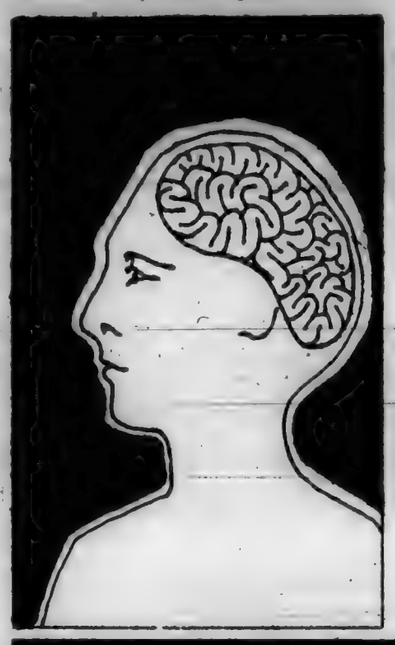
By Samuel Boothby

The Transcendental Meditation technique has become well known as a systematic method of unfolding the full potential of the individual. As such the TM program is not generally associated with great ideas; it is not a philosophy. But all great ideas are latent in the genius which is the full potential of every individual. A program which develops this full potential must therefore enliven its share of great ideas. And great ideas are the inspiration of great achievements.

The focus of the TM program in 1978 is "Invincibility for Every Nation," an aspiration which seems to take the program's focus off the individual and wide-angle it to the scope of the world. The focus of the TM program is still the education of individuals as to their full potential. But after twenty years of teaching, and close to two million people practicing the TM technique worldwide, the globe is beginning to feel the effects of coherence generated by TM meditators. The concept of "invincibility for every nation" captures the implications of this coherent effect.



Invincibility means freedom from fears which means freedom from weakness. Invincibility denotes strength, vitality, the ability to do anything, the accomplishment of all desires. On the level of the nation, it means fulfillment of all economic, political and cultural aspirations.

The idea of invincibility therefore demands an educational system capable of developing individuals whose thoughts spontaneously compute everything necessary to fulfill their goals. And more important, it must culture each individual to think in a way that produces action which is simultaneously in accordance with the thinker's interests and the interests of society. Such individuals would exhibit only clear, coherent thoughts and harmonious, balanced attitudes.

Whatever is the quality of the individual lives in a nation, that is the quality of the national life. If the education of a nation cultures individuals to think in such a way that spontaneously accomplishes their own desires and the needs of society at the same time, then harmony characterizes the life of the nation, both internally and externally. Harmony is the basis of friendship. When a nation creates only friends in its dealings with other nations, it knows no enemies. It is invincible.

The crucial point is developing that spontaneous ability of coherent thinking which harmonizes individual and collective interests. In other words, the education of genius.

The focus of the Science of Creative Intelligence is to introduce the knowledge of how to unfold genius into every level of education. The Science of Creative Intelligence takes the individual awareness or consciousness or intelligence (the three are equated) to a state from where it could create anything. In doing so, the Science of Creative Intelligence indicates the great potential of consciousness, which presently remains hidden to education. That great potential of consciousness, its hidden genius, resides at its most quiet level. It is there in the simplest form of awareness, the source of thought, where consciousness is awake in itself. Any slight impulse of thought at that level gets fulfilled quickly. That level is a field of all possibilities where the genius of the individual resides.

In order to understand that level of awareness we need only understand the ground state of nature as explained by the most advanced minds in modern physics. The ground state is a state of perfect orderliness from where all orderliness in nature emerges and spreads.

The TM program cultures the physiology to always promote this most orderly state in our awareness. Therefore, thoughts projected from this state have that aspect of genius, that ability to spontaneously see to both the individual and collective interests. Thoughts from this level are spontaneously in accordance with natural law so they meet no obstructions to fulfillment. They are, in other words, invincible.

The focus of the TM program in 1978 is "Invincibility for Every Nation," an aspiration which seems to take the program's focus off the individual and wide-angle it to the scope of the world.

Big Brother/ Big Sister

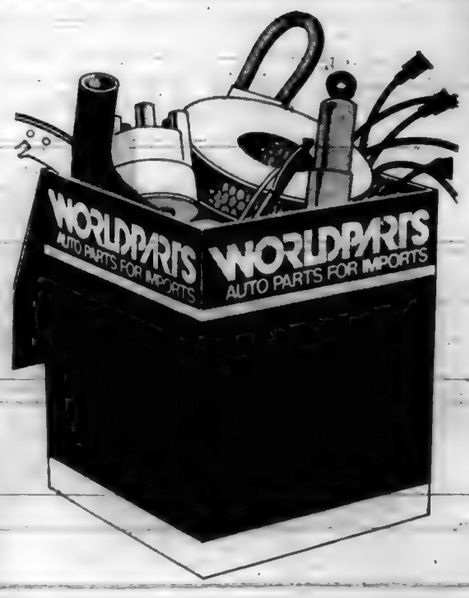
whatever one can give. As Ms. Perrault pointed out, "One has to be careful not to impose their values on the little brothers or sisters or to try and change them. It is important to be their friend, not another parent."



Along with a one on one friendship with your little brother or sister, there are a number of group activities that the program coordinators organize. Every year there is a Halloween party, Christmas party and spring picnic. At these parties there are games, prizes, and singing, allowing everyone to have a good time. From a haunted house to Santa Claus at Christmas, and a barbecue at the spring picnic everyone finds something to do. It not only brings the kids together to see their friends, it also gives them an opportunity to show off their big brother or big sister.

When matching up children and brothers-sisters, the kids are divided into three different categories, either high, medium or low priority. Those in the high priority bracket have the most immediate problems, either family or emotionally, and need extra attention as soon as possible. The student can pick the child he thinks is best for him. Then arrangements will be made for him to meet the child and the parents.

Currently there are 150 volunteers enrolled in the program with 76 of this placed this school year alone. Even with all these volunteers, there is still a desperate need for more, especially big brothers. In the files now there are 61 boys waiting to be placed, 16 girls, 5 handicapped and 3 boys who don't care whether they get a big brother or a big sister. Every day the program receives more requests and more volunteers are needed to fill these needs, especially for big brothers.

If you are interested or even curious about becoming a big brother or a big sister, then Rick and many other children would love to hear from you. You can either drop by the OVP office in the Mansfield House or give Candy and David a call at 656-2062.

In Support of VPIRG

One of the critical issues on the agenda for this weekend Board of Trustees meeting will be the evaluation of the present funding system for the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG).

Conceived in 1971 by a group of students inspired to action by a speech delivered by Ralph Nader, the nation's leading consumer advocate, VPIRG has since provided constructive education in the functioning of Vermont state government, environmental and health issues, and consumer advocacy.

Given an economy increasingly dominated by monopolistic corporate interests, few would contest the necessity for an effective channel or medium through which concerned citizens are able to become aware of their rights, and expect aid in pursuing the alleviation of legal problems and inconsistencies they feel confront Vermont. VPIRG is such a medium; and indeed they have a proud record in helping to make Vermont a better place to live. Included among their numerous accomplishments are the passage of a nuclear waste storage bill, "tooth fairy" bill, guaranteeing dental care for low and middle income children, and a bill prohibiting phosphates in household detergents. These are all laws beneficial not only to students but to all Vermonters.

Currently, 50% of the VPIRG operating budget is procured from the optional three dollar fee attached to every UVM student's tuition charges each semester. As it now stands, under what has become referred to as the "negative checkoff" plan, if a student wishes to waive payment he or she simply checks the appropriate box. However, if one fails to do so, one is automatically billed.

Several trustees, led by Senator Al Beauchamp and Jack Morgan, feel this is arbitrary and unfair. They are likely to propose a "positive checkoff" system, whereby a student would merely be informed of VPIRG and his option to support it if he so chooses. However, he would not be billed if he failed to make a decision. The Cynic Board, in complete accord with the Student Association (SA) wishes to express its adamant support for the present funding system. Evidence suggests, that given the heavy reliance on UVM funding, if the system were switched to positive checkoff support would diminish to the point of threatening VPIRG's continued existence. In our view, if this were allowed to occur, it would be a sad loss to both UVM and the state. We believe the system is fair, as it allows more than adequate opportunity to waive payment.

It is often suggested as an alternative that the SA allocate money for VPIRG. However, upon close examination one realizes that to do this would be in violation of the SA constitution as under it VPIRG would be necessarily restricted to student membership and activities only in the interest of the university. Clearly, this would hamper effective action on their part. Moreover, if funded by the SA, every student would be compelled to donate whether he wanted to or not.

Student support for VPIRG is well-documented and constant. When VPIRG was established in 1971, over 70% of the student body signed a petition in favor of it. A subsequent referendum in 1975 showed that 90% of the 24% who voted — a notably high turnout for a campus vote — favored the negative checkoff system. And, in a recent SA telephone survey — for which the final results are not yet available — early calculations indicate overwhelming support for VPIRG. Furthermore, so far this semester a clear majority of students have shown a willingness to pay the fee as it appears on their bill.

In light of these statistics, the Cynic believes that if for no other reason, the trustees should maintain the VPIRG "negative checkoff" status because it commands the advocacy of a majority of the student body. After all, it's our money. It should be clear that those who don't want to participate are not forced to. Also, it should be noted that, as part of the original resolution, if VPIRG support were to ever fall below 50% they would be removed from the bill.

In addition, it is noteworthy that many students are involved in VPIRG and are gaining valuable educational experience by being so. Among the activities being pursued are research, lobbying in Montpelier, and environmental education. The organization is entirely student governed with its own independend board of trustees. Unquestionably, for many students VPIRG constitutes a meaningful part of their overall education.

A Missed Critic

To the Editor:

I have been waiting with great anticipation for the column submitted by contributing columnist Dr. Harley Walter Kidder. At long last we have the opportunity to get some eye opening accounts from a man possessing a great deal of expertise in matters concerning the medical profession. I can only assume that the good Dr. has been temporarily curtailed due to interview trips in Michigan rather than any suppression on the part of your publication.

We were informed that Dr. Kidder's insights would be forthcoming, yet none have been printed in the last three issues. Unquestionably his claims and charges hit at the medical "establishment." I trust that some elitist group has not throttled and choked a very revealing series of investigative journalism. Rarely has your paper been graced with any finer display of the English language as it was intended to be portrayed. I trust that we can look forward to Dr. Kidder's fine efforts.

A Living Legend

To the Editor:

We read with interest Mark Kevorkian's article concerning Muhammed Ali in last week's Cynic. We would, however, like to comment on points brought out.

Leon Spinks won the world title two weeks ago by defeating the legendary Ali. As witnessed by millions it was a bruising fifteen round affair ending in an unforgettable final round slugfest.

At age thirty-six "The Greatest" made his customary walk to the ring to the tune of pomp and circumstance played by the Las Vegas Hilton. Here was the professor of boxing, maybe not the brash, lightning quick boxer of past, but a skilled, experienced professional — the champ. And last week in true defeat, Ali showed us the greatness of "The Greatest." "Ali knows how to lose more graciously than most sports heroes know how to win," wrote Time.

Boxing is unlike any other sport. There is no team to fall back on or next week's match to try again. Ali, no matter how young or old, would never enter the ring if he didn't have a chance, regardless of his opponent's ability or age. To retire "in favor of (Spinks) and all others with youth on their side," as Mr. Kevorkian suggests, would not be the mark of a true sportsman.

Granted, age is a factor in any person's ability, but youth alone does not make an athlete. Gordie Howe, the famous hockey player now in his mid-forties, is still one of the best.

sportsman. Let's face it, he put the heavyweight title on the line fifty-eight times. And now, when the champ is defeated, Mr. Kevorkian thinks he deserves no rematch as "another fight can only serve to erase Ali's accomplishments from our minds and the record books." Fortunately, for the man who has not only made boxing a skilled art, but more popular than anytime in history, nothing can erase the accomplishments that Ali has attained from any record book. As for our minds, those of us who know what true sportsmanship is will not forget Ali. Discounting the greatness of the greatest, for trying to win back the title he so graciously held is impudent, if not in bad taste. We are sorry Mark, but you can't take from a man, achievements he worked so hard for and it's ludicrous to think you can.

There is no shame in losing, especially for Muhammed Ali and whether or not he wins the Championship again at least we will have the chance to see a living legend one more time.

A Sick Tradition

To the Editor:

College men, yes sir. We're tough and proud and tough. Very tough.

Monday evening in Bailey. Hey, I've got a hell of an idea! Let's go out and grab a couple guys, tie em up real tight, so it hurts, ya know? Tie 'em on a ladder. Carry 'em around and pull down their pants for the girls. Get drunk, get down, have some real swingin' fun.

Shit. I hate to spoil a party or dampen a mood. I've little enough conscience of my own. Mass Psychology, it really works. Go crazy. Lots of us. We're a group, a group with power, a bunch of guys with organization. Let's get others to join. Only real men, though. Gotta make the grade. Tow the line. Swing. Hell, we'll separate the men from the boys, and make 'em know it.

We convince ourselves of glory. Remember our own initiation, Jesus but we were tough! They busted our ass for sure. Fond reminiscence.

We make sense of pain. Rationalize, ritualize, make it work. Gotta have desire, gotta need to be one of them. Hell, it's worth it! Ya need someone. We all do. Go with us.

It hurts though. Anguish. Loss of face, loss of dignity. Pain. Not a joke at all. It runs very dry and leaves traces, real bums. Stripped of pride and manhood and left. Left.

It's mass action, mob violence. And spectator complacency. We're frozen for sure, in ourselves, in our anonymity, in our coolness. It's a game. Boys will be boys, who are we to interfere, to take a stand, to give a shit. Shit.

Monday evening in Bailey. Two half naked guys tied up on a table. Shaking. Humiliated. They made it, though. Someday maybe even look back fondly on the comraderie of their younger days.

Monday evening in Bailey. A good time was had by all.

Sincerely,
Paul Costello

Pungent Hypocrisy and Blatant Blindness

To the Editor:

The Cynic has publicly donned their duncecap after another marvelous display of inconsistency. Two weeks ago, an extensive review of the efforts of the Student Association was presented in your pitiful publication caustically criticizing the performance of this year's Student Association. The major thrust of your criticism centered around the inability of the S.A. leadership to find issues and cohesively attack them for the benefit of the students. Admirable, witty.

This past week a rather mundane and stupid editorial was written citing the current (and never ending) financial woes facing the University. Your solution for protecting the integrity of the University listed three important issues: (1) Keep in-state tuition at a reasonable level, (2) Grant only merited faculty pay raises and (3) Make program cutbacks. One would be hard pressed to find fault with the first two issues, but the third, particularly in light of your paper two weeks ago, has me reeling from the pungent hypocrisy and blatant blindness! One week you release a call to aims for students to find sound and significant issues, and then when you have a very significant student issue calling for appropriate attention in the paper, you cop-out and buy the Administration's solutions. The issue is how much more will students pay for steadily decreasing educational opportunities at UVM? How can you claim to represent student opinion yet agree that fewer student services are acceptable and a worthwhile option for guaranteeing the integrity of this University?

It was just over two years ago when the University was discussing the same situation and the same stop-gap solutions were presented and accepted: Cut back programs, get back to the "essentials," put more students in the classroom, etc. In short, make students pay higher tuition for fewer opportunities.

The Board of Trustees has consistently ignored an attempt to establish long-range goals for

Erratum

Last week's Cynic quoted Rich Czaplinski of the Water Resources Dept. as saying that "to build another dam on the Winooski river would be dangerous and irresponsible without further study." Actually Mr. Czaplinski feels a worthwhile dam could be built as long as proper safeguards are accounted for during construction.

OPINION

Body Politics

By Dan Adams and Kenneth Waters

"...yeah, it was amazing, Joe," said Milton, "he stole the puck and blasted the upper left-hand corner – the greatest bingo I've ever seen!"

"Really?" said Joe. "By the way, are you making the trustee meeting tomorrow? I understand Coor is back from another statewide stomp to drum up funds for women lockers in order to meet Title IX requirements."

"Yessir! But we're going for the Big One this time around: tennis courts; more racketball and squash; another indoor pool; the works!"

"Aw... sheeeit," cried Joe, "not this again! We don't need all that stuff. As UVM trustees, you and I have got..."

Vermont that students should be exposed to. Vermont can't stay in the Middle Ages forever..."

"Don't 'aw Joe' me! I'm not suggesting cutting any sports; we should continue to expose students to tennis and the other foreign sports as we do today. But..."

"But god damnit Joe," swore Milton. "Do you realize how difficult it is for a student to develop an advanced game of tennis here? Why, there are no courts for winter use!"

"Hell, Milton, that's not one of The University's primary roles. It is important to expose them to games, and to provide a recreational outlet; but as far as students developing a sophisticated game of tennis,

"The closest thing to 'Vermont recreation' I've seen at the University is the shoveling of manure behind the school farm."

"What?" interrupted Milton. "Are you crazy? It's clear to everyone that there is a drastic shortage of athletic facilities! All the students are aware of it..."

"Everyone? Everyone knows The University is approaching a fiscal crisis; that's what everyone knows! What about the need to retain what is already here? There are graduate level courses in Political Science and Economics with over 50 students in each. Tell me how students and professors are supposed to have decent discussions in mobs of that size! And those are just two examples."

"Hold on Joe," said Milton assuredly. "Be reasonable. This is Vermont, and you're assuming UVM students have strong academic interests. The ironic thing is that this state, well known for its beauty and recreational opportunities, should have a university with so little to offer in terms of athletic facilities."

"Irony?" shouted Joe. "I'm the native Vermonter, Jim, and sure we have had a lot of recreation here all my life: ski touring, hiking, rock climbing, canoeing; but not paddle ball and indoor swimming. Why, the closest thing to 'Vermont recreation' I've seen at The University is the shoveling of manure behind the school farm."

"Aw Joe," said Milton, "I hate to burst your bubble, but there's new and exciting life outside let them join the Club down behind Gaynes!

"But we need..."

"Gal dang it, Milton," cried Joe, "Needs are relative. Give me half a day and I can come up with a decent argument showing that every student 'needs' a BMW. The point is, some needs are more important than others, and you know as well as I that Coor is talking about academic cuts. Soon, we could once again find ourselves having to justify the existence of the two-year Nursing program. Sure we need all this expansion, but not like we need to prevent any further deterioration of The University's academic community."

"Now Joe," said Milton, "you know I want to maintain the academic reputation of UVM as much as anyone; but let's be realistic. We're talking here about the politico-collegiate world, the 'selling of UVM,' if you like."

"Huh?"

"Fact one: the pool of potential college students which UVM and other universities draw from will decrease immensely over the next decade. UVM must compete against schools with a 1000:1 student-to-pool ratio, and quality indoor miniature golf. It's already getting tough to explain to Junior's Mom and Dad why there isn't year-round tennis. Dick told me that this year's applicants from Exeter really grilled him about the questionable athletic facilities. We've got to expand if we expect to hold our own."

"Oh," said Joe. "I never thought of it that way."

"Fact two," continued Milton, "UVM needs to find alternative sources of income. Alumni certainly aren't interested in donating to a UVM that can't even put up an adequate recreational facility."

"Yeah, but do we have to accept their definition of adequate?"

"Of course we do – they're the ones with the big bucks, right? And we better get prepared to woo them. You know if we don't get this gym expansion now, we never will."

"You know," said Joe, "I think you're right. Now I realize why The University needs recreational expansion – now more than ever."

"Good Bill. I know you'll get along just fine. How about joining Ted, John, and myself for nine holes this afternoon?"

"Gee, thanks," said Joe, "but I've got to get home and spread some manure before..."

The Dilemma Of Absolutes

ByEric Pollard

There is, in our society, a tremendous amount of consternation over any form of absolute established outside the framework of society as we know it. The individual desire for personal freedom has become so prevalent as to be accepted by society as a whole as a normative response to the problems that confront us, those generally being the programatic development of homogenous subcultures and of common wills. In the area of human government this phenomenon is most evident; the common will of one half plus one of the eligible voters is theoretically all that is necessary to determine the length and breadth of public action. The thirst for civil liberties has developed alongside a desire for a government that will solve all the problems that interfere with each individual in his quest for personal freedom. The result of this development is the growth of an electorate that is in agreement over the issues that effects it by individual member rather than by the group as a whole. The absolutes upon which decisions are made are individual absolutes and as such are not absolutes at all. "If there is no absolute by which society can be judged, then society is absolute."

The impact of such a statement on government is indeed an interesting one. When the electorate decides what it would have done by casting a simple majority of its ballots for a particular course of action, from what quarter will the electorate draw its view of right and wrong? It has been suggested that the President of the United States is the source of such opinion. This is not true in every case, but can be expanded to include the entire governmental structure in the role of the thinking element for the American people. The point here is that when a societal structure does not have its own fundamental set of absolutes, it must depend on a person or group of people to provide the bases for each decision that is to be made. There will inevitably develop an elite that will lead and direct the populus in the decision-making process. An excellent example of this idea is the Supreme Court's decision on abortion. This decision gave the limited right to terminate a pregnancy, thus robbing the fetus of its potential life. It represented a trend away from an absolute law and toward a variable law which could be adapted for changes in acceptable social behavior. This shift allows the Court to set certain moral values which, until recently, have come from the society itself.

Perhaps the next question to be asked is where does one look for the absolutes that guided the early growth of this country and how does it compare to the variable absolutes that are becoming more prevalent as time progresses? The answer to the first question is to be found the tradition and heritage of this country, in the absolutes which guided the founding Fathers in the drafting of the Constitution. The one thing that characterized the fundamental beginnings of our country is the faith in God through the Bible that brought many of the original settlers to this land. The Bible provided an adequate absolute on which society could be based because it explained the creation of the universe and established a definite purpose for which man is to strive. It allowed for the humanness of mankind in such a way as to make individuality and individual freedom possible by setting a foundation from which growth could take place. When the biblical absolutes are rejected, the depth of security which they provide are lost. There is no compensation for humanity or explanation for the origins of the universe in what seems destined to replace them.

The variable absolutes which our society is adopting are paradoxical in that while they are what seems to be creation of an atmosphere of freedom, they breed a system which is anything but free. Fromm would have us believe that man experiences the most freedom when he in fact has none. That is the sort of situation that is developing today. The western world has the choice of two options; it can either allow itself to become subject to the power of the elite, or it can return to the biblical absolutes it started out with. The variable social absolutes would lead to an eventual forceful repression of all rights, for in a system of changing values and dynamic absolutes, a breakdown of all values and absolutes will occur. The other alternative requires a great deal more work to achieve. There must not only be a recognition of the biblical absolutes, but also a commitment to act in accordance to those absolutes. Some must understand the purpose of the laws and commandments before there can be any hope of rebuilding the biblical bases of society. And those who understand must necessarily act to acquaint the majority with the essence of absolutes and the message they were designed to proclaim.

the University that would alleviate the financial pressures it faces. Look at the developments within the University for the past fifteen years and this becomes obvious. New athletic and library facilities were completed in the mid-sixties and soon afterward the student population doubles and these facilities aren't modified in any way. Stupid doesn't describe that move adequately.

But the Board of Trustees, like the entire University, is laden with people overly concerned with administration instead of action. There are other sources of income besides the state and the students, it just remains to be seen when enough bean-head administrators will gather the gumption to make a commitment to finding some people with some interest in developing the University and not just watching it operate. So now, will the Cynic, which has consistently placed itself beyond criticism and above the student body please make a realistic reassessment of the current situation? Don't buy that administration B.S. Cutting back programs will save money, but won't do a damn thing to the value of education at UVM. What UVM needs to do is cut off its fat. I am continuously overwhelmed by the fat-cats running this place. People are put in administrative positions who have no interest in developing the University over the long run. The Athletic Department is stagnant. Teams lose consistently, the quality of programs deteriorate, but the same people run the show. I've had experience with more than one department head that, when confronted with my complaints about the classrooms population and program limitations, claim that this is directly a result of over-crowded classrooms and budget cutbacks. But are they actively involved with trying to improve this situation? No, they just sit there and take it.

I don't think the current problems facing UVM can be solved by cutting back programs and I can't express the disdain I feel for the student paper supporting such a move. This University has lost its vitality, and the only way that this can be changed significantly is by making people accountable for their jobs, and eliminating the toads. Let's get on the bandwagon and make the people who run this place work for the students. A student who is also a resident of this state will continue to get a bargain for quite sometime, but for all those who come to UVM from out-of-state, the time is long gone when you were getting what you paid for.

UVM could be a great place. But UVM must look within its structure to eliminate those people with marginal interests in its development and replace the fat with energetic people a la Jennifer Cover who are willing to make a serious commitment to furthering their profession and expanding student horizons.

Sincerely,

that a "company has absolutely nothing to gain in infringing on anyone's rights or freedoms." He suggested that I consult UVM's financial report for the fiscal year that ended on June 30, 1977 for a more complete picture of UVM's investments. Using previously obtained information from the New York Times, Business Week, The Guardian, America, and the American Friends Service Committee, I found an additional twelve corporations (CPC International, First National Bank of Boston, GM, Allied Chemical, Champion Spark Plug, Kennecott Cooper, Mobil, Olin, Monsanto, Phelps Dodge, Phillips Petroleum, and Union Carbide) with branches or subsidiaries in South Africa. Of these seventeen companies, UVM has a total market value investment of $2,559,000 which earned 113,000 in dividends for the fiscal year 1976-77. To some extent, the discrepancy between Mr. Paterson's data and the author's is reconcilable. For one, any investor is primarily concerned with getting the most return on their money, and other considerations are generally not of major importance. Secondly and perhaps most crucial, it is not always in the interests of the company to inform its shareholders or the public at large of its dealings with less than democratic governments. In addition, Mr. Paterson has used different sources of information than were available to the author.

Arguments against divestiture may proceed along several themes. Since American companies employ 70,000 South Africans, it might be debated that an exit from South Africa would result in increased unemployment, leaving black people worse off than they are at present. However, when a company leaves an area, it typically sells its local mechanism of production to another firm or business interest, which continues to employ people.

Current employment practices also greatly discriminate against native Africans. For example, the Ford Motor Company, with $170 million in assets and 5,000 workers, is one of the largest employers in South Africa. The previously mentioned Senate Subcommittee found that although Ford was the largest employer of the 350 U.S. firms in South Africa, its wages paid to black employees were among the lowest twenty-five companies. The subcommittee also stated that Ford's salaries to black workers "may cover only those expenses necessary for basic survival." "Basic survival," as the subcommittee defines it, does not include rent or transportation to work.

When one considers the down-home realities of apartheid in South Africa, arguments for or against divestiture frequently take on an emotional nature. Although Caucasians number less than twenty percent of the population, they control seventy percent of the purchasing power. The average annual per capita income in 1974 was $2373 for whites and $117.60 for blacks. White unemployment is .2 percent. Black jobless rates are around twenty percent, and black labor unions are illegal. A survey conducted in 1975 found that of a total black population of eighteen million there were eleven engineers, thirty-two chemists, sixty-three lawyers, eighty-three university professors, and eighty-five doctors. When confronted with these statistics, it becomes difficult to deny the effectiveness of apartheid in racial oppression, and whether we should indirectly support it becomes less of an academic question.

Even if UVM's entire sixteen million dollar stock portfolio were invested directly in only the South African interests of U.S. corporations, our stake would be less than one-tenth of one percent of the total American investment there. Realistically, UVM's divestiture alone would have little or no practical effect on corporate policy in South Africa, but that is not the point. In the past, the actions of companies have proven to be important and often instrumental in transforming governments, and unified investor action has shown itself equally capable of altering corporate strategy. Therefore, it is the hope of the author that UVM, the four thousand American colleges and universities, churches, and other groups that ought to know better will take the lead in urging U.S. firms to leave South Africa. Undoubtedly, the threat of unilateral divestiture would do much toward bringing U.S. industry to its senses.

The Ski Rack...for all seasons

The Ski Rack means Bike Rack when the snow melts.

As the snow starts to melt with the onset of warmer weather the Ski Rack metamorphs into the Bike Rack. While our Winter Sale continues we start to shed our Winter Clothing and cross-country ski equipment to uncover our line of Raleigh, Vista and Windsor bicycles. Just as the Ski Rack provides you with a complete line of accessories, parts and service to accommodate all of your cross-country ski needs, our bicycle business provides you with the same complete service. Our bicycle mechanics can service and repair all makes of bikes. Our bicycle parts and accessories department can outfit you from spokes to saddlebags. We offer bicycle mechanics classes so you can learn how your bike works and what you should do to maintain its proper condition. Our sales staff will spend all the time necessary to educate you on what bicycle choice to make. We then fully acquaint you with that bike and assemble and adjust it to fit you. After you've logged a hundred or so miles on your bike, we'll give it a free checkup.

Now you know why...

Midtvedt and Light Boost Vermont to Eastern Title

By Rich Chalmers

The University of Vermont men's ski team captured its sixteenth straight carnival victory and its third straight Eastern championship as it defeated second-place Dartmouth in the Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Championships held at Middlebury College last weekend. UVM finished on top with 380 points followed by Dartmouth with 356 and Middlebury with 341.

"We're very happy with the win," commented Coach Chip Lacasse. "The key is that we didn't get too excited and we were able to overcome our illness problems. Sicknesses have plagued us all year, but we managed to come away with the title."

Three of the four cross-country racers were recovering from illness at the time of last week's race. Mark Quinlan was recovering from a four week illness while Mark Wagner was out for two weeks and Karsten Midtvedt spent Friday in bed with the flu.

Nevertheless, Midtvedt captured the cross-country crown as he took the event with an impressive time of 47:1.14. Quinlan, feeling the effects of being laid off, came in eleventh and Wagner placed twelfth. Their efforts combined to give the event to UVM 91-90 over Middlebury in cross-country. The Panthers' strength lay in third place Jim Goodwin and eighth place Jim Renkent. The Big Green finished strongly with 88 points with racers in the fifth and sixth positions.

Kare Herje excelled for the Cats in the jumping event, leading Vermont to a 97-95 win over second place Dartmouth. Roger Holden finished fourth while Dennis Lambert placed ninth. "The competition for this event was stronger than it has been in the past," Herje said after the jumping. He completed jumps of 61 and 61.5 meters in his first win after capturing the UVM carnival's jumping event earlier this season. Dartmouth, again edged out by less than three points, put jumpers in the second, sixth, and eighth places. Middlebury trailed in third with 79 points. "I'm surprised Holden only got fourth place," Herje added. "He'll be a crucial factor in the upcoming NCAA championships this week."

UVM opened the carnival with a 95-84 victory over Williams in the slalom event as Scott Light placed second with a combined time of 1:28.7. Doug Bruce followed in fourth for the Cats in a careful effort not to fall. Middlebury's John Jacobs combined two excellent scores to take the event. UVM's Jeff Darrow played a crucial role in the Vermont victory by placing tenth, ahead of two Middlebury skiers and Dartmouth's third-place finisher.

Light, after finishing seventh in the National Alpine Championships held at Lake Placid, N.Y. on last Thursday, continued his skiing excellence with a win in the Giant Slalom. Vermont once again took this event 97-92 over Middlebury. This is the second straight year UVM has swept the Middlebury carnival with wins in every event. Light won the Combined Alpine Title for the fifth straight time this season and has third or

Women Skiers Place Third

By Rich Chalmers

Once again the Middlebury women's ski team was able to storm past a field of contenders to seize the Middlebury Carnival last weekend. Although at the end of the first day of competition, Middlebury trailed Williams by thirty points, a strong Panther showing gave them the lead and the victory by the end of the carnival.

Dartmouth finished in second place with a total of 332.09 points, a considerable margin below the Panthers' 364.33. The University of Vermont placed third with 297.71 and Williams ended in fourth with 255.66.

UVM opened strongly as Gail LeBaron led the slalom event after the first round. She fell on her second run, however, leaving the event open to Dartmouth's Debbie Tarinelli who edged out Sara McNealus of Middlebury for first. Vermont placed eighth in the event, the weakest showing UVM has put forth in the slalom this season. Williams won the event with 93 points, 16 above second place New Hampshire.

The Cats took second in the 4x3.5 relay with a time of 51.5. "We have a strong four-woman relay. We came close to beating Middlebury in the second leg of the relay, but we couldn't quite do it."

LeBaron recorded a combined score of 2:02.94 in the Giant Slalom to seize tenth place and pace Vermont to a third place finish in the event. Dartmouth skiers Tarinelli, Martha Kendall and Cathy Lewis provided the punch for the Big Green, capturing first, second, and third respectively. Liz Wormer placed twelfth and Muffie Arndt finished sixteenth for the Cats.

"The cross-country team had a very strong showing," Coach Bland added. "Susan Shay did extremely well, backed by Nancy Dickson and Janet Reynolds." Shay completed the event in seventh with a time of 28:19.87 while Dickson finished ninth and Reynolds crossed the line twelfth. The Cats ended the event with 86 points, just under Middlebury's winning score of 105.

The Cats are now looking forward to their next competition in Maine, but specifically toward the National Championships to be held in New Mexico in two weeks. "I have a feeling we'll do quite well." Janet Reynolds prophesized. "We'll give them a good run for their money, but there's going to be a lot of tough competition."

Coach Bland characterized

Basketball Report

LaSalle Crushes Vermont

By Steven Larose

LaSalle's Explorers shifted their famous fast break basketball machine into high gear midway through the first half, and left a stalled University of Vermont basketball team standing in their dust, as the Cats suffered a 100-67 drubbing at an almost empty Patrick Gym Saturday.

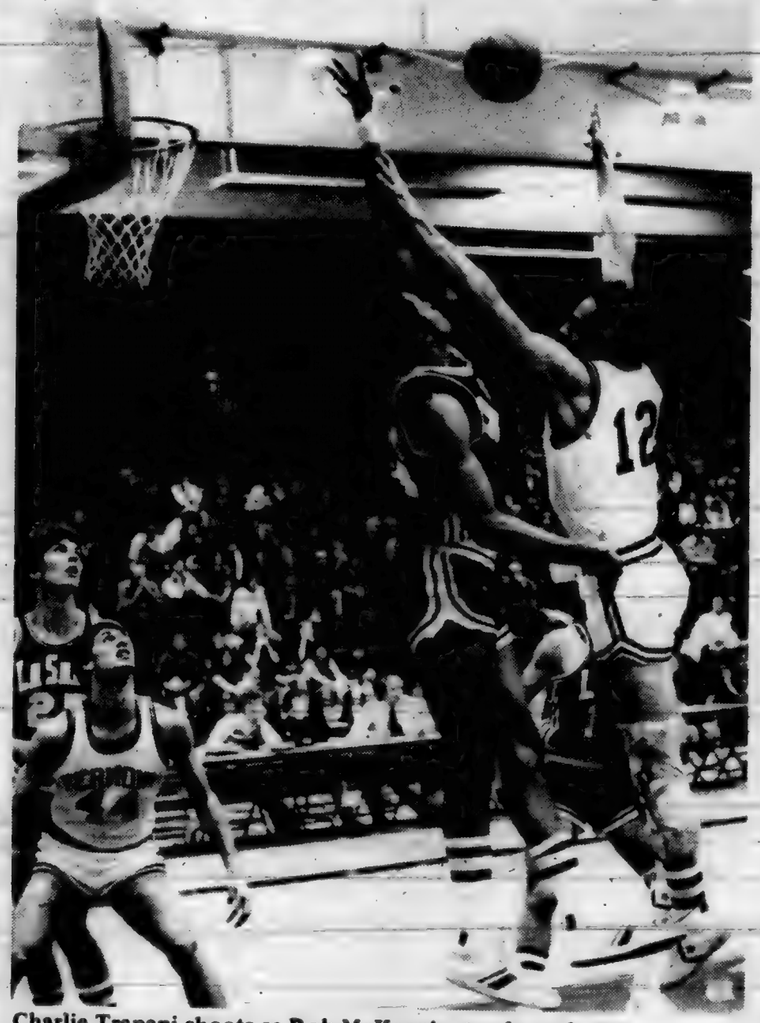
Vermont took a hard lesson in the facts of power basketball, as LaSalle broke out of Vermont's grasp to rack up the biggest margin of defeat UVM has seen this season. LaSalle's highly touted Mike Brooks led the charge with an endless stream of slam dunks, stop and pops, and rebound muscle.

In the beginning, Vermont worked effectively against LaSalle's 2-2-1 zone press, charging ahead 11-8 with six minutes elapsed. Mike Kern and Jim Nocera provided the early scoring, as Vermont appeared to be on the road to another upset of the Ohio State genre.

But as in countless games this season, Vermont seemed to self-destruct on the court, while LaSalle's zone turned a profit and Brooks began to score. LaSalle followed by pounding the offensive boards, stuffing the ball through when their fast break missed. Brooks single-handedly shot the Explorers ahead 22-16, and LaSalle Coach Paul Westhead put in his second string.

Greg Davis, lauded by Coach Peter Salzberg as one of the few Vermont bright spots, used his speed and ball handling to fire up the sluggish Cats as they rallied back to trail only 34-28 with three minutes to go. The Vermont surge was short-lived however, as Brooks and Co. reentered and held Vermont scoreless until the intermission, with the Cats being buried 43-28.

LaSalle had a field-day during the second half, when Vermont shot a miserable 31% from the floor. The Cats' poor shot selection and lack of offensive patience showed up in the final totals, as the Cats only hit 27 out of a record 87 field goal attempts. Meanwhile, LaSalle was beating the Vermont defense into the ground with more fast break pressure. Midway through the half, Coach Salzberg turned to his bench, as the Cats had slid too far behind to even hope for a comeback.



Even though the outcome was disappointing, Salzberg did get a look at his younger players in action. Tyrone Johnson stood out, with 11 rebounds and a six point contribution. The Vermont freshmen squad of Bruce Beynnon, Rob McKenzie and Dave Miller got their first crack at a top flight Division One team, and even managed to pull Vermont within 27 points late in the game. But LaSalle sunk the last six points to break 100, and leave Vermont hoping for better days.

Mike Kern was Vermont's silver lined cloud, racking up 23 points and 13 rebounds. Jim Nocera continued to tune up for next year, with ten points, all from the field. Charlie Trapani played his last game at the Patrick Gym, along with Mark Sobolewski and Kevin Kelly. Trapani totaled eight points before fouling out, and Sobolewski tipped in four. Tom Perrin continued to impress, with a solid court game and four points to boot. Tyrone Johnson added six, while Dane Correll and Dave Miller both popped in two. Greg Davis and Bruce Beynnon rounded out the scoring with four points apiece.

Salzberg later remarked "We knew exactly how LaSalle was going to play and that the key for us was to try to be patient and try to control the offensive pace of the game. Their zone press can be attacked and beaten if you are aggressive, but you always run the risk of going out of control, which we did sometime in the first half."

Salzberg also mentioned that once Vermont broke down and started to play LaSalle's type of game, it was too late to rally back. "Our primary problem was trying to play against a zone. If it had been man to man, the outcome might have been different. But when we break down and lose control of the tempo, it's 'see you later time' for the other team." Salzberg praised both Davis and Johnson for being aggressive against LaSalle's intimidating fast break.

The loss dropped Vermont to 10-14 on the season. Vermont played Boston University on Tuesday, Feb. 28th and meets St. Michaels in a make-up match March 4th at the Ross Sports Center in Winooski.

UVM Escapes Middlebury's Grasp

By Steven Larose

Tom Perrin and Dane Correll sank crucial free throws in the closing minutes to propel The University of Vermont Catamounts out of the clutches of the Middlebury Panthers 70-66 at the Patrick Gym Wednesday night.

Vermont led by nine points at the half and was up by as much as 13 points with 6:30 remaining in the contest. But the Panthers then mounted a furious comeback attempt and only the solid shooting of Correll and Perrin kept Vermont afloat.

The first half was a nip and tuck battle, with the score being tied four times until Vermont opened a 29-22 advantage on the outside shooting of Correll, Mark Sobolewski and Perrin. But Middlebury ran off the next five points to cut the Cat lead to 29-27. Sobolewski then hit two jumpers and Charlie Trapani added a three point play to put the Cats up 36-27 at the intermission.

Vermont's lead ballooned to 14 points on Jim Nocera and Correll's back to back buckets, along with Kevin Kelly's free throw. At this point Coach Peter Salzberg then switched to his bench, and Middlebury took advantage of the lapse to rally back and cut Vermont's lead down to 58-53 with five minutes to play. The Panthers and the Cats scratched and clawed at each other for the next four minutes, with Middlebury keeping in touch, 67-63.

Perrin sank both ends of a one and one with 24 seconds to play to boost the Cat lead to six points. Correll later keyed on the front end of his charity stripe opportunity to make it 70-64, before Middlebury scored on a lay-up at the buzzer for the final four point margin.

Dane Correll broke out of a month-long shooting slump with a 17 point performance. Sobolewski and Nocera each tipped in ten, all from the field. Mike Kern dropped in nine, while both Kelly and Tyrone Johnson pitched in six points. Perrin added four as Bruce Beynnon rounded out the scoring with 5 points. The win boosted Vermont to 10-13, as the Cats continue their conquest for a .500 season.

New Hampshire Wildcats Stifle Vermont Icers 4-2

By Amanda Miller

Craig Homola scored just 21 seconds into the third period, but the University of New Hampshire recovered to pump in three consecutive goals and blitz the University of Vermont hockey team, 4-2, at Durham, N.H. Thursday evening.

New Hampshire protected a meager 1-0 lead until the early third period, when Homola poked a rebound past UNH's sensation goalie Mark Evans to tie the game at 1-1. The goal was set up by Bill Reber's mad-man dash down the left wing.

Suddenly the lights went out when UNH scored three times over the next ten minutes, as Vermont goalie Sylvain Turcotte went through a defensive lapse, allowing a rebound, a drive and a 40 foot shot to all pass his guard.

Vermont added one more goal, when Homola again scored on a power play at 16:45. As the clock ran down, Vermont blasted away at Evans' brick wall, and got through, only to have the goal recalled. Up until the third period, Vermont and UNH were deadlocked in a defensive duel, with the Cats playing calm postional hockey, turning UNH's big threats back at the blue line. However, UVM was never able to get out of their zone, and couldn't seem to find the time to apply any offensive pressure of their own. The Cats did manage quick one player thrusts, but Evans was unflappable in the nets.

Ben Lord and Bill Reber made several short-handed bids, but they were also turned back by the Wildcats' defense. Randy Koch had to drop back to defense when the Cats lost the services of Mark Brown, further nullifying the offensive effectiveness of UVM's front line.

The loss was another setback in Vermont's quest for a .500 season, as the Cats overall record dropped to 14-15. It was another in a series of disappointing losses for UVM, which has racked up a 7-2 road record and a shocking 1-8 Division One record at Gutterson. In searching for an explanation why the Cats can't seem to win at home, several coaches have commented that they can keep the players penned up in a motel on road trips, thus cutting down on partying that normally might occur the night before a game at UVM. Whatever the reason, the Cats have had some disappointing losses this year, at home and away, due to their inability to put the puck in the net, as Coach Cross has noted. Vermont winds up the season with a game against top ranked Boston University on March 4th at 2 p.m.

UVM Swimmers Tune Up For New England Championships

The University of Vermont's swim team wrapped up its dual meet season with an exhibition meet against Norwich Tuesday. The exhibition meet served as a tune-up for the New England Championships this weekend.

Vermont swimmers took this opportunity to swim the events that they compete in the championships. Steven Levy and Mark Kinne swam the 400 yard IM in a dead heat with Levy having a slight lead at the finish. Both swimmers looked exceptionally strong and should fair well next week.

The highlight of the meet was supplied by Freshman Andy Daniels in the 200 yard breaststroke. After a sluggish season Daniels was able to snap his personal slump by breaking the freshman record in a time of 2:26.1. The former record of 2:27.9 was the oldest record on the record board, dating back to 1966. Asked why the improved performance, Daniels said "racing with an old teammate like Levy, I guess it got me really up for it. He definitely pushed me." Both Levy and Daniels attended the same high school in Hewlett, New York and swam together on the high school team.

Other promising performances included Mark Haun, who swam two events that he hadn't swum all year, the 1000 free and the 200 yard back, looked very strong and should be ready for a great championship. Dave Platow, coming off a bad flu, looked as though he will be at 100% for the New Englands. The rest of the team also looked equally strong and is looking forward to a weekend of tough competition, with over twenty other New England schools competing.

The only question mark for the Aquacats going into the championship is the health of Ron Kirkwood. Kirkwood, a senior, has supplied many thrills over the past four years and this year was no exception. The Cats will need Kirkwood's explosiveness and are all hoping that he will be able to return from a bad case of the flu.

Coach Les Leggett and Assistant coach Joe Fisher agree that the Cats will be in great shape for the New Englands and may surprise a lot of people.

Women's B-B Tops Keene

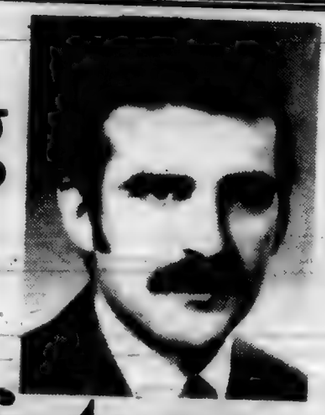
Margaret Considine and Gail McWilliam combined for a total of 55 points and 40 rebounds as they led the University of Vermont Women's Basketball team to a 70-60 win over Keene State at the Patrick Gymnasium last Saturday.

Considine had an excellent day, recording 31 points and snagging 25 rebounds. Not to be out-shown, teammate McWilliam connected for 24 points and 15 rebounds.

The score was even fifteen times in the contest and UVM was unable to take a secure lead until the final closing moments. A new defensive set-up and an 18 for 28 performance from the free throw line combined to give the Cats the upper hand.

Vermont then traveled to New York only to be soundly defeated by a tough Queens College squad 91-41 Monday night. Queens took command in the contest as they led 43-25 at the half. Despite a strong effort by Gail McWilliam with fifteen points, the Cats were unable to overcome the deficit.



The team will host the EAIAW Region D Satellite Championships this weekend. Competition Friday night will consist of two games – UVM versus St. Johns University (second in the nation) and Syracuse versus Cortland State. Saturday, number one ranked Queens College with a record of 20-1 will play Central Connecticut College (11-5) as well as BU (12-5) against Brooklyn College (10-11). Both these games will be at Queens College in New York. The UVM women are optimistic for success.

Vermont Women Tracksters Head to Easterns

By Marie Dowling

In a practice meet preparing for the Eastern Championship at Tufts on March 10, 11, the University of Vermont women's track team unofficially took second place, behind the University of Massachusetts, Friday night at Amherst Cage, in Amherst, Mass.

The Catamounts captured three firsts as Lori Dane won the 45 yard low hurdles (6.9 seconds) and Kaja Thornton hurled the shot 37'9½" for a first in that event. Janet Lynch and Janet Terp both cleared five feet in the high jump. Lynch won, with less previous misses than Terp, who took second. Lynch also took a second in the Long Jump and a fourth in the shot put. Terp placed third in the Long Jump.

Barb Luneau took a second in the shot put, with a heave of 34'7¾", She also took first in her heat of the 45 yard dash trials with a time of 6.1 seconds. She did not place in the semi-finals, but a 6.1 would have given her a second place in the finals. Judi St. Hilaire and Amy Bouchard both took second in the 880 yard run and mile respectively. The UVM mile relay team of Marie Dowling, Carolyn Marinelli, Dane, and St. Kilaire took a third place. The same team will compete at the Easterns in Boston on March 10 and 11.

Cats Face BU To Wind Up the Season

By Jim Fletcher

The Cats were mathematically eliminated last Friday as Providence beat Dartmouth 4-1. Elimination from ninth place came on Saturday as RPI beat UNH 6-5 in overtime. Before Tuesday's action, the Cats had a decent chance of catching the loser of Tuesday's Harvard-Dartmouth game for a tie for 11th place where the Cats have finished the last two years.

The playoff race was all but mathematically finalized on Monday after Providence beat Northeastern. RPI needed one win in its last three (Colgate, NE and Princeton) to clinch a spot. Assuming RPI gets that win, Harvard would be the only team left with a chance. For the Cantabs to make it, they would have to win their last three (Dartmouth Tues., BU last night, Yale Sat.) and hope that one of UNH, BC and Providence loses all of its games. The Crimson went 2-5 in February while RPI was 6-1 and Providence 4-1-1.

The wild race is for the last home ice spot. BC, Brown and RPI had the best chances before Tuesday's game, while UNH could get it if they beat Brown and BC. BC plays UNH Sunday, and it could come down to the winner of that game getting home ice for a BC–UNH playoff game.

Looking ahead to the big action on Tuesday, there are a few things worth noting. Providence is the only team to visit Cornell and return without losing (5-5 tie). RPI meanwhile hasn't won at Cornell in over ten years. RPI took two out of three against Clarkson during the regular season, and barely lost to BC and BU. Four of Brown's last five quarterfinal games have gone into overtime.

Saturday afternoon, the Cats close out the season by visiting BU. Just when it seemed that BU was winning without luck, the Terriers went back to their old tricks Saturday at last place Colgate. Colgate led 5-4 late in the game but BU tied it with 11 seconds left and won it in o.t..

Another thing the Cats have going for them is that the game is the ECAC TV game of the week. BU doesn't play well in these games. BU won all of their overtime games in the past two seasons except one, a 6-6 tie with BC on TV. They lost their other TV game last season on the last day to Providence 6-4. In TV games this season, BU beat BC 6-3 as Skidmore tired in the third period, beat Providence in a very boring game, and lost to Yale 7-5.

The BU upset convinced all of the holdouts that Yale is no longer the pushover of past years. Second year coach Tim Taylor has done a tremendous job and is my choice for the Coach of the Year award. The Elis have won almost twice as many games so far this season as they have in the past three seasons combined. The Elis, whose schedule consists entirely of Division 1 games, have compiled a 9-4-1 home record including wins over Cornell, BU, BC, Harv., Pro. and Dart. The four losses were 5-0 to Brown and 4-3 to UVM, SLU and Clarkson. Yale, which could finish as high as second in the Ivy League, is probably mathematically eliminated from the playoffs by now, but is a definite contender for next season, losing only four seniors. A better offense (Yale was shutout three times this season) and a better road record (1-8 this season with one game left) could put the Elis in the playoffs for the first time since 1967.

The shocking off-ice news of last week came from Philadelphia where it was announced that Penn will drop hockey after this season. It is really unfortunate. Penn's future looked bright with only three seniors on this year's team. The Class of '23 Rink is one of the finest facilities in Division 1. UVM won the first game played there.

There are a lot of talented players on the Quaker team who will be able to transfer and play next year. It will be interesting to see where some of them go. A lot of teams could use a better goalie and freshman Bob Sutton is a good one.

The effect on scheduling could be disastrous. Some Ivy League teams might not replace the Quakers on their schedules resulting in a lot fewer games. Penn however was one reason

UVM Women Icers Slash Middlebury Panthers

By Melisse Brown

Fast skating, aggressive play and effective forechecking allowed the University of Vermont women's Ice Hockey team to post a decisive 6-2 win over the Middlebury Panthers last Wednesday. Vermont dominated the game as they outshot Middlebury 44-19 overall.

A defensive lapse early in the first period allowed Middlebury to take a quick 2-0 lead. The lead was shortlived for the Panthers, though, as UVM retaliated several minutes later with a pair of quick goals from Paula Priestley and Lynn Rupe. Priestley's goal came off a pass from Cathy Sagaser while Rupe's goal was assisted by Wendy Pirtle. After that, UVM never trailed.

In the second period, Priestley got her second goal as she backhanded the puck by the goalie following a scramble directly in front of the net. Sagaser again assisted on the play. Later in the period Sagaser helped set up a beautiful goal by Doris Bonner. Sagaser skated in with the puck and passed it over to Bonner who skated in alone on the goalie and lifted it high and into the far right side of the net to put UVM out front 4-2.

The third period was characterized by continual puck control by UVM as they outshot the Panthers 18-7. Each of the four lines skated very effectively. It was the fourth line which notched the fifth goal for the Catamounts. Right wing Tori Ryder drove in a shot to the near right side of the goalie for her first goal of the season. In the closing minutes of the game defense Casey Nolan skated in and had her initial shot blocked by the goalie but tallied on center Lynn Rupe's rebound to give UVM its sixth goal of the game.

The UVM coaches commented that the Catamounts totally dominated the game which they had failed to do in an earlier 4-3 loss to the Panthers at Middlebury. Each of the defensive tandems, Nolan and Margot Huber, Pamela Cheeseman and Joy Vernneau, and Bonnie Barnhart and Amy Tutwiler, did an outstanding job of thwarting Middlebury's offensive efforts. UVM goalie Ann Bartlett made seventeen saves.

UVM is now 6-7-2 and looks to the Dartmouth Tournament to put itself over the .500 mark. The Cats will face Middlebury in the opening round Friday, March 3.

Vermont Gymnasts Edge MIT

By John Light

The men's gymnastic team closed out its dual-meet season with a narrow victory over MIT at the Boston Institute by a score of 149.4 to 147.6 on Saturday, February 25.

The contest was deadlocked until the final event, the horizontal bars, when MIT's Petek tallied 5.5 to Hans Nilsson's first place 7.3. Nilsson remained undefeated in all-around and scored a first on parallel bars while captain Mark Ricard scored first on pommel horse, and third on parallels and horizontal bars to place second in all-around. Nilsson also took seconds on pommel horse and rings, tying teammate John McDonald for second in vaulting. McDonald also took second on pommel horse.

The victory was especially sweet since the Cats were competing minus the services of co-captain Bill Ahearn which meant an open all-around slot on the score sheet. Nilsson, Ricard and McDonald had to be near flawless to make up for this slack but did receive some backing from specialists Duncan Edwards, Dan Stargatt and Rex Norton.

SPORTS PROFILE

Dane Correll – A Cat Cager With Flair

By Randy Briggs

It's been a long and difficult freshman year for Dane Correll. After coming out of a high school program in which he seldom lost, Dane has had a rude awakening in a struggling Vermont basketball program.

The 6'1" freshman out of Philadelphia's West Catholic High played on varsity teams that posted an incredible seventy-five wins and only seven losses. In the two years that Correll teamed with LaSalle sophomore sensation Michael Brooks, West Catholic won two Catholic League Championships in Philadelphia. As one would expect Corfell had a big hand in most of those victories, averaging about 17.0 points a game in his varsity career.

When questioned about the future of Vermont basketball Correll quickly spoke with much enthusiasm and confidence. "I feel that we can become a winner. The future here is really bright. I realize that there are six freshmen on the team this year, but we have all matured fast. All of the freshmen are quick ball players. You will see a different Vermont team next year. We are going to get some big men who can really move up and down the floor. Mike Kern will also be a dominant force next year."

"To be a winner you've got to get up for every game"
— Dane Correll

Correll then discussed Vermont's capability to be a winner in the East. With the geographic isolation of Vermont and the small basketball budget Vermont is alotted, there is no question that the program will have at least periodical difficulties. There is a chance that Vermont may become a consistent winner in New England, Correll felt, and that Vermont can be a strong force in the East. "If we can get more quickness on next year's team I feel we can beat most of the teams in New England."

Correll pointed out Vermont's largest mistake this year, "We have had a devastating lack of consistency. It's been real hard for us to get up for every game this year. When we played Norwich and Middlebury, it was obvious to me that we were not ready to play. To be a winner you've got to get up for every game."

When one watches Correll perform, you can almost sense a touch of flair and excitement in his game. He can be compared to Jim Nocera in that he likes to run up and down the floor in a lightning quick fashion. This is all well and good if Vermont can control the tempo of the game. This year it is the opposition that has controlled the pace. "The team has not reacted well to the type of play that the opposition has used against us," said Correll. The sign of a good player or a good team is to learn to play every style of ball."

Despite the fact that Correll has performed very well for a freshman, he has been disappointed when looking back on his initial season. "I think I could be helping the team by scoring a few more points. I have not played well in the games that the team needed me to play well in. My defense needs improving and I have got to learn not to foul as much as I do. I think I have experienced a lot of the game troubles most freshmen do. I will improve."

Correll conceded that when he plays on a losing ball club it makes it very difficult to keep his mind on the game. Correll had commented in a recent shooting slump, "It all stems from whether the team is winning or losing. I've never lost too much before so it's been real tough for me this year. My mind does wander at times."

Vermont has shown an inability to work as a team this year. Correll felt that the team's failure to mesh their respective talents has been Vermont's undoing this year. "Look at Maryland this year. They are not playing well together and as a result are not winning." He added these comments, "When you lose, everybody always has something to say. I can't worry about what people say. I like my teammates and we love the game. This is why I feel that this program will see better days again."

Correll was very disappointed about the small crowds that come to the home games. "I've never played before such small crowds. When I see a lot of fans in the stands I get really psyched up to play. I think the whole team does. Any team plays better when people are enthused."

Correll has adjusted to life very well at UVM. The marketing major is quite pleased with the way his freshman year has gone. "Getting to know the coaches as people has given me a big thrill. Playing on a team and working for a common goal is always something that I have strived for."

It was Correll's closing comments that prove what a good person he is. "I've met a lot of people since I came to Vermont. I love the people here. Whether a person is black or white does not matter to me. People are people and that is all that matters. I love people."

The Basketball World

Eighty-five days after his face was on the wrong end of the Punch Heard Around the Basketball World, the only physical reminder of the blow left on Rudy Tomjanovich's face is a slight scar along his upper lip; the rest of his battered face has nearly healed now. Surgery and rest have taken care of fractured nose, broken jaw, fractured skull, damaged eyes, torn lip, loosened teeth and concussion.

The only ingredients left in the healing process now are time and patience. Last week, Tomjanovich practiced with his team, the Houston Rockets, for the first time since December ninth, when Kermit Washington's punch ended his season and jeopardized his career.

Tomjanovich's practice though is limited to shooting and running. He avoids drills where contact is a factor. He does not want to take a chance on anything coming near his face. "I want to play as soon as I can," he says, "but I'm not ready for any kind of competition or contact just yet. Eventually, I've got to come to terms with this thing. Will I be gunshy? I really don't know."

Tomjanovich will wait until fall to find out if climbing back onto the horse that has thrown him is the answer. When the 6-8 forward steps on the court next season and goes head-on with the flailing elbows, hands, and crashing bodies of an NBA game, then he will know if the healing is complete.

After receiving a record two month suspension and corresponding loss of salary, Kermit Washington was back on the court last week wearing a new uniform and anxious to start again. Needless to say, that will be difficult.

Washington does not make any pleas of innocence. He threw the punch but he is no villain. Although a digger and a scrapper on the court, he is a quiet man, who keeps to himself and his family off the court. Washington, his fist, and Tomjanovich just met in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Washington, then an LA Laker, explains the incident this way: "It happened after a Laker defensive rebound. I turned to go upcourt and Kevin Kunnert (of the Rockets) was in the way. I put my hand on him just to get around him when he elbowed me hard in the face. Then he punched me hard in the face."

"You don't stop a fight by running into it."

The fight ended that quickly. Washington had moved away from Kunnert when he saw a Houston player running toward him from the side. He threw the perfect punch at this player, who turned out to be star forward Rudy Tomjanovich. All the laws of physics were against Rudy T. He literally ran into the punch as the two opposing forces – Washington's fist and Tomjanovich's face – met with devastating impact.

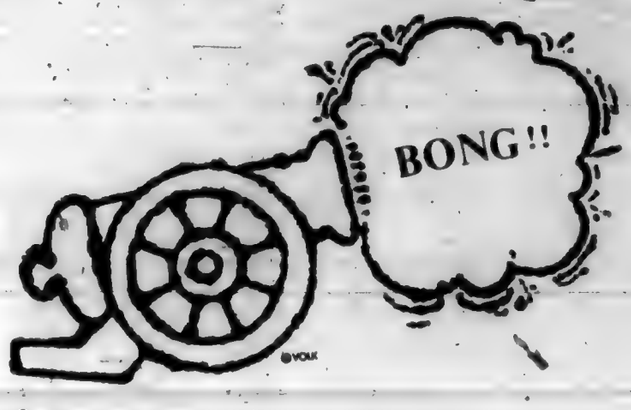
Washington was quickly suspended and fined by NBA commissioner Larry O'Brien. Washington was not pleased with the sentence, but he harbour no ill feelings toward O'Brien. "I like the commissioner," he says. "He's a nice man, but he was never a player and he didn't understand how something like this could have happened."

Many players agreed with Washington. "Rudy did the wrong thing," one player said. "You don't stop a fight by running into it."

But others disagreed. One veteran Laker said: "He's (Washington) a very nice guy off the court, but when the game starts he's a maniac. The fight with Rudy was bound to happen some night."

Washington's attempts to contact Tomjanovich have been turned down. Tomjanovich prefers to forget the incident and doesn't plan on talking to Washington. "I don't see what that would do that could make any difference now," he says. "I guess I'll have to make a cassette and send it to him to tell him how I feel," says Washington.

Washington was traded to the Boston Celtics shortly after the fight. The ailing Celtics were looking for a tough rebounder and jumped at the chance to obtain Washington.



Washington was not allowed to practice with the Celtics or even attend their games during the suspension. He tried to stay in shape on his own, but without constant competition his conditioning suffered. Now he must play himself into shape. "If we're winning," he says, "then it will be easier. I can come in gradually. If not, if they have to force me in, then it will be more difficult."

Kermit Washington's difficulties are not over and may never be. He is hopefully grateful just for being able to play and expects, he knows, the storms will disappear and his career will continue to be governed by the split-second reflex of a boxer.

'Competition for Fun' Powers Janet Lynch

By Steven Larose

Janet Lynch has a long history of winning, beginning as a gymnast for Burlington High School and continuing on both the women's track and gymnastics teams during her four years at the University of Vermont. The key to Lynch's success has been her unique attitude toward competition.

Lynch expanded on her philosophy by stating, "Learning how to accept a loss is just as important as learning how to win. Many athletes today hold a 'winning is everything' attitude, but I just try to do my best. Percentage-wise I probably perform better over the long run, because I am always mentally prepared for a meet, even though someone else may be better physically." She continued, "Some athletes get upset because they have a lot of pressure on them to win, but I am lucky because I have always been able to go out and compete only for the sake of having a good time. Success to me is internal, not material."

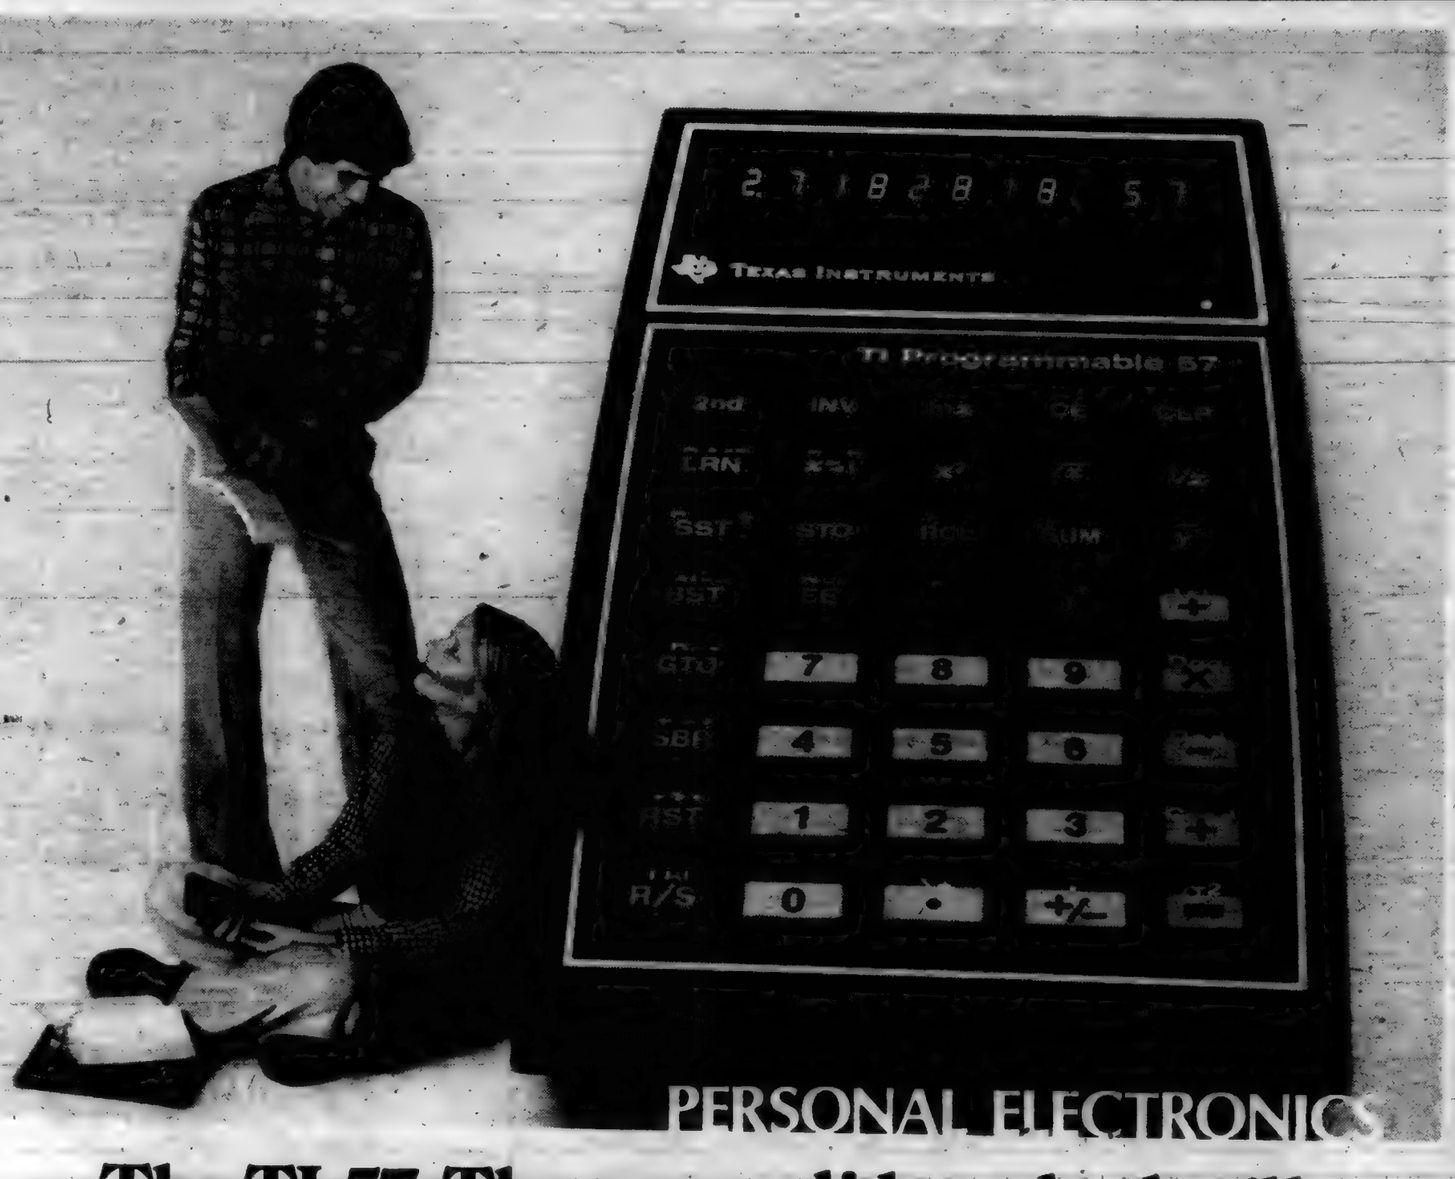
Lynch also remarked that it is easy for her to get over a loss, since in her mind winning and losing are not important, but the degree of how hard she tries is the important thing. "Sometimes I go to a meet and do a terrible job, even though the judges might not catch it and I'll often win. That's when you defeat yourself, since it's on your conscience that you have performed below your capabilities. Other times I'll do a perfect routine, but only finish second or third. Then it's all right with me, since I feel good that I performed well, and that's more important than placing first. I don't know what makes me participate, I just enjoy it."

"If you are happy with the way you have performed, then that is success"

-Janet Lynch

Lynch became interested in track and gymnastics at an early age, practicing high jumping in a neighbor's back yard. She continued through high school, setting several state records and competing in national events. She explained that UVM track coach Ed Kusiak helped her during high school, and later allowed her to practice with the men's track team to keep her interested until UVM could assemble a women's team. She also joined the UVM gymnastics team, becoming one of the few college athletes to compete in two sports. "The trend to specialize and compete in just one sport year round is now becoming dominant, but I kept up my interest in both, since the need for enjoyment overcame the need to be a star in a particular event," said Lynch. Through the years she has competed in three national championships, and is currently the captain of both the women's track and gymnastics teams.

When asked about the current women's sports scene, Lynch remarked that the attitudes of the competitors and coaches have changed rapidly since her freshman year, and that UVM is keeping pace with the times. "The women's program here is competitive with any other in New England. Even though UVM doesn't have much as far as scholarships and facilities, the coaches care more about the students here than at other colleges. If people take an interest in you, you can't help but feel happy about what you are doing." She went on to say that at other schools she has visited, the athletes are treated like machines, forced to compete by the coaches and administration. In her opinion, UVM differs in that the coaches are interested in teaching, and give students a good experience, not a lot of agony.



In talking about her future plans, Lynch remarked, "Some people say I could go to the Olympics, but I realize that I can't go, just because Vermont and the Olympics are two worlds apart. I'm looking forward to teaching and working with kids who haven't picked up the idea that winning is everything. You lose the success inside when you think this way. Everything is inside you, and if you are happy with the way you have competed, then that is success."

Lynch works with a summer track program for youngsters, where she passes on her philosophy to beginning athletes. "You can take a physically mature kid and put him in a track meet where he will win on sheer muscle, but he hasn't won a thing. If you can build the confidence of a physically smaller kid who was afraid to compete, and even if he finishes last, then that's a big accomplishment. You've got to teach the kids that participating is the most important thing in sports. If they are programmed with a competitive aspect, it will ruin them."

Lynch pointed out that there are many athletes on the college level who only think about victory. "I feel badly for them. I wonder if they have ever really felt happy about themselves and what they are doing. Maybe their parents instilled the winning drive in them, instead of encouraging the fun side of sports," Lynch said.

Lynch went on to say that there are many women who share her enjoyment of

The TI-57. The super slide-rule that'll get you into programming... fast and easy.

Even if you've never programmed before.

For the student who requires slide-rule functions, the TI-57 delivers an exceptional combination of advanced mathematical and statistical capabilities. From functions such as trig, logs, powers, roots and reciprocals...to mean, variance, standard deviation and much more.

And as long as you're in the market for a super slide-rule calculator, why not buy one that can also put the power, speed and convenience of programming at your disposal?

Programming a calculator simply means giving it a logical set of instructions for accomplishing what you want it to do. Programming enables you to solve lengthy and repetitive problems quickly by substituting new variables into the set of instructions which you have already entered into the machine.

The end result is more efficient use of your time in problem-solving.

All this and more is explained in our unique, illustrated, easy-to-follow guidebook, "Making Tracks Into Programming." This 200-page book comes with the TI-57. It contains simple, step-by-step instructions and examples to help you quickly learn to use programming functions to make your problem-solving faster, more accurate and fun.

why Ivy League teams had the easiest schedules and maybe now the schedule toughness will be equalized. It is also possible that Harvard and Dartmouth will replace their Penn games with games with RPI. Brown may finally put Clarkson and SLU on its schedule. Local rivalries may be improved: UVM may play Dartmouth twice now, and Clarkson and Cornell might play each other twice.

The CCHA playoffs get underway tomorrow night. Bowling Green won the regular season championship, so if the trend of recent years continues, number two seed St. Louis will win the playoffs. Northern Michigan was seeded third or fourth and either Western Michigan or Ohio State got the other playoff berth. Lake Superior St. may have missed the playoffs because their two game series at home with Bowling Green was snowed out. The CCHA playoff champion will meet the WCHA runner-up to determine the number two Western representative in the NCAA Tourney.

The WCHA season ends Sunday and playoffs start next weekend. Eight teams of the ten team league make the playoffs and there is a wild five team race for the last four spots. Denver, the number one team in the country, has already clinched first place and will have home ice throughout the playoffs. The Pioneers, however, are on probation and cannot compete in the NCAA Tourney. So, if an ECAC team wins the NCAA Tourney, the WCHA fans will still claim "Western superiority" and point to Denver's ineligibility.

better in the four major carnivals which are qualifiers for the NCAA's. The Cats exhibited strong depth as Jerry McNealus, Bruce, and Kent Belden combined for sixth, seventh, and eighth places respectively. Middlebury's strength lay in Steve Utter's second place finish backed by John Jacobs in fifth.

The UVM squad is now looking forward to the NCAA competition to be held at Cannon Mountain in N.H. "We're going to attack it with our best effort," Lacasse stated. "We're going to ski as fast as we can even though it may be chancy. The possibility of falling is greater, the faster the skiers go, but we're going to have to take risks to beat the national powers we'll be up against this week."

"The scoring will be different," explained Lacasse. "So we're going to have to put our all into it to place above tenth or we won't get any points. We're hungry for victory now after a few years without an NCAA title, but we're trying to keep our emotions out of it. One of our strongest points throughout the season has been our ability to take the challenges cooly and not get too excited."

himself as "optimistic." "I think we can realistically be considered the choice for second in the Nationals. There's some chance we'll beat Middlebury, but we can expect to beat Dartmouth which we've beaten often during the season."

"We are very healthy," added Bland. "We are going to go for it all in the Alpine. We don't have too much to lose so there will be no holding back. As for the cross-country, the seven thousand foot altitude could affect our runners, but we should be able to handle it. Utah and New Mexico are going to be tough in the Nationals, but we're going to do our best."

competition, but that many athletes have not shaken off the drive to win. "Year round athletes have to be on ego trips, since in big sports like hockey and basketball the emphasis is placed on winning. In another four years, track will be the same way. Schools will be recruiting and offering scholarships, and they will want people who can win meets and give 100% of their time, not those who are just there for the fun."

Lynch made the observation that "many of the people who survive college athletics do have this feeling of success on the inside, and are happy with themselves. A big jock has nothing after college, since the only thing he ever cared about was winning. What is he going to do after college? He has nothing."

In commenting on her attempts to master other sports, Lynch said "when I began to cross-country ski, I tried to go so fast I fell all the time. Other people told me to take it slow. I didn't want to be a beginner, but jump right in. For me the thrill of sports is knowing that I can do something the best I can, no matter if I win or lose."

Sea Level and Z
Strutt Their St

By Shana Schwartzburg

The same sea level suggests many meanings. To Chuck Leavell, ex-Allman Brother and keyboard player in the band Sea Level, it means the place where all the elements meet.

"The idea behind the band is diversity," Leavell said before the band's concert last Thursday night. Sea Level, noted for a funk/jazz fusion on past albums, may shift the direction of its music on future releases, though. "That's the beauty of the band — we don't really know (where the music will go)," he said. Leavell indicated the band's third album will probably not be a great departure from their first or second albums, but he did project the group will probably be back in the studio in June with a new release coming in August or September.

Plans for Leavell's first solo album are now underway. He says he would like to take part in producing it and also play some percussion because he is, he confesses, a "percussion freak" at heart.

When asked about his overall feelings on contemporary music, Leavell had a few interesting insights. He said a lot of albums today are overproduced and consequently missing much of the sensitivity that is fundamental to real rock n roll. (Whatever happened to all the oldies like Wilson Pickett?) Leavell agreed that Sea Level is trying to attain a balance between a raw sound and a slick sound.

Some of the people that Chuck Leavell names as influences on his style are Leon Russell, Chick Corea, Herbie Hancock and Miles Davis.

Following a brief discussion about the background of the band's musicians, he talked about the new drummer, George Weaver, and why the legendary Jai Johanny Johanson wasn't traveling with the band. Weaver is the newest addition to Sea Level and was hand-picked by ex-Allman Bros. member Johanson, who has decided to take a break after having been on the road for eight years.

Sea Level does indeed stand for diversity as the name suggests. Their performance at Ira Allen Chapel was for a variety of reasons one of the best concerts I've seen in years. The assemblage of talents and energies in this band is so positive that it is almost overwhelming. For this reason, many people carried high expectations with them into the chapel.

I would be surprised if even the most critical people were disappointed. The band played

Bluegrass and Boogey at the Chapel

By Timothy Traver

What are some of the essential ingredients for a successful bluegrass show in a dimly lit chapel? "Thirteen cents, a bucket of toenails, six axe handles, one plug of chewing tobacco, eight black-eyed peas, two cabbage heads, two old rusty nails, four domenick roosters, two old rubber boots, and a pound of cow slave (that's butter friends)," according to Don Stover, the Virginia-born banjo picker whose bluegrass band followed Pine Island with good traditional picking and HeeHawish humor last Saturday night. Nancy Talbot, head of the Boston Area Friends of Bluegrass, a non-profit, Harvard-based organization, brought The Pine Island String Band and Don Stover together with J. D. Crow for a truly entertaining night of music under the dome of Ira Allen Chapel.

The Pine Island String Band came first onto the stage lit simply by a pair of tinted spotlights and enraptured another Burlington audience. There was a muted quality to the songs they played, especially the slow and romantic tunes where the guitar player would throw his head back slightly and sing words like "Come on baby lay your pretty head upon my breast." They moved from a quick and lilting Bill Monroe tune, "My Sweet Little Blue-Eyed Darling" to a yodeling Jimmy Rogers song, then played "Czar's Ransom," a number which the swarthy fiddle player had written and called Volga Bluegrass. Once again they proved themselves to be incredibly versatile, drawing from various styles and several folk traditions to piece together their portion of the program, which they announced was in tribute to Gordon, their banjo picker, who after four years is taking a leave of absence to play with Dealer's Choice. The audience got clapping in time to "ChooChoo Boogey," and during their Pine Island Breakdown and encore, "Water's End," I imagine even he was tapping his foot. Burlington loves their Pine Island.

Don Stover followed coming out of a much narrower discipline of traditional bluegrass it seemed to me, but one in which his dexterous fingers proved he was entirely at home. He loved to talk as much as he did play and his sharp twang filled the chapel between songs with bawdy stories and raspy jokes. After some Old Carter Family tunes, and traditional songs like, "There's a Hole In the Bottom of the Sea," Stover shooed the rest of the band away, demanded a three-legged stool (he got a four-legged one) and played "The Way He Learned How." They ended with "Will the Circle Be Unbroken," to the delight of the audience.

The top bill of the night, the J.D. Crow band, came out dressed in cowboy hats and boots, except for the electric bass player who wore Adidas and no hat. Sounding like crossbred Western bluegrass, they wrapped together some of the sweetest harmonies of the evening. Nevertheless, "Hickory Wind" nearly put me to sleep, and I didn't become conscious again until "Shucking Corn," where J. D. Crow, the top-ranked banjo player in the United States, proved he had it in him. I was a little disturbed about the fiddle being physically and tonally cut off from the rest of the band; normally the bow movements rose up to the balcony as only faint stirrings, and fiddle breaks, though superb, went unapplauded. J. D. Crow could have blazed a bit more yet it is admirable that he could hold back. Jimmy Goodrow, the mandolin player from little Rhodie picked louder, harder, and faster than Crow, but as Nancy Talbot explained to me, Yankee pickers pick well because they have to, alluding to some idealogical difference in the competitive nature of northerners and southerners I suppose.

In some strange way Ira Allen Chapel lent itself to the fortes and pianissimoes of country music as much as a just-mowed hay field would have, perhaps because of the music's capacity to create a space and a joy of its own. Good country music has the wonderful characteristic of sounding the same or better live as recorded and the shows usually start on time. Acoustically, the chapel points only more to Burlington's need for a small performing arts center, and for the dancers it certainly wasn't Nector's or a barn floor for that matter. The success of the concert proves that the less commercial names in entertainment have great potential at the university. One can only hope that the S.A. gets wind of some of the regional talent floating around and incorporates it into the entertainment schedule.

spontaneous music with a large dose of passionate energy, which was further enhanced by a keen sensitivity they seem to possess both separately and together.

Nevertheless, it is this same passionate energy that occasionally caught the band teetering on the edge of incohesiveness. Take for example the song "Storm Warning." At one point in the middle of a jam, it seemed like a few members went slightly astray. Jimmy Nalls was screaming away on electric guitar while Chuck Leavell was playing the piano semi-sweetly. All were sandwiched into a rhythm held down by George Weaver with Lamar Williams and Randall Bramlett on organ. The entire jam was a struggle to hold itself together. They were trying too hard and had gotten slightly lost in their effort.

Some of the recent classical influence that Leavell has been receiving was evident in a soothing solo on the piano during "Hurts So Bad." The piano added to the richness the sound created, as did Randall Bramlett's expressive saxophone solos. One of the key strengths of Sea Level is the skill of the members in translating feelings into music. They're very tight.

While presenting a slick performance of jazz and rock, Sea Level seemed to carry the rawness that Leavell had spoken of throughout the show. Fusion is indeed the word for their music, with its heart in electric rock and its intellect in jazz. (What was that about diversity, and the meeting of all the elements?)

Already feeling good from having had my spirit musically rejuvenated and revitalized during their two and a half hour performance, Sea Level returned and played two Allman Brothers songs for their encore.

Leavell talked of the spirituality of the place, by virtue of the fact that it was a chapel, and then dedicated "Hot Lanta" to Duane Allman and Berry Oakley.

The band has a good stage presence and are genuine in the generosity of their emotions, except for bass player Lamar Williams who remained as steady as a rock during the whole performance.

For the finale, Sea Level closed with "Statesboro Blues," featuring Nalls on slide guitar, doing a Willie McTell song popularized by the Allmans. It was reminiscent of concerts a few years back, and it felt good to find out that rock 'n' roll is not dead.

Opening for Sea Level was Burlington's own hot band — Zzebra. Although the band has only been together for several months, they are moving at a rapid pace, with Lofty Amas as the driving force behind them. Amas possesses a great deal of positive energy and uses it to bring out this same sort of energy in the other band members and audience. Their brand of African fusion music was surprisingly professional and original considering the amount of time they've been together. They performed a fine rendition of Elvis Presley's "Return to Sender," which contained an excellent African drum.

Zzebra's strength lies in their ability to capture those characteristically rhythmic drums that we all seem to have heard somewhere before in the "dark jungles of our minds."

As is the case with Sea Level, Zzebra is also very diverse and versatile. Keyboardist Mina Amas has a beautiful voice that is extremely complimentary to the other vocals. (One thing I must say I find slightly upsetting is the fact that she always plays

The Outlaws
Southern Rockers Capture Crowd

By Peter Relick

One night at the dinner table little Johnny sparked the dull evening conversation by asking his father, "Daddy, did people used to dance before Disco?" Surprised and baffled by his son's question, Dad remarked rather half-heartedly, "Well, I know we did, but I'm not sure what kind of music it was." For the child of the seventies, and a Dad who is only comfortable in silk shirts and platform shoes, the answer to their very fundamental question was right here in Vermont last week.

On Thursday evening the Outlaws played to a bouncing, enthusiastic audience at the Middlebury Field House. The combination of driving music and spirited vocals sent the crowd into various states of boogie fever. Bill Lamm opened the show, and his one-man act prepared the masses for what was to come. But the problem was that it didn't come for quite a while after the program started. Lamm finished his acoustic music amidst loud clapping and appreciative expectations from the audience. Finally at 9:00 the Outlaws sauntered onto the stage.

One thing that the Outlaws cannot be accused of is skimping on their music and the accompaniment. With a four-guitar attack, two percussionists, and four-part harmony, these Southern rockers just about cover every chordal tone, and the result is a full and dynamic sound. The concert-goer is never bored with the group's presentation, because of the ever-switching leads and lead vocals. Since each one of the guitarists presented at least one song as the lead singer, the audience was given four different vocal styles to analyze and be fascinated by.

The danceability of the music was quite evident in a quick scanning of the crowd. Students were hustling to find a bit of dancing room as they got carried away by the great rock sounds. The lead drummer was exceptional, and had a short but sweet solo in the first encore.

The band played all of its old standards including "Lover Boy," "There Goes Another Love Song," and, after much shouting and hand-clapping to bring them back to the stage, "Green Grass and High Tides Forever." Inbetween encores a rumble of clapping would keep the tension and energy moving, and when the Outlaws returned to their instruments, it was as if they had never left.

At the moment the Outlaws are just preparing to enter the studio to record a new album. Hopefully, they won't lose the fast intoxicating guitar background and leads which they are masters of. And hopefully, their material will be on the same high level and of the same calibre as their earlier albums, with the result being a long and successful career.

The concert was a fine display of showmanship and the performance was an enthusiastic and inspired one. This group displays a tight style in which every band member seems to know the others' parts by heart. And maybe they do.

"One thing the Outlaws cannot be accused of is skimping on their music and the accompaniment. With a four guitar attack, two percussionists, and four-part harmony, these southern rockers just about cover every chordal tone. . ."

Flat Broke No Longer

By Vaune Davis

Nestled in an innocuous corner of The Sheik, I shudder as the jukebox barrels out some 'blindly progressive disco band's' rape of Beethoven's fifth symphony. Just as I finish my drink and prepare to escape this madness, two young guitarists begin to jam. "We'd like to sing you a song about living in Vermont," one of them says, "something my partner Chris wrote called 'Green Mountain Air'." Surveying the room, it is difficult to imagine the presence of any air. But listening to Randy Feldman as he sings, "...I've finally found my way – the sun is shining and I don't have to work today," one realizes that there is a lot more green mountain air in the spirit of the music than could ever be found in The Sheik.

The duo is Flat Broke, but not really. Since their first gig together last April, Randy Feldman, a UVM senior, and Chris Voters, a UVM dropout, have been playing more and more, not only in the Burlington area but all over Vermont in places like Hunt's, the Millard Fillmore and the Top Notch. Billed as "acoustic country rock," the two guitarists are well-matched. Rarely playing in each other's way, they are precise without sounding labored over like two well-oiled gears. While Feldman's rhythm and slide guitar is strong and true, Chris Voters' fancy pickin' is spontaneous and, at times, startling. During one of their original songs, "School Ground Days," Voters started cooking on a complicated riff that brought even the most involved conversations about Harleys and post-graduate escapes to California to a halt. Without a hefty amount of voltage behind them, the two manage to play with style and resonance a lot of tunes that their electric counterparts could pass off on sheer circuitry.

Originally a solo performer, Feldman started trying to form a band last year when he realized, as he said, "When you're up there in front of an audience and they are not listening, it gets lonely." But his attempts were, for the most part, unsuccessful. "We even had this one guitarist who was a real space cowboy," Randy said. "We'd do a song and ask him how he felt about it. He'd play a nice riff and say 'That's how I felt.' The man only spoke with his guitar."

At the same time, Voters was also playing solo gigs. He and Feldman met and began to jam in the Living/Learning stairwell. "The acoustics there are great," said Feldman. They started to sit in on each other's shows and, on April first, they got their first job together at the Millard Fillmore. "But there we were," said Feldman, "two April fools without a name. We sat around down there for hours trying to think of one, writing each idea on the back of a matchbook cover. We had a lot of pizza and beer in the process and, finding that I had no more money, I said, 'I'm broke.' We all looked at each other and since then we've called ourselves 'Flat Broke'."

Presently, Flat Broke plays three to four nights a week in the area. While they do an adequate job on songs by Dave Mason, Pure Prairie League, Jackson Browne and other country-rock musicians, their original songs are undoubtedly their best. Feldman and Voters feel the same way about their music but, as Feldman said, "A lot of our originals are so mellow that we're afraid they'll put people to sleep." Voters does most of the writing, but Feldman also writes songs occasionally. "I wish I could spend more time writing now," he said, "I come up with some of my best ideas in the shower. But I'm in such a hurry to get dried off I never write them down."

It is obvious that the two enjoy playing but they are not sure if they want to be musicians for the rest of their lives. "You have to know the right people," Feldman said, "I think I'd rather have my sanity."

Fear and Waiting At The Black Angus Steak House

By Appleton King

"Hells the hippest way to go."
Joni Mitchell

Cruel and unusual punishment is too flattering an assessmnt of that fateful night six of us sought out the Black Angus steak house for nourishment. In good conscience, even now safe in the confines of my own kitchen, I couldn't reveal the restaurant's location, because that, like the breeding grounds of the tarantula and sea wasp, should always remain a secret.

I should have known by the way the hostess led us out of the plush-chamber by the bar, as if she were conducting souls from purgatory, what lay in store. More unnerving was the final glance she tossed us before leaving us to the mercy of the dining room, an expression one can only describe as a mixture of fear and pity. In other words: tragic.

But by that time we were committed to sitting down and as a smartly clad gentleman planted the menus around the table like land mines, grinning mischievously and vanishing as quickly as he had come, our waitress approached. She was blonde and cute and smiling too much. An ominous sign. She giggled obscenely at everything, especially our requests for cocktails which she took down on her pad in a deranged scribble. When she returned with the drinks she waited until we had sufficiently imbibed before informing us that tonight, because of phenomena beyond her immediate control, there would be no meat served – only fish. She stood there beaming and gibbering for a moment over the pall which hung around the table, her euphoric energy was such that there was no telling what she might do if we upset her.

When she returned almost immediately after taking our seafood orders to inform us that the haddock was gone, I suggested that for a flat rate the six of us go on a foraging expedition to the kitchen and eat whatever we came across. It might just save time, I explained. That nearly finished her off, and convulsing she went off to see about our trout.

"We're down to our last three trout." She was back and obviously bent on revenge. My first instinct was to char-broil her on the spot but the looks from across the table belied more fearsome consequences. Seth, normally mild and reserved, looked like he might do something particularly vicious. Jeff had the air of a rabid cougar. The girls were temporarily stunned, but our waitress appeared by far the most dangerous.

She must have concealed a potent tank of nitrous oxide somewhere but even that wasn't restraining the rushes of pure terror she carried back from the chef. The table cloth might hold her, I thought, if worse came to worse, but she looked strong and healthy.

Somehow she managed to scrape up some trout. I could see the kitchen help rushing down to the lake and picking them out of the ice, we had long since ruled out the possibility of being on candid camera; they wouldn't go this far. When she arrived with the canned peas instead of corn, we had progressed enough not to mention it. She told us anyway, offhandedly, "Oh yeah, no more corn too."

We finally left her a large enough tip to see her to the border if she was so inclined and once in the parking lot I couldn't resist a last peek at the picture windows. A couple was seated next to the glass watching numbly as a waitress shook her head negatively, like a sympathetic nurse explaining that they had given birth to a baby crocodile.

Les Spectacles de Moliere

Spectacle Moliere Spectacle (an evening of Moliere) will open on Wednesday, 15 March at 8 p.m. at the Royall Tyler Theatre on the UVM campus. The evening will consist of two plays, Les Precieuses Ridicules (in French) and La Malade Imaginaire or The Imaginary Invalid (in English). Thomas H. Geno, Associate Professor of Romance Languages, is the director and has translated the version of The Imaginary Invalid that will be performed.

The cast of the two plays includes UVM students, faculty, and staff, and residents of the greater Burlington area. Les Precieuses Ridicules is set in Paris in 1659. The cast includes Cort Millar and Tom Winslow, both UVM students, as La Grange and Du Croisy, rejected suitors; Francis Bliss, Professor of Greek and Latin, as Gorgibus, a typical bourgeois father; Dawson Lane and Evelyne Germain, UVM students, as the two "precieuse ridicule;" and Joan Patenaude, Kip Kinnard, Harry Tower, Rick Whitmore, Chris Garnjost, Mary Landon, Mary Meis, Tom Blachly, Greg Patnaude, nd Tony Bader.

The Imaginary Invalid is set in Paris at the Palais-Royal Theatre in 1673. For the occasion Louis XIV, then reigning monarch (played by Josh Conescu), is seated in the audience, watching the play with his Queen, brother, brother's wife, and the Cardinal. On stage, the scene is set in the room of Argan, the imaginary invalid. The cast includes Bob Stanfield, seen in many Lyric productions, as Argan; Elim Zimmerman as Beline, his second wife; Stacey Gladstone as Angelique, his daughter, and Cort Millar as Cleante, her suitor; and Tom Winslow as Argan's personal physician. Molly Smith plays Toinette and Greg Patnaude portrays Thomas Diafoirus, son of Monsieur Diafoirus, played by Tom Blachly. The cast also includes nine dancers under the direction of Sherry Underwood, of the Vermont Dance Theatre in Middlebury.

Eugenie Seidenberg, a UVM Theatre student, is the scenery designer, and Muriel Stockdale, also a Theatre student and whose work was seen in Man of La Mancha, is the costume designer. W. M. Schenk, Associate Professor of Theatre, is the lighting designer and technical director, assisted by Duncan Stephens, a UVM Theatre student. Jorie Wackerman is the stage manager.

An exhibition of photographs on Moliere and his theatre, times and troupe, will be in the lower lobby of the Royall Tyler Theatre March 6-18. Open to the public, the exhibition is on loan from the French Cultural Services of the French Embassy in New York City.

Spectacle Moliere Spectacle will run through Saturday, March 18. All evening performances are at eight p.m. A two p.m. matinee performance will be held on Saturday, March 18.

RECENT CUTS

Road Apple's Legacy

By Kevin Toole

Road Apple's second album, Road Apple and Beyond fails to display the considerable talents of one of Vermont's better yet defunct bands. Cut prior to the tragic death of guitarist and vocalist Frank Williams which led to the group's breakup, the album suffers from bland material and a nervous quality that prevents the band from letting loose on all but a few songs. As a result, Road Apple and Beyond is uneven at best.

I've had the opportunity to see Road Apple four or five times, usually at Nector's and once at Billings Bedlam. Doug McLaren's keyboards gave them an added dimension and their easy listening, jazzy style won them a loyal following around Burlington. They improvised tunes by the Youngbloods and Paul Simon while also offering original material. It was a pleasant mixture over a drink downtown. One's standards change necessarily when purchasing a record. The cover charge is automatically raised to $4.69 and the songs are isolated from a bar's distractions.

On "Ain't She Sweet," the opening song on the first side, the voices are too loud for an upbeat twenties number. The song itself is familiar and, with the exception of a little skit-skatting on vocals by Frank Williams, the group does little to enhance it. The instrumental, "Barn Thoughts," is an interlude between "Ain't She Sweet?" and an original tune, "Now or Never" which rocks back and forth with Doug McLaren's saxophone voice and becomes boring quickly. This is the problem. The material on this album didn't deserve an album and so much of the disk consists of "fillers." On the opposite side, a fast version of Paul Simon's "Take Me to the Mardi Gras" is not bad but soft lyrics set against a foghorn voice in "True Love," are awful.

Fortunately, there are two very fine songs on the record: "I Stayed Behind" and "M'Lady." "M'Lady" features the more-in-control vocals of Frank Williams and some fancier licks on guitar. The relaxed, regular beat and William's aristocratic voice make the image of an English gentlewoman real in this ballad.

"I Stayed Behind" remembers a lost love and shows what Road Apple could do. It's catchy, the harmonies blend well, and the lyrics are intelligent.

These bright moments don't carry the album but they do point to some of the talent that are evident as the surviving members of Road Apple join other bands.

Alphonso In A Trance

By Tom Nuccio

Alphonso Johnson, *Spellbound

The bass guitar is truly a hybrid instrument. A cross between the traditional acoustic bass and the electric guitar, it has undergone a tremendous transformation in status as a jazz instrument. When first introduced, it was used as a convenient replacement for its acoustic forefather. Possessing the role of rhythm-keeper, the electric bassist played walking lines behind catchy melodies.

Recently, due to the novel technical approaches of Stanley Clarke, Alphonso Johnson, Chris Squire and Jaco Pastorius, the playing style of the bass guitar has been redefined. This former rhythmical pulsator, via a remarkable instrumental metamorphosis, has become a lead voice in many songs. Of the four men mentioned above, one has truly delved into the improvisational and experimental aspects of this four-stringed guitar.

Alphonso Johnson definitely ranks as an innovative force in modern jazz. When soloing, he plays difficult licks utilizing a distinctive muffled slur of notes and, while doing rhythm work, he keeps a heart-throbbing beat. On his latest Epic album, Spellbound, Johnson explores the instrumental capacities of three different types of basses and the electric stick. His intentions are excellent, but the applications of his unique instrumental experimentations are hindered by his sidemen. These musicians ruin what otherwise might have been a tremendous album. Their instrumental skills lie between the categories of novice and intermediate. Wheeling in a profusion of multi-synthesized keyboards, guitars and percussion, these sidemen combine in a distorted electronic fuzz to drown out the sound of Johnson's melodic bass.

Although these sidemen predominate in spoiling this record, partial credit must be given to Alphonso. His meager attempt to become a superstar lead vocalist falls short due to one unfortunate circumstance – his voice. He sounds as if his mouth were filled with marbles every time he utters a lyric.

Side one ends just as it begins. It is filled with a second class fusion sound – an unsuccessful attempt to be commercial via the use of electronics. The second cut, "Follow Your Heart," attempts to startle the listener with semi-precise vocals reminiscent of early Yes recordings. This song fails to do anything except arouse a good laugh. The third tune, "Bahama Mama." exemplifies the musical massacre performed by Alphonso's sidemen. It begins with Johnson plucking the catchy melodic theme – a rare glimpse at his true talent. Just as I began to appreciate this song, an invasion of spaced-out sounds filtered through the speakers (courtesy of keyboardist Clyde Criner). From this point, I was forced into a state of deep concentration in order to merely hear what Alphonso was playing underneath a blanket of superdistorted keyboard sounds. Midway through the song, guitarist Pat Thrall cranks out an array of fuzz-toned noise intended to be a solo. "Bahama Mama," just like Johnson himself, fell victim to the poor musical taste of distorted electronics.

Johnson shimmers at only one instance on side two. This rare appearance, occurring on Part I of "Earthtales Suite," features innovative Alphonso bowing a 3/4 bass viol in a frantic solo. However, his exhibition of technical adroitness is suddenly interrupted by a mysterious hiss. "Did the needle break off?" was the reaction of a friend listening to the album. She ran to the stereo and discovered that the needle was intact but the musicians weren't. The suspicious hiss was simply a waste product emitted from one of Clyde Criner's synthesizers.

"Spellbound shows Alphonso Johnson in a musical trance- sliding into brief creative moments then being quickly surpressed by synthesized hypnotism."

Spellbound shows Alphonso Johnson in a musical trance – sliding into brief creative moments then being quickly surpressed by synthesized hypnotism. If you want to hear the remarkable playing of Alphonso Johnson, do not buy this album for you will be disappointed. Spellbound represents the talents of a fine bassist wasted on 37 minutes of monotonous vinyl. There certainly have been more creative moments for this very capable musician.

The Many Faces of Marcel Marceau

By Alexandra Eschenbrenner

Marcel Marceau, the master of mime himself, in past performances has justly become the master with his ability to transcend barriers of conventional communication and hold audiences captive for hours. Though deserving of great tribute for his excellence in past endeavors, before a full house Wednesday at Memorial Auditorium, his aging years were quite apparent as his performance lacked its usual captivating capability and often disappointed a highly expectant audience.

Marceau opened his show with short skits satirically portraying common scenes. In a few of these, Marceau's mastery shined through. As he was caught in a maze in an amusement park, it was hard to believe the walls weren't there. "The Public Garden" and "The Mask Maker" demonstrated Marceau's skillfullness with facial expression, which are beyond a doubt his forte. Unfortunately, due to the size and the arrangement of seats in the auditorium, this facet of Marceau's skill was missed by many. These clever antics also led to some confusion as whispers of "What's he doing now?" ran through the crowd.

In Marceau's second act, Bip, an alter-ego character created by Marceau in 1947, took over. Bip's misadventures are limitless and mostly portray comic trials and tribulations in a slapstick style. In this act, Marceau's antics were clearer and his comedies filled the room with laughter. Some high points were during the scene "Bip at a Society Party" when Marceau's knack for imitation stereotypes of people and situations everyone can relate to was inspiring. In another scene, Marceau's talent for quickly changing characters during "Bip Plays David and Goliath" held the audience captive as one man became two.

As the master of mime, whose name has become synonymous with pantomime throughout the world, performed, it was disappointing that there was little variation from the comic element that persisted throughout. The aging genius of mime's skills has undoubtedly seen finer days, even though he is still able to fill concert halls everywhere, exciting people with the mere chance to see a master in person.

Romantic Renditions

By Jeanne Cooper

Anyone who has endured the sting of being "dumped on" yet still nurtures a warm fantasy that one day someone will not "love them and leave them" will be absorbed into Neil Simon's film, The Goodbye Girl.

Simon's film holds some love scenes that would drip right through the movie screen if not for the injection of playful wisecracks. By generating laughter from the audience, Simon draws his viewers into a story and makes them receptive to his ideas and illustrations of human nature.

The plot of the film is of the contemporary love story variety. A young divorcee, Paula, and her precious ten year old, Lucy, are trying to grapple with the elements of a large city. Through a wrench of chance, the pair meet that special man who wants to love and care for them. However, the film's architecture is such that upon a simple plot, believable and vibrant characters build a very full and satisfying performance.

The performance of Richard Dreyfuss is what gives the film a superior quality. As the movie opens, Paula learns that her recent lover has snuck off to Italy and the apartment in which she and Lucy have been living has been sublet to the lover's friend, Elliot Garfield. Dreyfuss portrays Elliot, a brash young actor who for all his attempts to seem confident is very vulnerable. Elliot arrives at the New York apartment in the pouring rain complete with guitar and incense with which to do his meditation. Not surprisingly upon meeting Paula at the door, an instant dislike grows between them. The two agree to share the apartment, however, because neither has another place to stay. Their "courtship" proceeds full of insults, bantering back and forth, and lack of understanding, all of which are carried out in an extremely humorous way.

Dreyfuss, who also plays major roles in Close Encounters and Jaws, exhibits incredible energy and proportionate levels of intensity in his role of Elliot Garfield. Another key ingredient in the success of The Goodbye Girl is director Herbert Ross, who also directed The Turning Point. Quinn Cummings does a very commendable job in her role as ten year old Lucy McFadden. The character of Lucy is one I believe most of the audience showered compassion upon. Her maturity which was developed well beyond that of the typical ten year old is exposed in her witty comments, sophisticated wisecracks, and precocious perceptiveness. Her large expression-filled eyes, pretty brown hair, and cute nose captures the affection of the viewers adding much to the enjoyment of the show.

This writer belongs to the sentimentalist breed and was so drawn into the movie that objective is not the word to describe this review. However, when one finds the opportunity to let a few tears stroll down the nose, laugh not just because the audience is chuckling, and leave the theater somewhat buoyant, one wants to join the organization for the preservation of happy endings. After all, so many times it seems "the world is a ghetto" and a few lingering smiles are in order.

Masked Mime Show

The various forms of mime will be explored by The Two Penny Circus in their newest production "A Masked Mime Show," a collection of comic and intimate vignettes, on Saturday, March 4, in 115 Commons of Living/Learning Center at the University of Vermont. Hosted by The Living Arts Series, the performance will begin at 8 p.m.

The Two Penny Circus, based in Plainfield, Vermont, is best known for its clown and comedia dell'arte shows. "A Masked Mime Show" is their newest production and represents an expansion of the popular definition of this classic art.

Mime has long been associated only with the silent, white-faced actor creating illusions through the use of imaginary objects. Through the use of masks, music, and movement, the Two Penny Circus company offers their audience a variety of experiences from the classical illusion mime to clown and mask movement and silent movie slapstick.

They use many masks — some representing distinct characters and others only suggesting form — which become living characters through the movement.

Donny Osman, founder and artistic director of The Two Penny Circus, recently returned from a teaching sabbatical at the Dell'Arte School of Mime and Comedy in Blue Lake, California. He will be conducting a Mask & Movement Workshop at 2 p.m. Saturday. Registration is limited, and interested participants are asked to call Penrose Gearin at 656-4200 for information and registration.

The Masked Mime Show is being assisted by a Touring Aid Grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts.

with her baby on her lap. Doesn't she understand tiny ears are very sensitive?)

Lofty is talented in many ways. He takes himself to his limit on stage as he reaches a frenzied dreamlike state while keeping a beat on congos. He also can carry a melodic sound on saxophone rather well too. He also happens to be, for the most part, a skilled songwriter. I did, however, begin to wonder just what misdirections this skill was taking him when I heard the lyrics to a song he wrote in tribute to Jimi Hendrix. The song had a beautiful opening featuring Lofty on flute, only to be somewhat cancelled out by the words: "I know your experience Jimi./ They say you are dead Hendrix." I'll stick to noting the band's merits.

Zzebra seems to be happy with the sound and style they've created together and I'd dare say that prospects look pretty bright for this band.

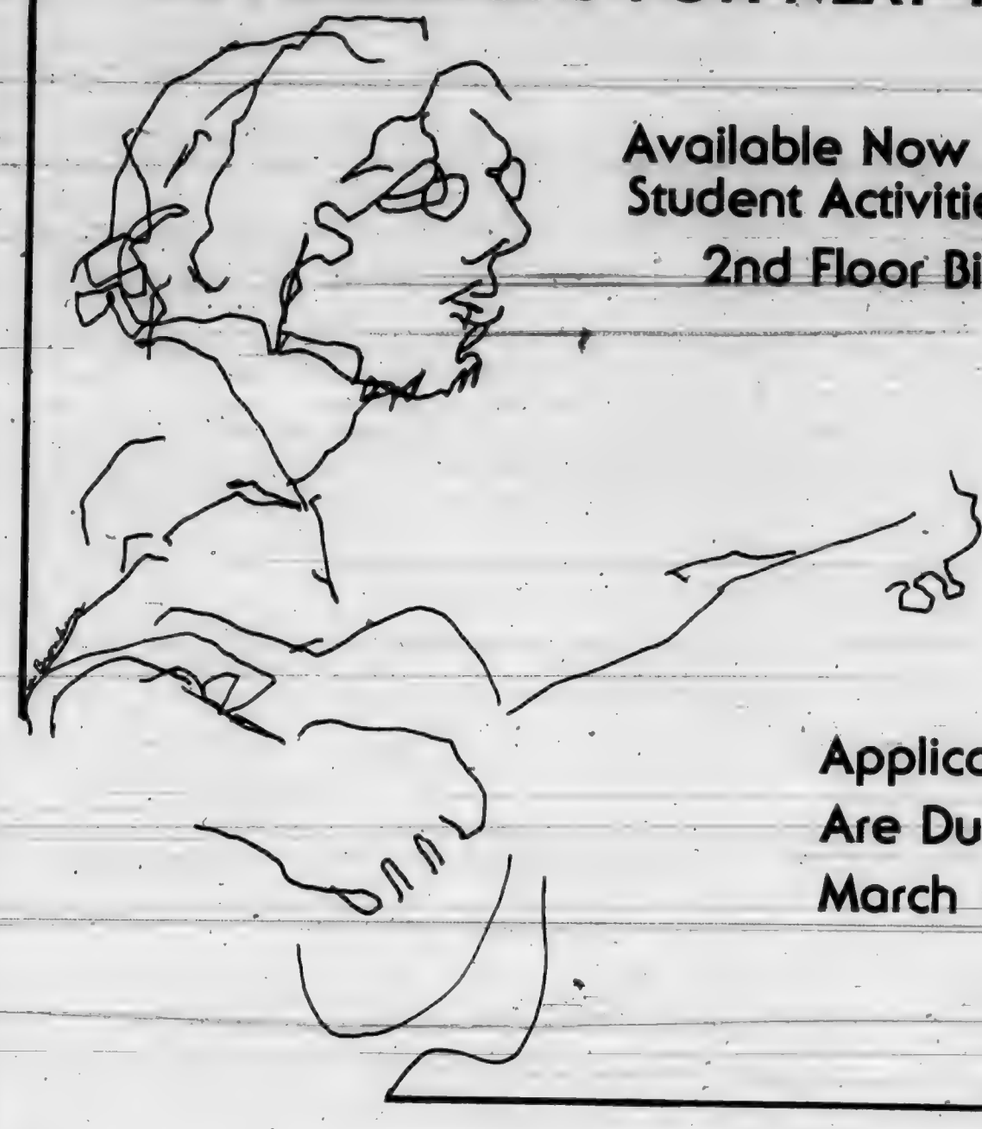
By Jim Wright

Gloryhits (DelRey Books, 295 pp., $8.95) by Bob Stickgold and Mark Noble was read in manuscript form by Judy-Lynn del Rey who was very impressed with it and who took it to various publishers trying to find a hardcover publisher for it. But the politics of the book industry being what they are, no publisher wanted a novel which was already sold to DelRey for paperback printing. So it is not surprising to find out that the only response she got was from the Book-of-the-Month Club who said that they would take it as an alternate if there were a hardcover edition. As the story goes, Judy-Lynn took the problem up with her boss (Ron Busch) who said, "You have just become a hardcover publishing house." This is an event which would appear to be more important than the book which occasioned it. DELREY books is already the major paperback publisher of SF – add to that the option of hardcover and you get a strong incentive to sell your works to DELREY. We should be seeing some interesting developments in the months to come.

This first novel by two young scientists (a biochemist and a geneticist, both researchers in neurobiology) is about a subject which is rather new and controversial – genetic research. Apparently there is a race on to write the first DNA novel and Judy-Lynn wanted to back the winner. The story takes place in the Boston area and concerns two young professionals, Charlie Cotton, a professor of medicine, and Fred Blake, a doctor. Charlie and his wife Ann are going to have a baby. "Doc" is concerned over the fact that the couple ingested some super-LSD (the "gloryhits" of the title) that is suspected of causing deformed fetuses and wants Ann to have an abortion. Ann refuses and the rest of the book concerns the efforts of Doc and Charlie in trying to establish a connection between the deformed, aborted fetuses and the gloryhits. Who is responsible for these gloryhits and why?

There are really three stories within this novel. It opens with a military researcher who is working on a "killer" virus to be carried in a strain of flu. There is the story of Charlie, Fred and Ann, their friends and their frantic search to find out what is going on. And finally, we have the somebodies who are responsible for the gloryhits in the first place. We never do find out for sure just who was behind the gloryhits; was it a U.S. agency or perhaps some Russian plan?

The novel is really too serious to be considered a mere thriller, although all the elements of one are present. In fact, the authors point out in a well-documented afterword that something similar to the events in the novel may have already taken place. (Remember the swine flu or the Legionnaire's Disease?) The book is sobering at the very least and if you already have a paranoid feeling about the government, this book won't help you any.



There are, of course, a few minor complaints, as would be expected in a first novel (although Bob Stickgold has had a story published in Galaxy, so the authors are at least in the genre). The writing is a bit "pedestrian" in spots and some of the events seem to fit together a bit too snugly for my tastes. But these are minor gripes. On the whole the book is excellent and the ending is particularly effective (or rather all three endings). The part about the killer virus, however, did bother me a little – is the military really that dumb?

As I said before, this is no doubt the first of many such books dealing with genetic research and we can expect many authors to jump on the bandwagon and write their own DNA novel, but Gloryhits is the first and will probably be the best.

S.A. Films International Cinema Series on Thursday nights will be shown at 7:30 p.m. in B-106 Cook building and NOT at 7:00 p.m. as is stated on the poster. Please note the change.

Osteopathic Medicine

Have you considered Osteopathic medical education? Do you know what it is? (It is not chiropractic medicine). Did you know that D.O.'s and M.D.'s have the same legal rights and privileges to practice medicine? Come find out about the profession of Osteopathy from Burlington area practitioners.

An informal seminar will be held on March 8th, 7:30 – 9:00 p.m. at the Alumni House. A slide presentation and informal conversation about osteopathy will provide a good opportunity to check out this growing field of physicians and surgeons. Sponsored by the Premedical/Predental Advisory Committee.

Note: The MCAT is required for admission to all thirteen accredited colleges of osteopathic medicine.

Community Internships

Want to get credit for working in a community agency of your choice? Then look into the internships available to you as a student at the Center for Service Learning in Mansfield House. The following list is only a small representation of what is open to you. If you are interested in any of the following, or wish to see more positions, call or stop by the Center for Service Learning at 656-2062.

(1) Excellent opportunity for Recreation Management and Physical Ed majors! Weeks School is looking for an individual to provide on-going activities for students during their non-school hours. Activities may range from skiing to building model airplanes.

(2) The Lake Champlain Committee is in need of someone to conduct a market survey of membership availability for an environmental organization. Develop fund raising techniques and work with team in New York State to evaluate fund-raising costs, and determine the best approach for the least costs.

(3) Congressman James Jeffords has a district office in Burlington, where he could use students to research topics of particular legislative or administrative interests to him. This would be an excellent educational opportunity to learn about the workings of the legislative branch of the Federal government.

(4) Education majors! Weeks School is looking for individuals interested in being a teachers aide. This deals with working directly with teachers or working on a one-to-one basis with a student in a deficiency area.

(5) The Lake Champlain Basin Study is in need of someone to be an Assistant to Public Involvement Coordinator. This would require the individual to organize public meetings, workshops or forums; answering citizens questions, etc. These meetings would center around the projects that the Basin Study is taking on.

UVM Swimmers

Two University of Vermont swimmers made decent showings over the weekend in the New England Women's Intercollegiate Swimming and Diving championships held at Boston College.

Linda Hill placed 11th in the 100-yard butterfly and took 14th in the 50-yard butterfly. She also placed 16th in the 200-yard individual medley.

Sarah Moore was 13th in the three-meter diving competition and 20th in the one-meter diving.

Dr. William Lipke

Come out of hibernation this winter! For stimulating lectures on current topics, updates on research at the University, and more... Join Chittenden County Alumni and Parents and UVM community members in the Spring Chittenden County Lecture Series.

Dr. William Lipke, the Director of the Fleming Museum, and Louisa Judge, the Director of Public Relations for the Museum, will discuss the treasurers of the Museum in a presentation entitled "Rediscover the Fleming Museum." The presentation will take place on Wednesday, March 8, at 7:30 p.m. at the Museum.

All UVM alumni, parents, students and community members are welcome. For more information, contact the Alumni Office, 86 South Williams Street, 656-2010.

"Take the Bull by the Horns"

The Cinemawomen of Vermont and Green Valley Film and Art Center proudly present a never-before-seen in Burlington series of films by or about women. Beginning Saturday, March 4 with a 9-hour festival at St. Paul's Cathedral, the title "Take the Bull by the Horns" indicates our feeling that it's time women give each other recognition for our accomplishments and celebrate our strengths. We think sharing our commonalities via the film media is a way to do this.

Donation is $5.00 for the entire festival or $2.00 for most individual events.

The second event in this Spring fete is a celebration of International Women's Day on Wednesday evening, March 8 at The Mill in Winooski. The film "The Salt of the Earth" is being shown at 8:30. It's a 1950's re-enactment of a New Mexico miners' strike depicting women's roles.

The Series will continue through May 18; watch for upcoming campus events. Childcare provided free at all events. For more information, call 862-4929.

S.A. Elections

Elections for Class Officers for the classes of 1979, 1980, and 1981 will be held from Tuesday, March 21 through Thursday, March 23. Petitions for the Class Officers are available at the Alumni Office located on 86 South Williams Street (behind Waterman). Petitions are available for a ticket or for individual positions.

Fifty signatures are required on each petition, and must be returned to the Alumni Office no later than 5 p.m. on Monday, March 13.

Publicity is the responsibility of each candidate.

For more information call the Alumni Office at 656-2010.

Advising Referral

Sue is having difficulty deciding upon a major. Her parents want her to be a Dr., so she enrolled in the Pre-Med program. All of a sudden Sue's interests begin to wane. She does like her psychology courses. How does she go about changing her major? How does she tell her parents about her change in plans? If you have similar concerns or want someone to explore career options with you, come to the Advising Referral Center at 337 Waterman, x4174. Let us help make the system work for you!

T-Shirt Exhibit

For those people who are collectors, watchers or wearers of T-shirts there will be an Invitational T-Shirt exhibit at the Francis Colburn Gallery in Williams Hall from March 6-10. All members of the University and Burlington communities are invited to submit any or as many new, old, original, or commercial T-shirts to be exhibited during that week. T-shirts to be exhibited must be brought to either the Art Department office or the gallery by March 3.

The idea of having an invitational exhibit was instituted one year ago. The show consists of contributions solicited from the community which are co-ordinated by members of the Colburn Gallery Committee. Robert Rindler, director of the gallery, explains the show's concept, "Each semester we try to have a show which involves as many people as possible. This is the third invitational show we have had." The first was an exhibit of Postcards last spring. The second was the Mask exhibition in October.

Wednesday, March 8 between 5–7 p.m. there will be a reception with wine in the gallery. Hand-silk screened "Francis Colburn Gallery" T-shirts will be for sale at that time and during the rest of the week. The T-shirts which have been used for the exhibit may be picked up by their owners the following Monday.

S.A. FORMS!

All S.A. Recognized Organizations should pick up club reevaluation forms if they haven't already received them. All organizations must return these forms by Wednesday, March 8 to the S.A. office.

Debating Team

The UVM Lawrence Forensic Union novice debate team once again made their presence felt within the New England novice circuit with a strong showing this past weekend at Suffolk University. The novice debaters earned a fifth place team position and succeeded in grabbing three of the top ten individual speaker awards. The one day tournament featured teams from schools such as MIT, Boston College, Dartmouth, and the University of Massachusetts.

Glenn Turner, with only one other tournament experience under his belt, teamed up with Ted Kellog to win a fifth place. Individually, Kellog, Ellen Vaughan, and Knut Rostad took the third, sixth, and eighth individual speaker awards respectively.

Vidio Interviews

The College of Education and Social Services Career Planning and Placement Office is now offering videotaped interview experiences for its seniors and graduate students preparing for professional positions. Registrants will have the opportunity to view themselves after simulated interview sessions for the purpose of enhancing self-confidence. Seniors and graduate students enrolled in the College of Education and Social Services are invited to call 656-3477 or to come to 411 Waterman to sign up for 45-minute appointments. The interviews will be held every Thursday from 1:00 – 4:30 and every Friday from 2:00 – 4:30 p.m. This Service is available all semester. Feel free to sign up now or anytime before final exam week.

UVM Lit. Mag.

WE want YOU to start putting your creative thoughts on paper!

Who are WE? WE are the staff of UVM's student literary magazine, "The News and the Weather." This semester's issue is scheduled to appear in May; but before the first copy can be printed, we need you to submit your work. The work that you make available may be in the form of either poetry or fiction (short stories of reasonable length). In either case, we must receive your work by March 24. You may bring your paper to the "News and Weather" mailbox in the S.A. office in Billings or you can send it to John Keith at 68 S. Willard Street in Burlington. But be sure to submit your paper by the March 24 deadline so that we may all enjoy your literary creativity. Don't be afraid to share your talents. Start writing now!

Design Contest

For all those wishing to try their artistic hand at designing a "logo" to go on T-shirts, buttons and bumper stickers VPIRG is sponsoring a Sun Day T-shirt design contest from now until March 10, open to anyone. Sun Day is a national day of solar energy celebration happening on May 3rd, 1978! The submitted designs should exemplify and promote Sun Day. Please bring as many designs as you would like throughout the next 3 weeks to the VPIRG office in the North Lounge of Billings, and maybe you will see your design all over Burlington! Any further questions concerning Sun Day or the contest: call Melissa at x3084 or stop by the VPIRG office.

Learn Sugaring

Learn Maple Sugaring free at the Green Mountain Audubon Nature Center in Huntington, Vermont. Telephone 434-3068. Monday, March 6, 9:00 a.m. to noon. Learn as you work with them during the March through mid-April sugaring season; guiding visitors on field trips; welcoming them to the sugarhouse; holding Sugar on Snow parties; and at a clean up picnic. Green Mountain Audubon Nature Center in Huntington, Vermont. Telephone 434-3068.

Community Jobs

The Center for Service-Learning at the University of Vermont is recruiting volunteers for various positions in the Burlington and surrounding community. If interested in the following positions, or if you would like to see any of our other options, call or drop by the Center for Service-Learning at Mansfield House at 656-2062.

(1) The Vermont Department of Health is looking for someone to set up a training program for food service owners, operators, and managers. It would involve developing lectures, handout materials, and the organization of visual aids.

(2) The Brandon Training School is looking for individuals interested in being placed in any department within the school, dependent upon their personal interest, experience, and commitment.

(3) SPEECH THERAPISTS!!! Excellent opportunity for you to get experience! The Center for Disorders of Communication needs volunteers to work with patients, providing review, practice, etc. on their particular speech handicap.

(4) NUTRTION MAJORS!!! The Extension Service wants interested individuals to work with Youth, in providing Food and Nutrition classes, and to work with low income homemakers in the area of gardening.

(5) The Multiple Sclerosis Society needs volunteers for a variety of positions. They need someone to paint a sign downtown and to distribute posters they have made (good experience art majors!), someone to be a "Visiting Sunshiner" to go into people's homes to work directly with the patient; transportation of patients; and secretarial responsibilities.

Campus Films This Week

THE GIRLS March 2, 7:00 p.m., B106 Angell Hall, Free with I.D.

Directed by Mai Zetterling; Harriet Andersson, Bibi Andersson, Gunnel Lindblom. Three actresses in a road company of "Lysistrata" — the first anti-war feminist play — and they take its lessons to heart in their own lives.

CLOCKWORK ORANGE March 3, 7:00 and 9:00 p.m., B106 Angell Hall, $1.00 with I.D.

Directed by Stanley Kubrick; Malcolm McDowell, Patrick Magee. One of the most controversial films of the 1970's is this incredible adaptation of Anthony Burgess' chilling novel satire on future society with McDowell as the prime misfit.

THE LONGEST DAY March 6, 7:00 p.m., March 7, 8:00 p.m. Southwick Gym.

A great war flick, starring John Wayne, Henry Fonda, Robert Mitchum, Richard Burton, Peter Lawford, Curt Jurgens and Edmond O'Brien. The dramatic re-enactment of D-Day, a stirring record of the greatest military operation of all time. Based on the novel by Cornelius Ryand.

THE MALTESE FALCON March 8, 4:30 p.m., Marsh Auditorium, Free with I.D.

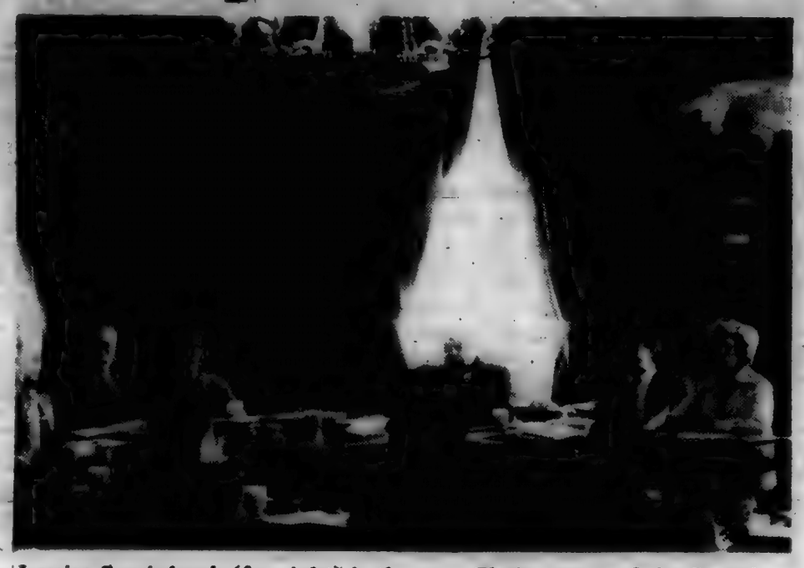
UVM Board of Trustees Elect Woman as Chairperson

By Robert J. Moore



Louise R. Swainbank of St. Johnsbury was elected Chairman by the UVM board of trustees Saturday, becoming the first woman to assume that position.

This session of the board was also the first time students have served as voting participants in the board's decision making process. Andrea L. Pearl and Galen A. Crandall III became the first student trustees through a bill initiated by the UVM Student Association and signed last year by Governor Snelling. Prior to this session, students had been allowed to take part in committee discussions and debates but did not have voting privileges.

The state legislature elected Mrs. Swainbank, a Republican representative from the Northeast Kingdom, to the board of trustees in 1975, and in 1977 she assumed the position of vice chairman. Her election as chairman this year follows the customary board procedure of electing the previous year's vice chairman.

UVM President Lattie F. Coor complimented Mrs. Swainbank, a Vermont resident for over thirty years, on her selection as chairman. She also received a standing ovation from the other members of the board.

"I appreciate the confidence the nominating committee has expressed in me," said Mrs. Swainbank. She and Ms. Pearl are the only women serving as trustees.

LIBRARY FEE HIKE

During the Saturday session, the twenty-three member board approved a resolution which could result in a four dollar hike in the library fee for the school year 1978-79, and would create a reserve fund for library maintenance and general emergency use. Also approved were resolutions to purchase Jeanne Mance residence hall, and to instruct the board of trustees committee on Health Education to "undertake a careful examination of physician distribution and the adequacy of health care delivery throughout Vermont, with special attention to the role of the University of Vermont College of Medicine in contributing to better rural health care delivery."

The resolution had been adopted by the Educational Policy Committee Friday after lengthy discussion concerning present medical education laws and a bill currently in the legislature.

A 1927 law requires all resident medical students to "practice medicine in Vermont" for the same number of years they were enrolled in the medical school or to refund to the state "the difference between the total tuition paid and the total unit cost to the state of the curricular pursued."

In a study by UVM attorneys in 1957, the existing law was deemed to have void portions that could not be enforced. One problem of the existing law was that it contained no time deadline by which the practice in Vermont must be served if the student chose the "practice" option. In other words, the doctor was able to decide which years were to be served in Vermont and could legally avoid practice in the state until the day he died by saying that he would serve his time in the future. If the doctor died without fulfilling the resident practice stipulation, no claim could be made against his estate because his death would be used as a defense.

A bill currently being considered by the House Education Committee would require resident medical students to practice medicine in Vermont for "three years within the seven year period immediately following graduation" in a geographical area of Vermont which lacks "sufficient persons licensed to practice medicine." The student could again avoid this stipulation by refunding the difference between the total tuition paid and the total "unit cost" of the curriculum.

"Unit cost" would be determined by "dividing the total annual budget of the college of medicine by the total

Coor and S. A. Support Present Funding System For VPIRG

By Robert J. Moore

UVM President Lattie F. Coor and representatives of the Student Association spoke out in favor of the present billing system for the Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) at the Student Activities Committee meeting of the board of trustees Friday.

"SA strongly supports the present method," and feels that the "educational experience VPIRG offers is consistent with UVM," said Knut Rostad, SA representative. President Lattie Coor said he had judged VPIRG a "wise program" meeting the "best interests of the students." "I support the current operation as strongly endorsed by SA," Coor said. He noted, however, that if SA changed its judgment concerning the value of VPIRG, then his own opinion concerning billing practices would be altered.

At present, every student at the university is automatically billed three dollars at the beginning of each semester for support of VPIRG. Through the "negative checkoff" system a student may elect to deduct the VPIRG fee from his bill by checking the appropriate space on his remittance card. The student may also obtain a refund after he has arrived at school by going to the VPIRG refund table during registration.

Some members of the board questioned the validity of VPIRG as an organization and said the research group should employ another form of student funding. Senator Alfred Beauchamp (R—Rutland) said many legislators have found research done by the group to be "not deep enough" and "often the repeating of someone else's work, and not always relevant to Vermont issues."

Beauchamp said most people "will avoid the hassle" of obtaining a refund after they have arrived in school and that fear of "embarrassment" deters students from utilizing the "negative checkoff" system.

Concerning the fact that VPIRG is the only organization directly funded by a charge on the semester bill, John T. Morgan of Woodstock asked, "If it's legel for one, why not for all?"

Coor answered him by pointing out that no other organization has such a large amount of student support. Last fall, 53.4 percent of the students elected to pay the VPIRG fee. In order to remain on the bill, VPIRG must get a positive response from at least fifty percent of the students.

The result of SA polls have shown that most students support VPIRG and the present funding system. In a 1975 referendum students voted ninety percent in support of the "negative checkoff" system.

In response to Morgan's statement that he would prefer to see VPIRG financed by SA and sees no reason why it can't be, Rostad replied that to do so "would violate our own (SA's) constitution." The Student Association constitution stipulates that any organization funded by SA must "contribute" to the University in some way and must be composed entirely by students.

If it is to remain on the bill, Morgan said, it should be in the form of a "positive checkoff" system, whereby the student would not be automatically billed but would check the appropriate space on his remittance card if he wished to pay the VPIRG fee.

This, said SA President Geoff Liggett, would force VPIRG to "sell themselves," dumping sixty percent of their funds into advertising and fund raising. The present system is the "most effective" way to raise funds, said Liggett.

According to a spokesman from UVM's Accounting Office, the University is "spending a lot of time and money collecting these fees." The office currently receives eleven cents per card processed.

No resolution was formed from the discussion and the matter was not mentioned

Hike in Library Fee Possible

By Russell F. Flannery

A controversial resolution which would allow up to a four dollar increase in the library fee was unanimously passed by both the Finance and Budget and Buildings and Grounds committees of the Board of Trustees last Friday.

Although the fee increase has not yet been permanently affixed, UVM Executive Vice President Richard Powers cited the need for the creation of the financial reserve to credit the $2.4M university bond sale for the library, and to establish an account to finance library building maintenance. The trustees voted that if the collection of the fee resulted in additional financial reserves, a "Special Fund" should be established. Through fulfillment of specific guidelines, the Special Fund would become available for use for non-library projects. Concern of possible abuse of funds has been voiced by various student government representatives.

THE LIBRARY BONDS

The sale of 2.4 million dollars in bonds for financing the Bailey Library addition is now pending between the University and Goldman-Sachs, a New York investment firm. The contract, including a settlement of the interest rate to be paid by UVM, was scheduled to have been completed by March 1, or in time for this trustees meeting.

The transaction will remain incomplete until mid-March, however, as Goldman-Sachs simply failed to meet the deadline set by the University. In order to avert a special meeting of the board, a "letter of intent" stating that the University will agree to pay an interest rate reflecting a maximum raise of four dollars in the per student library fee was endorsed by the committees. Powers noted that such a letter may actually be unacceptable to the firm, and a special meeting remained a possibility.

THE RESERVE ACCOUNT AND SPECIAL FUND

In accordance with the greater financial responsibilities of a lower interest, private loan, Powers outlined the funding of a "Reserve Account." The University must collect 20% more than is actually required to finance the interest payments, and the Reserve Account will house these funds.

According to the "Trust Indenture," the title of contract for the bonds, the Special Fund will be used for the payment of the cost of structural renovations to the library, as well as utility costs.

Burlington Aldermen Banish Downtown Street Peddling

"The Mayor is dead against us, and he's the leading political force."

By Susan Heller

Street peddling of crafts and wares in downtown Burlington may become a memory of the past after the Board of Aldermen voted 11-2 in favor of banning street peddling between Main, Pearl, Pine streets and South Winooski Avenue.

The section of the city ordinance which governs street peddling restricts the number of peddlers in a given area, and further states that the peddlers must register each Monday with the city clerk (only twenty-four individuals can sign up per week).

"There have never really been any problems," commented David Furlong who sells wooden trains and other toys on Church Street.

Although the Board of Alderman said they would draft a new ordinance to govern street merchandising, the peddlers were originally skeptical of this and wanted to bring the issue directly to the people in the form of a vote. This proved impossible since absentee ballots have already been sent out. Presently, the peddlers are circulating opinion petitions to see if the people support the peddler ban. Furlong urged, "What we need from the students, if they're registered voters in Burlington, is to sign the petition."

The problem stems from a conflict between downtown merchants and the street peddlers. "We've always had trouble with a group of merchants... we have competitive prices but no guaranteed location," said Furlong. He also said that there was a businessman's lobby to ban street peddlers. "The Mayor is dead against us; and he's the leading political force."

The peddlers contend that if the provisions of the present new ordinance were enforced, the problems of out-of-town troublemakers and overcrowded sidewalks would be eliminated.

Most merchants allegedly do not oppose street peddlers per se but frown on those selling cheap jewelry and causing overcrowding.

Furlong countered the overcrowding contention with "When merchants have their sidewalk sales, they congest the sidewalk. If they would clear more snow, it wouldn't be congested."

The peddlers and the Board of Aldermen plan to work on a new local ordinance which would deal with vending license fees, the number of venders on each block, and the type of merchandise sold.

Another alternative being considered is the idea of organizing a "farmer's market" -- one location where peddlers can sell their crafts.

If the peddlers can secure the necessary 1300 votes, it is likely there will be a special city meeting to vote on the issue.

Trustee Runs for Lt. Governor

By Robert J. Moore

UVM Trustee Alfred J. Beauchamp, a Republican state senator since 1975, formally announced his candidacy for the office of lieutenant governor last week.

Elected to the Board of Trustees by the Vermont State Legislature in 1977, Beauchamp is the outspoken chairman of the Educational Policy Committee and is also a member of the Alumni Development and External Affairs Committee. His term on the Board expires in March, 1983.

The fifty-one year old Rutland insurance agent informed reporters during his candidacy announcement that there was a possibility that he would run for Congress in a few years.

It is Beauchamp's intention to maintain his insurance business even in the case that he is elected. The job of lieutenant governor has traditionally been considered a part-time one with the present lieutanant governor, Buckley, treating the $16,700 paying position in the same way Beauchamp would.

"I'm running for the office and not against anybody."

-Sen. Beauchamp

Buckley, also a republican, left Montpelier shortly before Beauchamp's news conference, and left behind a press release in which he said his busy schedule prevented him from commenting on Beauchamp's candidacy.

Beauchamp, active in Rutland area politics since the 1960's, is chairman of the Senate Administration Rules Committee and is a member of both the Appropriations and the Government Operations Committees.

The Administrative Rules Committee has been in the public limelight during the off months of the Legislature because of its control over state government rules and regulations. This has enabled Beauchamp, as its chairman, to command a great deal of public attention.

Beauchamp said he intends to remain chairman of the committee this summer if his campaign commitments do not become too strenuous.

If elected, Beauchamp said he would concentrate his energies on administrative concerns and would not become entangled in "legislative issues." "I might take some personal stands, however," he continued.

This would be a reversal of Buckley's heavy involvement in legislative and especially Senate affairs. The lieutenant governor's appearances at executive branch proceedings have been rare and his relationship with Governor Snelling has been termed strained.

Beauchamp squashed the conjecture that he might assault Buckley personally, thereby causing a Republican split, when he said "I'm running for the office and not against anybody."

When the 1976 election for lieutenant governor went to the Legislature Buckley defeated Democrat John Alden by a small number of votes. The Legislature decided the election because none of the three candidates had received a majority, although Alden had received a plurality. Beauchamp said he voted for Buckley in the contest. A great deal of public controversy surrounded the legislature's rejection of the public's choice in the popular vote.

Buckley has indicated that he is considering becoming a candidate for a different office than of the lieutenant governorship. Buckley said his decision will come after the end of the legislative session and will be influenced by the competition for the post.

Burlington Voters Approve All Ballot Item Questions; BED's Bond Proposals Overwhelmingly Supported

By Anthony G. Cambreleng

Burlington voters approved all seven ballot item questions Tuesday including bond proposals totalling $70 million and a permanent hike in the school tax.

Three power plants proposed by Burlington Electric were alleged to be sufficient to satisfy Burlington's electric needs in the near future. The municipal utility will float approximately forty million dollars in revenue bonds to finance a wood-chip burning plant, fifteen million dollars in revenue bonds for a hydro electric plant on the Winooski River, and ten million dollars in general bonds for a solid waste generator emitting steam heat.

Some state officials and environmentalists had questioned and criticized the proposed wood chip plant but 4,703 voters supported the plan.

The proposed ten megawatt hydroelectric facility passed 4,850 to 1,812 despite opposition from the City of Winooski, which claims the plant will disrupt their plans for the riverfront.

Needing a two-thirds majority for passage, the solid waste generator passed by a close 4,463 to 2,085 vote.

According to Burlington Electric, the facility will dispose of 100 tons of refuse a day, and will alleviate Burlington's problems of landfill space.

A $2.46 million bond proposal for renovation and expansion of Fletcher Free Library overwhelmingly passed, 5,166 to 1,631. The proposal garnered eight to one support in ward six. The bond will provide funds for automated circulation and security systems for the library, in addition to the 20,000 square foot addition and general renovation. It is estimated that the bond will result in an eighteen cent tax hike over a twenty year period.

A permanent seventy-nine cent hike in the school tax was approved by a margin of 3,906 to 2,869, despite strong opposition in wards three and five.

Although criticized by Mayor Gordon Paquette, a proposal for reorganizing city hall with a safety administrator to conduct all inspection departments passed with 3,934 to 2,562 support from voters.

Some areas will have improved water supply lines as a result of passage of a proposal to provide the Water Department with $1.5 million in funds.

Over 25 percent of the city's registered voters, approximately 6,800 people, turned out for the Tuesday vote.

Pollution of Lakes Termed a Serious Environmental Problem

By John Letteri

Man's continual pollution of lakes is causing a serious environmental problem, according to Dr. Stephen Norton of the University of Maine, who spoke on "Paleoliminology and Lake Management" at UVM last week.

The long term effects of man and his pollution on bodies of water can be shown through Paleolominology, the study of bodies of water from ancient times until the present. Dr. Norton, a lake specialist, explained the environmental problems man creates for lakes.

The thrust of Dr. Norton's lectures concerned the dangers to lakes from harmful metals, sulfates, and nitrates entering lakes through rainfall. He stated that "industrial pollutants which are emitted into the air, become part of the air currents, and fall with precipitation into the lakes."

This, according to Dr. Norton, causes two major problems. First, the pollutants increase the acidity of the surface water of lakes. Much of the rain and snow falling on Vermont today has "a pH of less than 4.5 (very acidic)," said Norton. If these pollutants are not broken down, and the pH of the rain is not increased before entering the lake, "the surface water of the lake will be at a pH of less than 5." Fish cannot reproduce in water of this pH level.

Secondly, some pollutants contained in rain or snow, mainly phosphorus, cause the lake to over-produce. Phosphorus, at normal levels, is a necessary nutrient for lake productivity. However, when it is increased to levels higher than normal through industrial pollution or polluted precipitation, large increases in algae content are the result. As a direct consequence of the abnormally high level of algae, the oxygen necessary for all lake life is seriously depleted. As the phosphorus provides more and more nutrition for a greater and greater amount of algae, the lake begins to de-oxygenate. The effects of this are large fish kills and eventual eutrophication (drying up) of the lake.

Having recently finished studies in Norway, Dr. Norton used the lakes there as a case in point. "The polluted air from West Germany is imported by Norway, and as rain falls, Norway's lakes suffer from West Germany's industrial pollution," he said. As a result of this, many of Norway's lakes are experiencing "serious over-productivity." He also described the lakes in the Adirondack region of the United States as suffering from the ill effects of "imported air" from New York City, Philadelphia, and cities as far away as Pittsburgh.

Through a series of charts and graphs, Dr. Norton explained how several lakes experienced dramatic increases in silica, iron, and phosphorus content with the arrival of man. For example, Granite Lake in New Hampshire had a pH of more than eight (normal) before man entered the region. By 1970 the pH of the surface water of Granite Lake had decreased to less than five (very acidic). He also showed that a Lake in Greenland in the year 1200 had a very low sulfate content. By 1970, the sulfate content had increased ten-fold. He explained that "not all lakes respond to the same things the same way. However, all lakes will experience some problems with the over productivity and the decreased pH involved with the arrival of man.

Dr. Norton concluded with "some lakes, once the source of pollution is shut off, can recover. But some lakes are biologically killed and will never come back." Norton described a lake in Maine that was saved from biological death. A town planned to build three tertiary sewage plants up river from a lake that already had a high phosphorus content. Studies were done and showed that the added phosphorus from the three plants would eventually kill the lake. Dr. Norton added that "they didn't build the plants." The solution to lake pollution by land and air emission is either "shutting off the blast furnaces or liming the lakes," both of which are "rather idealistic" and "very expensive," said Norton.

Dr. Norton graduated from Princeton and was a graduate student at Harvard University. He is an internationally known scientist and spent time studying in Norway and Antarctica before coming to UVM. He is currently a professor at the University of Maine.

Advertisers Often Deceive Public

By Susan Heller

Is Coke the Real Thing? Does Ford really have a better idea? When you run out of Schlitz are you really out of beer? Does Bayer really work wonders? Does Exxon really put a tiger in your tank? These and other questions were raised by Jay Ashman, Consumer Educator of the Vermont State Attorney General's Office, at a Chittenden County Alumni Association lecture entitled "The Law of Deceptive Advertising."

Jay Ashman

Every purchase the consumer makes is based on advertising which ideally should provide sufficient bases for making a reasoned, intelligent decision as to what product you want to buy, Ashman explained. He then cited some famous definitions of advertising including H. G. Wells prolific statement that "Advertising is legalized lying."

Advertising, including deceptive trade practices, is regulated by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). The FTC can't prevent an advertiser from inducing a person to believe they need something which they don't, but they want to prohibit advertising aimed at taking advantage of children through Saturday morning television. The Federal Trade Act doesn't define explicitly what is deceptive, but uses case examples to define deception of the consumer. Their purpose is to protect the ignorant, the unthinking, and the incredulous person.

According to Ashman, a precedent setting case occurred in 1944 which involved Charles of the Ritz. He produced a cosmetic called Rejuvenesque which he claimed restored youth to aging skin. This is medically impossible but the company justified their advertising by saying that no rational person would take the claim literally. The courts, however, ruled that this was deceptive advertising.

Another example Ashman described involved Old Gold cigarettes who claimed that their product was less harsh than the six leading brands of cigarettes. The problem was that the difference was infintesimal and would not be perceived by the smoker. This case displayed deception by "telling less than the whole truth."

Another case involved Hollywood diet bread's contention that their bread was less fattening when in reality it was just as fattening but in thinner slices. On television, Ted Mack and Art Linkletter assured their viewers that with Geritol they would feel wide awake and energetic. Again this proved to be untrue.

The first incident of corrective advertising involved Warner-Lambert's mouthwash Listerine. Contrary to fifty years of advertising Listerine does not help avoid colds or flu nor does it lessen their severity. The company had to appear on television and correct prior commercials which made these untrue claims.

Advertisers are constantly monitoring the public's viewing habits. Allegedly commercials are geared to a twelve year old mentality. Ashman comments, "I think probably television advertisers are the most informed people in the world when it comes to the intelligence level of the viewing audience and if that's what they've found, then that's really frightening."

Bookstore: Proposed Computer System Could Save Students Thousands of Dollars

By Lisa Wolff

At the beginning of each semester, students often become frustrated and angry when receiving a new class reading list. Their antagonism however, is not usually directed at the amount of required work, but at the exorbitant prices they are forced to pay when purchasing their textbooks.

Syllabus in hand, students search the shelves of the University Bookstore in hopes of spotting the unfamiliar, yet welcome relief of a text labeled "USED." Unfortunately, 95% of the books available in the store are new editions and thus students are forced to pay as much as one hundred dollars for their semester reading.

Finally relief may be on the way. The management of the university bookstore is investigating the possibility of purchasing a new computerized system which would both improve the efficiency of Bookstore operations, as well as, hopefully, increase the number of used books from five to twenty-five percent of the total number of books.

The proposed system, which is currently being evaluated by certain parties within the university, would involve the use of ten automatic NCR 250 cash registers with electronic sensors already owned by the store. In conjunction with this equipment, they hope to purchase a mini in-house computer which would allow them to collect extensive historical information on the books in the store. By reading the zebra striped tags found on the back of the texts, the sensor records the product code number, publisher, course number, section, etc., and list price of the book in order to provide up-to-date inventory information. This system was previously employed, but the data collected was useless as the store was unable to gain access to the university computer because of the cost of programming. The bookstore, therefore, could not compile the reliable and productive information needed.

In addition to the material already recorded by the sensors, the new computer would store data on university courses and their required texts. This would include the number of books ordered, the price, and whether the editions were used or new. This information would be available to faculty members in the form of a computerized print-out for their use in scheduling subsequent semester courses and readings.

The purpose of the system is two-fold. Not only would it assist the faculty in their decisions regarding which texts they plan to use or re-use, but it would also enable them to notify the store earlier of their intentions. By receiving this information early, the store would know which books are being reused and therefore can buy a great many more books back from the students at the end of each semester. They would also be able to purchase more books from the used book suppliers, further cutting the high cost of texts.

A similar system is currently being used, with the same type of information gathered, but it is performed manually, and consequently takes a great deal more time. Errors have been made such as the ordering of wrong editions, etc., but hopefully in the future the computer would solve most of these problems.

Another goal of the new system would be a reduction in the value of the in-store inventory by many thousands of dollars (perhaps as much as $100,000). In the textbook area, books will be returned to the publishers one month after semester registration in order to avoid the problems of being left with old editions, and missing pre-determined return periods. At the beginning of the semester, 10,000 notices will be distributed to both students and faculty reminding them of the importance of purchasing their books early. Hosmer Graham, Business Manager of the bookstore, claims that "when possible we will hold a book for the student after this period," until the students become adjusted to the system."

The proposed computer would also allow the store to control non-book inventory, i.e. school supplies, etc. and permit reorders more often, thus reducing the cost of inventory held at the store at any given time.

A presentation of the system, which would be purchased from another university bookstore company, has already been made and cost prices are being analyzed now. The computer would cost between fifty and sixty

Recovery Of Resources Tops Environmental Meeting

By John Letteri

Recovery of resources through recycling, trash separation, and the future of political decision-making were among the topics discussed at the final session of "Recycling the Earth," last Wednesday night.

Session co-ordinator Steven Lange asked two questions of those present at the meeting: What will be the future of value formulation, and will they be formulated by collective will or imposed by the impersonal forces of history?

Dr. David Conrad, a UVM education professor, offered his insight on possible answers to these questions. "Values for the future are interdependent" he said. He outlined four major points that he contends "should be carefully thought out" before a value formulation is made. He stated that "environmental sensitivity and careful use of resources, social and economic justice, peace and non-violent resolution of conflict, and more active citizen participation in decision-making" must be considered. Value formulations "can be made by the collective will if these guidelines, particularly active citizen involvement, are followed," he said.

Steven Lange agreed with Dr. Conrad, saying that "citizens need to participate in all decision-making that affects them." He stressed the fact that although some decisions can only be settled by experts, citizens "have been given a republic and must work to keep it." Specifically addressing the Burlington Electric Department's proposals for three new energy plants, Lange said "citizens should be more involved all along the way. They should be kept well informed of any change or new ideas." In this manner, according to Lange, the democratic system of government "truly manifests itself." People are taking an active role in governmental affairs.

The meeting then turned to a discussion of trash separation and possible resource recovery of some of the materials through recycling. Instead of burning all the trash, as Burlington Electric's ten million dollar trash incinerator will do, several persons at the meeting suggested alternative ways of reconverting trash to energy. Source separation, or the sorting of garbage before taking it away, had the most support among those present. With this method, trash such as paper, aluminum, and glass, are removed and taken to recycling centers rather than being burnt to ashes.

Mr. Louis Rathe, owner-operator of the Colchester Landfill, offered his unique way of using garbage as a resource. Quite by accident Mr. Rathe discovered that buried garbage produces large amounts of methane gas. He dug several holes into the rubbish pile at his landfill and ran "four inch pipes approximately eighteen feet down into the trash at each site." Each of the pipes had holes drilled into them along the entire length. He then connected all of these pipes together and ran them to a "pump house." In the pump house, a compressor creates a vacuum in the pipes and allows the methane gas to flow up through Mr. Rathe's network of pipes where it is ignited and heats his house. Mr. Rathe contends that "although there is some danger of blow-ups, it's been heating my house for years now and I only pay thirty dollars per month in electricity to pay for the compressor. The heat is free." Mr. Rathe stated that if engineers came to his landfill and made use of all the methane heat potential "you could heat probably fifty houses."

Mr. Rathe contended that "the Burlington Electric Department has not contacted him or any other landfill operators" about using their garbage for the trash incinerator. UVM student Fred Balis stated that "1100 tons of garbage per week are needed to fuel the incinerator." Burlington proper produces only 700 tons. Burlington Electric stipulates they "will be able to secure 400 pounds per week from surrounding communities." However, as Mr. Rathe states "they have talked to none of the landfill operators or me on this subject."

Space Age Ideas Being Considered

By Craig Smith

Scientists who were considering coast-to-coast subways and orbiting power stations at a recent meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) were not bantering around ideas about science fiction. On the contrary, they were discussing serious projects as part of a one-day symposium on "Macro-Engineering" sponsored by AAAS.

The ideas, while futuristic, are not considered to be beyond present engineering techniques. In fact, several government agencies and private organizations are already exploring the practicality of orbiting solar power stations, though experts agree that it may be 20 years before such stations are actually in use.

The power-station scheme was first conceived by Dr. Peter E. Glaser, a mechanical engineer who is now with the consulting firm of Arthur D. Little, Inc. Dr. Glaser noted that his idea was greeted with scepticism ten years ago, but that now it's being considered as a major opportunity for supplying electricity in large quantities. He estimates that space-generated electricity could be competitive with other power generating alternatives by the mid-1990's.

A typical satellite would consist of a huge array of photovoltaic cells to convert sunlight directly into electricity. Each station to be assembled in space would measure about three by 2 miles and would orbit in geosynchronous pattern nearly 22,300 miles above the equator. A beam of microwaves would transfer the electricity to earth, probably to a set of receivers about six miles in diameter. As many as 200 locations are suitable for such sites in the U.S., according to Glaser, and although the power transferred would be substantial – about 5 million kilowatts – the microwave beam would be so diffuse as to create no hazard to life. Dr. Glaser commented that an animal sitting on such a receiver would feel a slight sensation of warmth, but would not be harmed.

Concerning a coast-to-coast subway, Dr. Robert M. Salter of the Rand Corporation in California, described a system which his company has researched in detail. Trains used in the system would be electromagnetically supported to reduce friction and would travel through underground tubes in which the air pressure could be reduced to the equivalent of about 170,000 feet of altitude. Consequently, the trains could travel at speeds of several thousand miles an hour, allowing a coast-to-coast trip of about 54 minutes, including a short stopover. Rand's initial study covers nearly 10,000 miles of subway linking big cities such as Los Angeles, Dallas, and New York. The system is considered too large for a single private organization to construct, so the plan calls for building partial sections over several decades. Initially, it would be used for military purposes.

The all-day symposium was the first of its kind held by AAAS, which claims such large-scale thinking is useful, even mandatory, in an age of increasing complexity and interrelatedness.

May 3 Proclaimed As SunDay

A joint house resolution proclaiming May 3 as SunDay, a day set aside to increase the public's energy awareness, was passed in a unanimous voice-vote in the Vermont House last week.

Originally conceived by Denis Hayes of the Washington-based Worldwatch Institute (who also developed the original Earth Day event of 1970), a national SunDay is the objective of a resolution co-sponsored by Congressmen James Jeffords (VT) and Richard Ottinger (NY). This joint resolution has been passed out of committee unanimously, having the support of a majority of both Houses of Congress.

The SunDay groups, both in Vermont and elsewhere, are developing fund-raising efforts to finance additional events in early May. While some indication exists that the Federal Department of Energy may provide a small degree of support, the burden of raising funds for SunDay will fall upon the local groups. The New England Regional Office of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has a limited amount of grants available to help support SunDay activities. The amount of the grants will probably be no more than $50 or $100. Groups wishing to obtain funding are instructed to submit detailed proposals no later than March 17 to the State SunDay committee.

The SunDay organizers have urged every person to examine our current energy consumption habits, and the degree to which Vermonters are dependent upon external sources of energy. The organizers contend that people must increasingly turn towards renewable energy forms such as solar, hydropower, wood, and biomass fuels.

The goals of SunDay's promoters are to focus wide-spread public attention on available renewable energy sources, "new" forms of energy, and to encourage conservation and prudent energy use. These efforts will be demonstrated by events taking place in Vermont and throughout the country on SunDay May 3 and during the following week, but will not be limited to these dates.

It is the intention of the SunDay organizers to generate a continuing public awareness of our present energy vulnerability and the need to expedite the shift towards renewable energy sources. SunDay is intended to

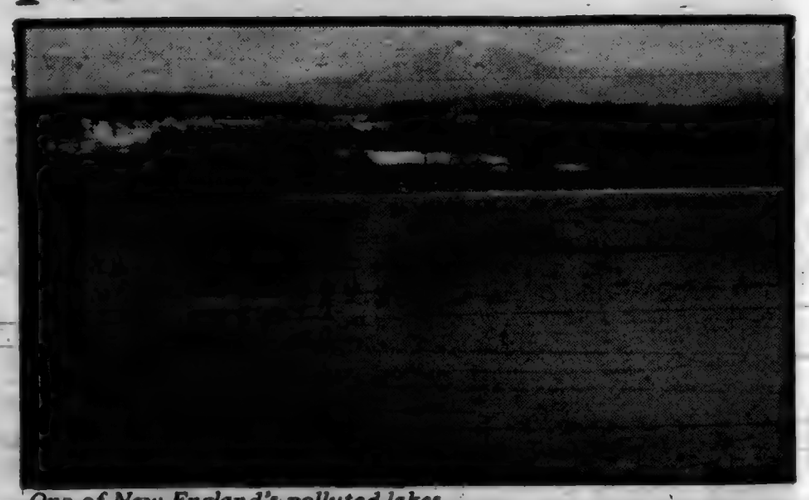
New England Lakes In Serious Trouble Report Claims



Increased state and regional efforts are urgently needed to stop the deterioration of New England lakes, according to a report released by the New England Council of Water Center Directors (NECWCD), a regional university research group.

According to Rudolph W. Hardy, Research Coordinator for NECWCD and project leader, "The study confirms that pollution problems experienced in lakes in heavily populated areas of New England are not a local problem, but part of a broader pollution pattern which has already affected even the region's most rural areas."

"Our greater mobility, leisure time, and higher per capita income – all part of a process we call 'urbanization' – have placed enormous development pressures on New England's lakes," Hardy said. "Steadily increasing pollution loads have choked many of our lakes with weeds and algae, and property as well as recreational values have been lost. Moreover, chemicals and other wastes, such as pesticides, are contaminating our lakes as sources of fresh water and represent a growing health hazard."

"An ominous new threat is pollutants carried in the air from distant industrial regions contaminating even remote lakes in New England," he noted. "But the clean up burden is still largely a local responsibility."

The report notes that symptom-by-symptom remedies, such as chemical treatment of algae growth, fail to solve the root causes of lake deterioration and may even be introducing new problems.

One of New England's polluted lakes.

The NECWCD report is a summary of a research report entitled "The Impact of Urbanization on New England Lakes." During the three-year study, funded in large part by the Interior Department's Office of Water Research and Technology, a team of researchers from the six state universities of New England examined in detail the social, economic, physical, and environmental effects of urbanization on six sample lakes representing a range of conditions from remotely rural to heavily urbanized. The lakes included: Beach pond in Rhode Island and Connecticut; Columbia Lake in Connecticut; Granite Lake in New Hampshire; Lake Lashaway in Massachusetts; Long Pond in Maine; and Seymour Lake in Vermont.

Commenting on the report, Frank Gregg, Chairman of the New England River Basins Commission, a federal/state planning agency, said, "We cannot continue to treat the deterioration of New England's lakes as an issue of only local concern. These are valuable resources, and we need a concerted state and regional effort to save them."

Evelyn Murphy, Massachusetts Secretary of Environmental Affairs, who has led a state review of national water policies, said, "The study confirms the need for increased federal support to equip the state to help communities

Land Salesman Rips People Off

Last week, a well-placed Vermont official informed the Cynic of a very unique occurrence in the annals of land development. It seems that there was this fellow who concocted a plan to make his fortune almost overnight. To realize his dreams come true, he took an acre of land and subdivided it into 43,000 separate parcels and began to sell these parcels (by mail, site unseen) at about $20 a square foot. By simple arithmetic, this clever entrepreneur stood to make, after figuring capital gains taxes, about $600,000 an acre!

It seems that nowadays everyone wants to buy a piece of Vermont, no matter how small or expensive. Perhaps we who live here don't know the true value of a landscape we take for granted. But most likely, this episode is merely more proof that we live in an age where people have more money than brains or plain common sense.

Unfortunately for our developer friend, Vermont law requires a developer to provide an access right-of-way for any land-locked parcel sold. The usual right-of-way is 20 feet wide – considerably wider than a one-foot square section! The developer also overlooked the fact that Act 250, Vermont's Land Use and Development Law, applies to him because his land is in a town which has no town plan or zoning regulations.

If you think all this is made up, you're wrong. Once again, fact is stranger than fiction.

As for the developer, all that can be said is "Nice try." and a suggestion that he teach a course on instant wealth at the Harvard Business School.

Students Contend Whales Endangered

By Alexandra Eschenbrenner

Environmental Analysis

Blue whales are the largest mammals ever to have lived on earth. And presently, they, as well as eight other species of whales, are on the verge of extinction due to their exploitation by two countries: Japan and the Soviet Union. In the past, whales were a chief source of oil for lamps; today this same oil is obtained from the jojuba plant. Other industrial uses for whale products by these countries are for pet foods, perfumes, fertilizer, soaps and dyes, each of which is easily synthesized. Possibly the only rationale these two nations have for these massive slaughterings is that whale meat supplies about two percent of their country's protein needs. But is this justification for driving eight species to extinction?

Actually, to some the situation may not seem serious. Japan and the Soviet Union are presently in the process of retiring their whaling fleets. Whaling, because of reasons cited above, has no longer proved to be as profitable as before, but still the fleets remain and the countries feel they should be used. Consequently, an all-out whaling effort is presently underway. It will be another ten years before each of these countries retires their fleets and discontinues whaling, but in this ten year span the possibility of severe damage to the whale herds is likely.

In an attempt to condemn whaling procedures, the United States prohibited whaling and banned importation of all whale products. A few years back consumers attempted to put economic pressure on Japan to cease whaling by boycotting Japanese goods. Though the boycott did marginally harm the Japanese economy, the boycott had no significant effect on whaling procedures and is no longer in effect.

Presently, there is an effort at the University of Vermont by students to save these whales. A symposium scheduled for April 19-20 is intended to gain appreciation and respect for these whales in hopes of saving them. Various controversies over the whaling issue will be presented as well as art, music, and a workshop for children. Both original and traditional whaling songs will be performed on campus as part of a jam session with John Castle. The program is coordinated by Martha Agan (x4380).

implications of the measure's final clause was aroused in both committees. The clause states that special funds may be applied "for the payment of the cost of any additions, enlargements, improvements, extensions, and alterations to the physical plant, other than Bailey Library," provided the cost does not exceed 50% of the balance in the special fund at that time. Appropriations available only by recommendation of the UVM president and the consequent approval of the board of trustees, will be refused should the balance fail to remain above 150,000 dollars.

STUDENT REPRESENTATIVES RAISE QUESTIONS

Student Association Vice-President Linda Purdy later agreed that the Reserve Account was "absolutely necessary" for the credibility of the board, but she expressed concern about the potential abuse of the Special Fund by future boards of trustees. "I guess it's questioning the wisdom of the board of trustees in the coming years," said Purdy. "I don't think (the fund) is bad... they did it in good faith, but it's purely an ethical question." Building and Ground Committee student representative Dennis Meany was concerned over "the possible use of money for things other than what it was collected for," and noted the "potential" for future "abuse."

Bailey Librarian Charley Kebabian said students now are "lucky enough" to be enrolled while dormitories are new and a library facility is complete. He said all students are "enjoying the fruits" of earlier billings, and termed the fund "a compromise."

An update on the status of the legislative request is among additional action by the Building and Grounds Committee. $700,000 has been approved by a house committee to fund the estimated 960,000 dollar cost of Patrick Gymnasium renovation. The final 260,000 dollars will be provided from a reserve in the current gym budget.

Due to the increase in minimum wage, negotiations for a 1978 SAGA food service contract were termed "not very pleasant" by Powers. The final increase will be decided at the April 15 Board of Trustees meeting.

Acceptance of 467,000 dollars in gifts, and approximately $4M in grants was approved by the finance committee, who additionally approved of the purchase of the Jeanne Mance dormitory at a cost of $653,000. The residence hall has been leased by UVM since 1976.

The Controversial Clause

(v) for the payment of the cost of any additions, enlargements, improvements, extensions and alterations to the physical plant, other than Bailey Library, of the University, provided that not to exceed fifty percent (50%) of such portion of the amount then held for the credit of the Special Fund which is in excess of One Hundred Fifty Thousand Dollars ($150,000) may be used for such purpose and provided further that such use is recommended by the President of the University to, and approved by, the Board.

Israeli Defense Minister Threatens Resignation

Informed sources say Israeli Defense Minister Ezer Weizman threatened to resign unless the government follows his orders to freeze Jewish settlements on the occupied West Bank of the Jordan. The sources say Weizman, who is in the U.S. to meet with American officials, telephoned Prime Minister Begin from New York Monday night.

Weizman did tell an Israeli newspaper that, in his words, "I put my foot down quite hard." But he denies he threatened to quit. Weizman is opposed to new settlements because of U.S. opposition to them and because he and other moderate Cabinet members believe they are a stumbling block to peace negotiations.

Every Vote Critical On Treaties

Opponents of the Panama Canal treaties issued fresh public appeal Tuesday for citizen pressure which could swing wavering senators against the treaties. Republican senator Paul Laxalt of Nevada told a rally of about 1,000 people on the Capitol steps in Washington that the margin is so close that one single vote in the senate could make the difference.

Laxalt urged members of the crowd to write and call their senators again, especially ones who are uncommitted on the treaties.

The rally was sponsored by the Veterans Of Foreign Wars.

Tito In Washington

President Carter gave a warm welcome Tuesday to Yugoslav President Tito, praising him as a symbol of the eagerness for "freedom, independence and liberty that exists in Eastern Europe."

Full military honors were accorded at a welcoming ceremony on the White House south grounds as Tito arrived for a three-day official visit. He met with the president privately after the greeting.

Carter called the 85-year-old leader, making his first visit to the U.S. since 1971, a "true friend" of the United States and hailed his achievement as the world's longest serving head of government.

Carter disclosed that, since taking office, he has sought Tito's advice and counsel on global issues in a frequent exchange of correspondence with the Yugoslav leader.

Tito appeared to be in robust health but wore a somber expression during much of the 20 minute ceremony, witnessed by a large gathering of Yugoslav Nationals. However, he smiled broadly and shook hands with Carter at the conclusion of their remarks.

Speaking through an interpreter, Tito expressed satisfaction over the improvement in bilateral relations during Carter's tenure.

Shortly after taking office, Carter dispatched Vice President Mondale to Belgrade for talks with Tito and last October, Defense Secretary Brown made a similar trip, the first such visit by a Pentagon chief.

Carter praised Tito's role as a founder of the Bloc of Non-Aligned nations, in the United Nations Disarmament Conference and as the host for the recently concluded review of the 35-nation Helsinki Agreement on human rights.

He also said Tito "has been an inspiration" to others in his determination to maintain Yugoslav independence and territorial integrity.

He noted that the Yugoslav constitution itself forbids the nation from capitulating to outside forces.

Larry Flynt Still Critical

Larry Flynt, the owner of Hustler magazine, underwent a second round of surgery Tuesday as a result of his being shot Monday outside a courthouse in Lawrenceville, Georgia. His spleen was removed in an effort to control internal bleeding. In the first operation, the day of the shooting, parts of his large and small intestines were removed. Hospital administrators said his condition was more stable Tuesday, but he remained in critical condition.

Flynt had been on trial on obscenity charges connected with his magazine.

Authorities said Tuesday that shortly after he and one of his lawyers were shot, a telephone caller told the prosecutor in the case he wouldn't have to worry about the trial because, in the caller's words: "Jesus had taken a hand in it."

Flynt was visited Tuesday by his wife and by President Carter's evangelist sister, Ruth Carter Stapleton.

Flynt underwent what he said was a religious conversion last year after several visits with Mrs. Stapleton.

Taft-Hartley Set In Motion

A federal mediator is helping the three member panel named to implement the workings of the Taft-Hartley Act. The two men and one woman appointed by President Carter are preparing for today's (Wednesday's) hearing on the coal strike, now in its 92nd day.

After the hearing, the three will write a comprehensive review of the labor dispute and send it to President Carter. He was expected to get the report by Thursday. Then Carter can direct Attorney General Griffin Bell to seek a court injunction aimed at suspending the strike for 80 days.

President Carter told Congressional leaders Tuesday morning he expects some initial mine worker defiance to any back to work order. But he's hoping available supplies, and at least some resumption of mining, will tide coal dependent states over until the warmer weather arrives.

House Democratic Whip John Brademus quoted the president as saying there are no current plans other than using the Taft-Hartley Act to force a return to work from the three month old coal strike. He said Carter hopes such a "cooling off" period will result in either a new nationwide coal contract or several local pacts.

Trade negotiator Robert Strauss said the administration is actively considering seizing the coal mines if striking coal miners defy a Taft-Hartley back to work order. Strauss said one reason this option was not used in the first place was that the administration was not sure how long it would take Congress to act on a seizure request.

Foreign Investment In U. S. Out Of Hand

The Chairman of the American Stock Exchange, Arthur Levitt Jr., said Tuesday that foreigners are grabbing up small and medium-sized businesses in the United States at bargain prices because of a sharp drop in investment by Americans. Levitt told the House Ways and Means Committee it is his information that well over 50 percent of bankers' acquisition assignments currently are on behalf of foreign clients.

Levitt said he thinks everything possible should be done to encourage foreign investment, but he said he does not think it is in the best interest of the country to have innovative small business under foreign control.

Auto Workers Help Coal Miners

The United Auto Workers Union contributed $2 million to a relief fund to help the families of striking coal miners and coal pensioners. This was announced Tuesday by Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser. He said top officials of the striking mine workers union had asked for the assistance.

Fraser conceded that some members of his union might be upset with the contribution for the striking miners. He said the International Executive Board of his union had voted unanimously to make the $2 million contribution.

In recent weeks, the Auto Workers Union has organized food caravans into the coal fields to help the striking miners.

Habib To Resign

State Department sources say one of the nation's highest-ranking career diplomats, Phillip Habib, is resigning as Under Secretary of State for political affairs.

The 57-year-old Habib was hospitalized last December with a recurring heart ailment and his doctors reportedly have advised him that he cannot continue in a high-pressure job.

The State Department sources said Habib is planning to take an offer to be diplomat-in-residence at Stanford University in California.

The leading candidate to replace Habib is David Newsom, now ambassador to the Philippines.

Habib, the son of a Lebanese-American grocer from Brooklyn, New York, served as chief political officer at U.S. missions in South Korea and South Vietnam, political advisor to the Paris Peace talks, and Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

He was appointed to his present job by Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in 1976 and was retained by Kissinger's successor, Cyrus Vance.

Skylab May Crash

Space officials sent more radio commands to the orbiting Skylab space station Tuesday to see whether it is still in working order. The space station has not been used for four years and NASA officials are concerned it may drop out of orbit sometime in 1979 or 1980 unless some maneuvers are made next month. The station has apparently started up again but is not responding to commands from the ground.

Renowned Paris Restaurant Stunned

The excommunication of the renowned Paris restaurant Maxim's from the Michelin Guide's Holy Order of French Cuisine has stunned the world of gastronomy.

Michelin dropped the bombshell Monday when in its 1978 edition it stripped Maxim's of the premier rating of three stars it has held for the past 25 years.

As a matter of fact, it failed even to list it in the lower echelon rankings of French restaurants. What remains unclear is why.

Maxim's claimed that for years it had sought a special ranking above and beyond three stars, to note its classic cuisine and what it considers its preeminent place in the history of the culinary arts. Refused this special tribute, Maxim's says it sought excommunication last October by refusing to allow Michelin inspectors to carry out their usual appraisals. But reports in the French press say Maxim's feared the loss of one star, a fate that in the past has driven at least one restauranteur to suicide.

For its part, the red-backed guide put out by the Michelin Tire Company broke its traditional silence on its Holy Order to comment on what it called "L'Affaire Maxim's."

A spokesman acknowledged Maxim's had asked to be dropped from the list. The spokesman added: "We have no regrets."

The Michelin guide rated only 18 restaurants in all France worthy of three stars, replacing Maxim's this year with Paris' Archestrate.

In 1975, Les Princes Restaurant of the posh George the Fifth Hotel also sought excommunication, and Michelin dutifully obliged, adding the nasty twist of defrocking the hotel as well.

Maxim's was clearly jolted by Michelin's action, but did its best to maintain a stiff upper lip and claimed it wouldn't affect business. A Maxim's press agent sniffed: "Tourists make up only a small portion of our cleintele anyway."

Marshall Testifies For Full Employment Policy

Labor Secretary Marshall testified on Capitol Hill Tuesday in favor of a full employment policy. He contradicted critics of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill who argue that attempts to push unemployment down to four percent would lead to dangerous inflation.

Marshall testified before the Senate Employment Subcommittee. Meanwhile, a coalition of church, civil rights, labor, women's groups, business and community supporters of the bill held a news conference on Capitol Hill, and they called for passage of the bill.

Senator Muriel Humphrey, widow of the bill's original sponsor, said the measure would be an essential first step toward a new era of vigorous economic growth.

Women's Rights

We Ain't Seen Nothing Yet

By Nancy Powell

The belief that "women could never be in a better situation" than our present one, or indeed that the Woman's Liberation Movement has effected more than the most meager of social changes possible, is a deluded one. This optimistic perception arises out of the seeming actions taken by Congress to enact legislation ensuring the rights of women and other, true minorities. (Women constitute more than a majority of the U.S. population.)

These minimal and belated measures certainly do not mean that equal opportunity for women is a reality. Passing laws does not change the socialization process which we all undergo; it does not alter women's perceptions of themselves and their potential. Legally, we do not have the right to say what happens to our own bodies, and the current direction being taken by most legislative bodies, including Vermont's, continue to erode this basic right. The E.R.A., a prerequisite to even the idea of equality between men and women, has been shoved aside and all but forgotten in the past few years.

Contrary to what many would like to believe, it is still "rare when the salary of a female equals or exceeds her husband's." A U.S. Department of Commerce study shows that on the average, white men working full time in 1974 earned $12,104 while white women earned $6,823. The 1974 median income for women with 5 years or more of college was $11,790 – "almost $1000 less than that of men with no college education at all." (P. 38, Mother Jones, Nov. '77)

Only privileged middle and upper class women can afford to think in terms of a career. Most women still have traditional female-role jobs. All of us are socialized into accepting to one degree or another the reproductive mentality. Motherhood is the norm, not the exception or one of many alternatives. It is the expectation that we grow up with. You cannot endoctrinate a person with ideas of passivity and dependency and then, at age 21, tell her she is free to go out and do as she pleases.

Working mothers fight a battle in which the odds are all stacked against them. The obstacles of insufficient child care facilities, lack of pregnancy leave provisions, and the fact that her optimum years have been spent with young children are all but insurmountable. "A woman cannot even work unless she can also find a means to pay for the care of her children." Note, her children, though it takes two to make babies.

In subtle and not so subtle ways, all universities, corporate structures, even Congress itself discriminate against women. Members of Congress, a House Commission on Administrative Review showed, "pay their high-level male employees from 18% to 129% more than female employees with the same job titles." Although quota systems have been outlawed in universities, women are subject to greater scrutiny for admission in areas like medicine, law and engineering. There are few full women professors and few women administrators. Woman's studies courses, like those for ethnic minorities, are almost non-existent.

Women job applicants are judged by criteria different than those for men. A study by Cecil, Paul and Olins (1973) showed that personality/appearance are standards for judging women, while motivation/ability are applied to men. Women are viewed by many employers as being incapable of managerial positions, as being uncommitted to their work, and undependable for biological reasons.

From earliest childhood, women are inculcated with values that stress emotionality, low self-image and dependency on men. These values are contradictory to the intensely competitive American business ethic. If a woman "succeeds" she is labeled a "castrating bitch" or some such epithet; if she fails, well, what can you expect, she's just a woman.

I attribute the Phyllis Schaefly mentality to the larger reactionary movement which this country is experiencing, a post Vietnam/Watergate inflation-depression shellshock. Men who identify with and benefit from the status quo obviously will regard the women's movement with alarm, and rightly so. Things aren't fair now and there must be change.

And no one is as staunch a defender of the patriarchal values upon which American capitalism is based than the woman who has been, to use a bit of feminist jargon, "co-opted" into that system. It is true that many women do not want to climb off their pedestals of hallowed domesticity, seeing themselves secure in their dependency upon their husbands. In the event of divorce, however, they will find themselves left to their own resources, which will be minimal, because they have no marketable experiences and know themselves only in relation to their spouses. One out of 3-4 marriages today ends in divorce and the rate seems to be increasing.

As for the myth of the happy housewife, they work longer and harder than their husbands, and have only the single role of homemaker for gratification. A Chase Manhatten Bank survey "estimated that a woman's overall working week averaged 99.6 hours." (p. 102, Woman's Estate)

The societal inhibitions which make women believe that they cannot be good or great at tasks or in managing their own lives are completely engrained in us. The denial of our place in the working world serves to exclude us from having social or political influence. Women perceive themselves largely as the male-dominated media would have them do so, in terms that are relative to men.

It is a mistake to confuse the supposed "option" that women have to work or stay in the home with the reality of the situation. Actions performed without awareness or real alternatives do not constitute free choice. Women "naturally" become housewives and mothers because they have been prevented from seeing that they can be more. You can't miss what you never had. How many men wish they had been born female?

Taft-Hartley

Is It Really The Answer?

By Scott Sartorius

By invoking the Taft-Hartley Act, President Carter has taken action by choosing one from a less-than-attractive set of alternatives.

What happens to the coal strike, now in its fourth month, will be history – the Taft-Hartley Act has only had a spotty record in settling labor disputes, and it seems doubtful that 1978 will break from the tradition of Taft-Hartley's past performance.

Taft-Hartley has been used 34 times by presidents in its 31 year history, and Carter's action marks the fourth time it has been used against the United Mine Workers. The act is written to halt a strike or dispute that threatens to "imperil the national health or safety." The law contains an 80-day "no strike" cooling-off period during which time the president is authorized to appoint a board of inquiry to investigate the matter. The president is also authorized to seek a no strike injunction through the attorney general from a federal district court forbidding the initiation or continuation of work stoppage for those 80 days.

Carter, who has already appointed a three-man panel, expects to receive an initial report from them by the end of this week, and he has also taken steps to formally ask Attorney General Griffin Bell to seek the injunction to temporarily get the miners back to work.

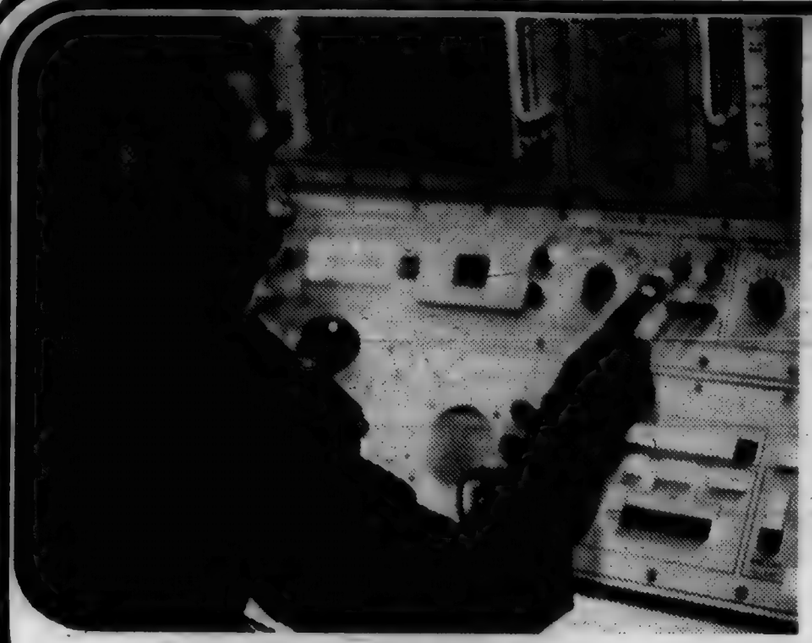
The 80-day period, which begins directly after the injunction is authorized, is divided into three segments. For the first 60 days, the board of inquiry re-convenes and federal mediators meet with industry and union officials to make efforts to settle the dispute. In the next 15 days, if the dispute is not yet settled, the National Labor Relations Board is required to hold a secret ballot of employees on the management's final offer. If the miners accept the offer, the strike is over; if not, the injunction continues. During the last five days, the administration asks the court for a dissolution of the injunction, and the president reports to Congress. Unless Congress acts, the strike is legally free to resume.

The problem that is going to arise should the injunction be granted, is that Arnold Miller, UMW president, predicts that only half of the 160,000 striking miners will comply with the order. Thus, there arises the possibility of a great deal of violence should the miners who don't return to work set up picket lines forcing the miners who do return to cross them. Pentagon sources have disclosed that federal troops are going to be used to deal with any civil disobedience "only as a very last resort."

Of the 34 times the Taft-Hartley law has been used, only 29 have had 80-day injunctions imposed, and in about half of those 29, the settlement had been reached before the 80 days were up. The rest were all settled later in one way or another.

The incentive for miners to go back to work is simply one of economics. An injunction of this sort ordinarily includes retro-active pay increases subject to the terms of the final contract. Thus, the miner who returns to work during the 80-day period is technically receiving the pay as would be set forth in the ultimate contract. In addition, it must be noted that even if the miners do get the pay raises they have been asking for, it will take an individual miner one and a half years to make up the money lost thus far in the 90-plus day old strike.

For the miners who refuse to comply with the injunction, they are subject to heavy fines, possible jail terms, and the loss of food stamps and welfare benefits.



Taft-Hartley went into effect in 1947 as a complex amendment to the Wagner Act of 1935. Taft-Hartley abolished the closed shop, under which workers had to belong to a union as a requisite for employment; it also prohibited jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts, and it set up a mechanism to deal with national emergency situations arising out of labor disputes.

The amendment's sponsors, Senator Robert Taft (R-Ohio) and Rep. Fred Hartley Jr. (R–N.J.), both republicans, saw the act as a measure to redress the balance of industrial power that had shifted to labor under the Wagner Act, which had established rules against unfair acts by employers. The law was subsequently passed during the republican 80th Congress over a Harry Truman veto.

Truman used Taft-Hartley two times in 1948 and once in 1950 against the UMW – but each time the miners ignored the injunctions and fact-finding recommendations.

For those persons who were relieved to hear Carter had finally taken action on the coal strike, he really had no other choice. And nevertheless, his action is not going to make negotiations any easier, and it is probably not going to make the situation in those affected coal consuming states any better. What Carter's action could do, however, is precipitate a rash of violent incidents between those miners who can afford to stay on strike and those who cannot.

By the end of this month, should the coal strike continue, more than 1 million layoffs will have to be made. And that is something to worry about.

AIR FORCE ROTC

Gateway to a great way of life.

WANT INSTANT RESPONSIBILITY?

Being a missile launch officer in the Air Force is an awesome responsibility. But it's an exciting job with leadership opportunity from the word "go".

Air Force ROTC can help you prepare for this exciting field by granting two, three or four-year scholarships. These will pay for tuition, books, and lab fees, and give you $100 a month for some of your other college expenses.

Then, if you can qualify for the missile field, you can work on an advanced degree through special graduate education programs, and the Air Force will help with the expenses.

If you're the type who's looking for an exciting future, a future of commitment and pride, look into this one. See if you qualify to be an Air Force missile launch officer. . . and help perpetuate the traditions that have made our country great.

Get the details right away. You'll be glad you did.

Graham is anxious to incorporate the new system into the bookstore in an effort to relieve the financial burden created by the staggering textbook prices. be the initial stage of a broader process of consumer acceptance and support for alternative energy systems.

The Vermont SunDay group, at present, is an informal coalition of individuals, business-people, students and consumers. Planning for SunDay is being coordinated between the five regions Vermont has been divided into. At this early stage, strong indications of support and planning are apparent in the Burlington area, Central Vermont and around the Brattleboro area. Individual support for SunDay and for alternative energy is somewhat randomly distributed throughout the state, and efforts are on-going to draw interested groups together to plan and participate within their particular regions.

Fred Smith, president of the Burlington Savings Bank, and William Franke, of Rutland, are co-chairmen of the SunDay Advisory committee for Vermont.

number of (Vermont) students enrolled."

The major difference between the existing law and the proposed is the seven year deadline.

According to a former medical student at UVM, the proposed law might have serious detrimental effects on enrollment at the medical school. She said that if the proposal were enacted, the "best students would opt to go elsewhere" and that it might force students to opt for higher paying specialties in order to pay their refund (in lieu of practicing in Vermont). She also questioned the moral justness of requiring medical students to refund the state for educational costs while other students aren't and said "public education is just that, publicly funded."

"I don't think the distribution (of doctors in Vermont) is that far out of line," said Dean William H. Luginbuhl, of the College of Medicine.

By a United States Public Health Service definition, only two counties are below the recommended level of 2.8 primary care physicians per 10,000 population. The numbers in Essex and Grand Isle are 1.5 and 2.5 respectively, per 10,000 population.

Because of the many factors involved in such a decision the Committee recommended that more study be conducted before a decision is made.

Carter Hosts College News Briefing

A Taste Of National Politics

By David C. Greeff

"On the highly debated issue of tuition tax credits, Berry said the Carter administration is adamantly opposed to them."

Two weeks ago, while unceremoniously muddling through the pile of typically mundane Cynic mail, I came across a letter from the White House. For Cynic correspondence such a notable return address is a rarity indeed, and accordingly I opened it with curious anticipation.

Actually expecting some kind of public relations form letter – something to the tune of a last ditch Carter plea for the Panama Canal – I was surprised to see an invitation to an "on the record briefing" with senior cabinet officials and the President, himself. The letter said that 200 campus newspaper editors from across the country had been invited and only immediate reply would guarantee a place. It further stated that full name and address must be included for Secret Service clearance.

After pondering only momentarily, I decided that given the fact that I hadn't visited Washington since the age of eight, and that I might have the opportunity for close contact with the President – admittedly token but somewhat exciting even if in an adolescent way – I decided to accept.

Scheduled to leave Thursday at 5:27 p.m. on Allegheny flight 226, at 3:00 p.m. that afternoon I discovered that I'd lost my wallet. For me this was more typical than not, but usually after minimal search, I find it. However, after more than an hour of futile effort trying to discover its whereabouts, I panicked at the possibility of not being able to go because of lack of ID. When I called the White House, the Secret Service was particularly unimpressed with the idea of letting me in on my word. Fortunately, I was able to muster up a temporary ID from Waterman which, I was told on the phone, would suffice.

Anyway, on Friday morning at 8:00, still recovering from the previous night's somewhat debauched and quite inebriated excursion to a Georgetown pub, I arrived at the seventeenth street entrance of the old executive office building. Met at the door by a host of security officers -way too many- for the task at hand – I showed my ID and passed without query.

Soon, after entering room 450, a semi-circular conference room filled to capacity with nearly 150 other college editors, the "briefing" soon commenced.

After a terse introduction from Patricia Baria, associate press secretary for media liaison, the first speaker Walt Wurfel, Carter's deputy press speaker, spoke for the better part of an hour. The subject of his talk was the White House

News Summary.

For those unfamiliar, the White House news summary, first introduced in the Johnson administration, is a daily, approximately ten page summary of all major events which occurred across the nation and the world prepared for the President. Blurbs range from one sentence to a paragraph – but seldom more than that – and are compiled from major newspapers and television broadcasts. Interestingly enough, at least five pages are devoted to excerpts of editorials from the various publications. Though put together assuming that the President reads nothing else, we were informed by Mr. Wurfel that Carter reads the Washington Post, the New York Times and catches the ABC evening news when time permits.

As with all the ensuing speakers, Mr. Wurfel, an eloquent and forceful orator, opened the floor to questions. When asked if the White House press team ever "tainted the news" Wurfel replied with a most emphatic denial. He continued however by saying that quite often, due to numerous reasons including the recently abused and ambiguous term "national security," press secretaries often are not at liberty to respond to reporters' questions. But when this does occur, he said, "We will always indicate that we can't say any more, rather than present a distorted or inaccurate report."

After only a short pause, the next speaker, Mary Frances Berry, assistant secretary for education at the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, came up to the podium. Berry, a young black woman, probably in her early thirties, impressed us all with not only her command of a broad spectrum of educational issues but also the facility with which she explained them in such a precise and lucid manner.

Essentially, her talk centered on the various aspects of Carter's recently announced $12.9 billion education program. This increase, the largest in nearly twelve years, represents a significant rise in the amount of money allocated for education, reflecting a Carter campaign promise to improve educational opportunity in the United States.

More specifically, she spoke of an increase in student aid of $1.4 billion, $1.2 billion of which would be received by middle income families. She stated that "rising costs are making college intolerably expensive for the lower and middle income family." Berry said the eligibility levels were raised from families with a high of $18,000 income to those with up to $25,000. Some loans would also be available to families with incomes greater than $25,000 who had, what she called, "temporary liquidity problems."

When asked how this aid would be distributed, Berry stated, "The main emphasis of our policy is to give aid directly to students and not to institutions." She clarified this by saying that some institutions would receive assistance, but "this aid would be primarily to prevent the upward spiral in tuition costs."

On the highly debated issue of tuition tax credits, Berry said the Carter administration is adamantly opposed to them. The main reasons cited for this were: (1) credits would go to everybody including those who don't need them; (2) credits come at the end of the year, not the beginning; (3) they are prohibitively expensive; (4) they are part of tax costs, not education costs; and (5) they would distort the student aid program.

Berry was followed by Dave Rubenstein, deputy assistant to the President for domestic affairs. Rubenstein, a young appointee, was considerably less impressive in articulating the President's views than Miss Berry had been. It was obvious, as he himself admitted, in a somewhat humorous way, that he was rewarded with his job because he rode on the Carter bandwagon early rather than because of his expertise in domestic affairs. Regardless, he did have some interesting things to say in what ended up as a brief summary of the Carter administration's first year.

Elaborating on the administration's major accomplishments, Rubenstein said, "We have changed the people's belief that their Government is reluctant to tackle tough problems." He cited Carter's immediate delving into the complex issues of energy and social security in support of his contentions.

Additional achievements mentioned by Rubenstein were the human rights campaign, the increasing number of blacks and other minorities in high government positions, the pardon for draft dodgers, the decrease in unemployment, and Carter's initiation of open decision making.

On the negative side, he said, "Our biggest failure has been not doing a good job selling to the public what we were

American Dietary Habits

By Peter Millard

The quality of the American diet has been the subject of incredible controversy in the past decade. So bitter has been the disagreement among critics of our dietary habits and apologists for the status quo that it appears as though nutrition has more to do with politics than science. And indeed, I think that there are so many economic interests involved in nutritional study that it loses much of its scientific validity.

A case in point is the disagreement over what levels of [illegible] serve the general populace. The majority of nutritionists feel that we consume [illegible] and that several of the [illegible] may be related to [illegible]

In recent years, he has testified at Food and Drug Administration hearings on behalf of Kellogg, Nabisco, the Sugar Association, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, and several other food industry giants.

Dr. Jean Mayer, another famous Harvard nutritionist, has been on the board of directors of Monsanto Corp. (which manufactures food industry chemicals) and is presently on the board of directors of Miles Laboratories.

The scientific literature concerning nutrition is also largely supported by food corporations. Take the Journal of Nutrition, for example, which is one of the most quoted journals in this country. Its list of financial supporters reads like a compendium of the largest food and drug companies in the world: the Coca-Cola Co, Nestle, Pillsbury, Procter and Gamble, and Wyeth Laboratories, to name a few. It is a conservative journal and does not publish many studies critical of the harmful effects of food refining and additives. trying to do." In his view, if the administration had more completely informed the people of its priorities such as energy, the passage of the bill would have been facilitated. Rubenstein made it quite clear that the administration did not make the same mistake on the Panama Canal.

He went on to list what the administration considered their highest priorities for the year. In the following order they are: (1) passage of an energy bill; (2) ratification of the Panama Canal treaties; (3) tax reform; (4) inflation; (5) Civil Service reform; (6) urban policy; (7) national health insurance; and (8) welfare reform.

After Rubenstein concluded, the session broke for a much desired stretching period. Here I had my only brief opportunity to talk with other editors from around the country. I was somewhat relieved to find out that many of our woes such as lack of credit, funds and space are shared by others throughout the country. I was hoping to get a chance to "talk shop," and possibly pick up a few ideas, but it seemed I was the only one who brought an issue of his school's publication, Anyway, the conversation was soon cut off as we returned to room 450 to hear the final speakers before the President.

We next heard Jill Schuker, special assistant to the assistant secretary for public affairs in the Department of State. She spoke for half an hour attempting to gain the enlistment of our support for the Panama Canal treaty. Her arguments were neither novel nor enlightening, but she answered questions knowledgeably and I generally felt her talk enhanced my grasp of the subject.

At this point it was nearly 11 a.m. with the President scheduled to speak at 11:30. Accordingly, we were asked to leave the room and bring all our materials with us so the Secret Service could ensure the room's safety before the President arrived. We departed in single file and waited patiently while security checked each student — some more thoroughly than others. When I went through and simply had my manilla folder brushed through in a haphazard fashion, I was a little disappointed at the Secret Service's lack of efficiency. For I quite frankly believe I could have shot the President without difficulty. Admittedly, I would have had to sacrifice my own freedom in doing so, but nonetheless I could have done it.

On returning once again we were greeted with the feisty personality of Midge Costanza, assistant to the president for public liaison. She spoke for a few minutes cracking a few jokes on such subjects as how the President was always rudely interrupting her when she was trying to give a serious speech. But finally once again she was interrupted, and with no formal introduction, President Carter strolled into the room. Everybody immediately rose to their feet and offered ovation to our nation's leader.

The President was indeed a tired looking man. Signs of fatigue, weakness and general lassitude which inevitably envelops all those who occupy the Oval Office, were clearly manifested on the President's face. He simply looked as though he wanted a good eight hour's sleep — an experience which a president rarely appreciates. This was a marked contrast to the vibrant and healthy looking peanut farmer who was such a short time ago campaigning for an office that even his most intimate advisers believed it unlikely that he'd ever be elected to.

Aside from the customary White House photographers and various network TV cameramen, the President was barraged with the simultaneous clicking of cameras as nearly every student — this one excepted — had brought a camera. The noise prompted the President's opening remark: "I am very happy to be here. It's not often that I get to attend photography conventions."

The floor was then open to questions. You have never seen such a screaming bunch of obnoxious people in your life. My first impression was one of disgust, but I soon realized that the only way you'll ever get the opportunity to ask a question is to yell louder than the person next to you. There was no doubt about the fact that I wanted to ask a question. I didn't have an original one prepared, and after letting three questions go by, I decided to go with a standby about the recent decline of the dollar overseas to a record low.

Determined to get my opportunity to speak, I stood on the edge of my seat — luckily I was in the second row — to anticipate the president's last words to the previous question so I could stand and yell "Mr. President!" before anybody else did.

I guess I was just lucky because on the next question, he acknowledged me. Carter was obviously well prepared to answer any questions concerning our deflated currency and did so with ease aiming most of his response directly at me. He explained the Arabs had a $60 billion trade surplus and that while the United States was willing to bear its share of the burden, countries such as West Germany and Japan insisted on vying for surpluses of their own. He further cited America's higher growth rate as compared to other western nations as reasons for the currency decline. I was quite satisfied and indeed learned a great deal from his response.

Other questions ran the gamut from the intricacies of the Salt negotiations to whether Carter intended to run for re-election. In response to the latter, he said that he couldn't possibly predict so far ahead. The questions on the whole were intelligently put and covered a wide variety of topics — incidentally unlike those that UVM students ask of guest speakers.

Soon time grew short and Carter announced that he had another appointment but wished to make a brief concluding statement. It was here that he was most impressive — where one can become captivated by the air of at least apparent sincerity he exuded in his voice when he talked about the future of America and our part in it. He said:

"In the last thirteen months during my presidency I have never answered such a wide range of questions placed before me in such an intelligent manner. You are all lucky to have the opportunity to be in college, to be here, to ask these questions.

"When the time comes that you have entered the labor force as working Americans — your freedom of action will be constrained because you won't want to alienate your position . But I sincerely hope that you will never relinquish your right for independent analysis and deep inquisitiveness when public officials don't live up to your standards. We hope you won't lose faith.

"When I ran for president I felt there was a sense of alienation and distrust in the people about the government because of Watergate and Vietnam. Help me now be an expression of what this country stands for, and whether it be peace or human rights your voice must be strong and influential."

The President walked out as once again the audience rose to their feet in respect.

A few minutes later, brooding over a beer and lunch in a downtown restaurant, I was contemplating whether my trip was worth it. The answer was quite emphatically, yes. I learned a great deal more about the man running our country, and as a result felt considerably more at ease knowing he was at the helm. Moreover, I became more familiar with the goals and priorities he had set for our country at such a critical time. Regardless of whether he achieves any of those goals, I was convinced that this man will try his damnedest.

After spending a cold weekend in Washington I returned to Burlington on Sunday afternoon. The only bummer about the weekend was that I never found my wallet.

I sincerely hope that you will never relinquish your right for independent analysis and deep inquisitiveness where public officials don't live up to your standards.

Voluntary Simplicity

Outwardly Simple and Inwardly Rich

By Alan Marshall

Voluntary Simplicity!
It's that basic philosophy that every city escaping liberal and rural-oriented crowd-hater employs and propels themselves with, usually in a less than conscious effort.

It contains a touch of Thoreau, Bhuddism, and an attitude that 'Small is Beautiful.'

It is simple living – a way of life carried on in one extreme or another by many UVM students.

********

The essence of Voluntary Simplicity is living in a way that is outwardly simple and inwardly rich. The central values to VS have been hailed by everyone from Jesus and Bhuddha to the recent parade of radical living tyrants. Yet the heart of these values have slipped the practice of just as many. There are five central values:

Material Simplicity – is a non-consumerist life-style based upon being and becoming, not having. Self-reliance and involvement rather than dependence and passivity mark out the individual.

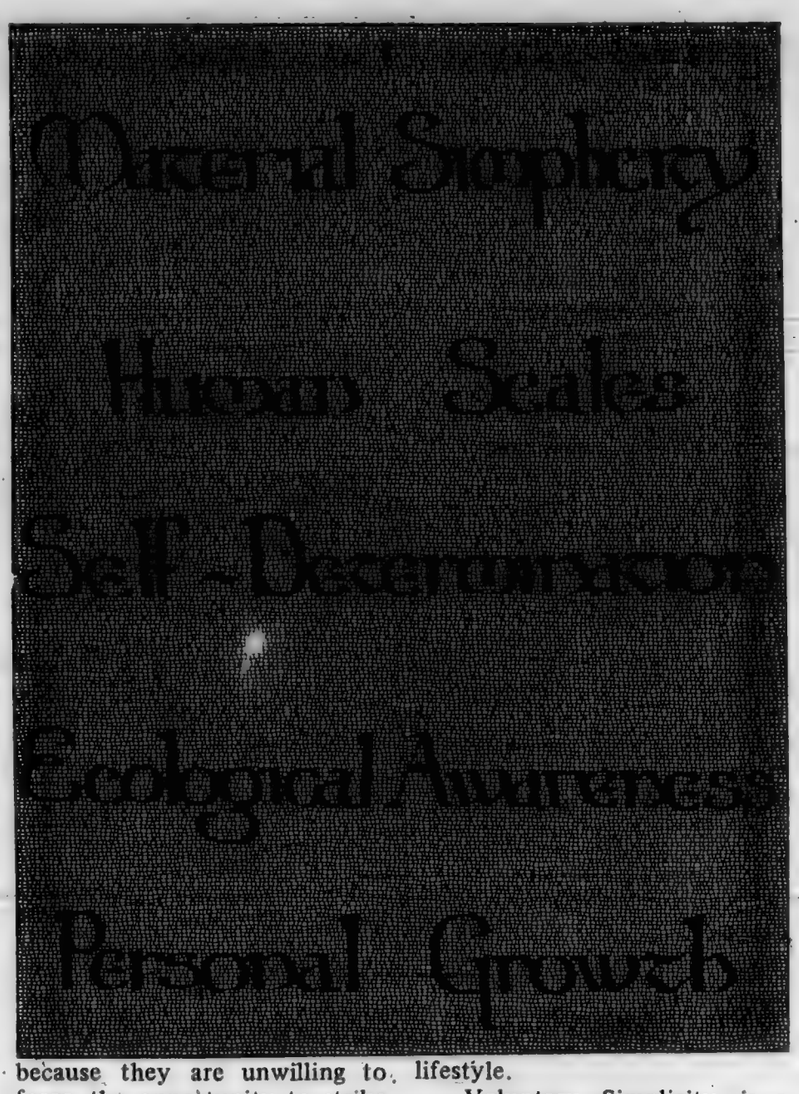
Human Scales – is a preference for human-sized living and working environments. Shared responsibilities and rewards for each individual are essential as opposed to large industrial mass production without regard to the workers.

Self-Determination – is a high sense of personal destiny, assuming greater control over one's life, and not leading a life of installment payments and expectations of others.

Ecological Awareness – prompts the fact that our resources are limited, and continual usage without replacement can lead us to disaster. The reduction of pollution and maintenance of beauty are musts!

Personal Growth – to eliminate addictions and the external clutter that prohibits us from psychologically and spiritually seeking enlightenment and happiness.

********



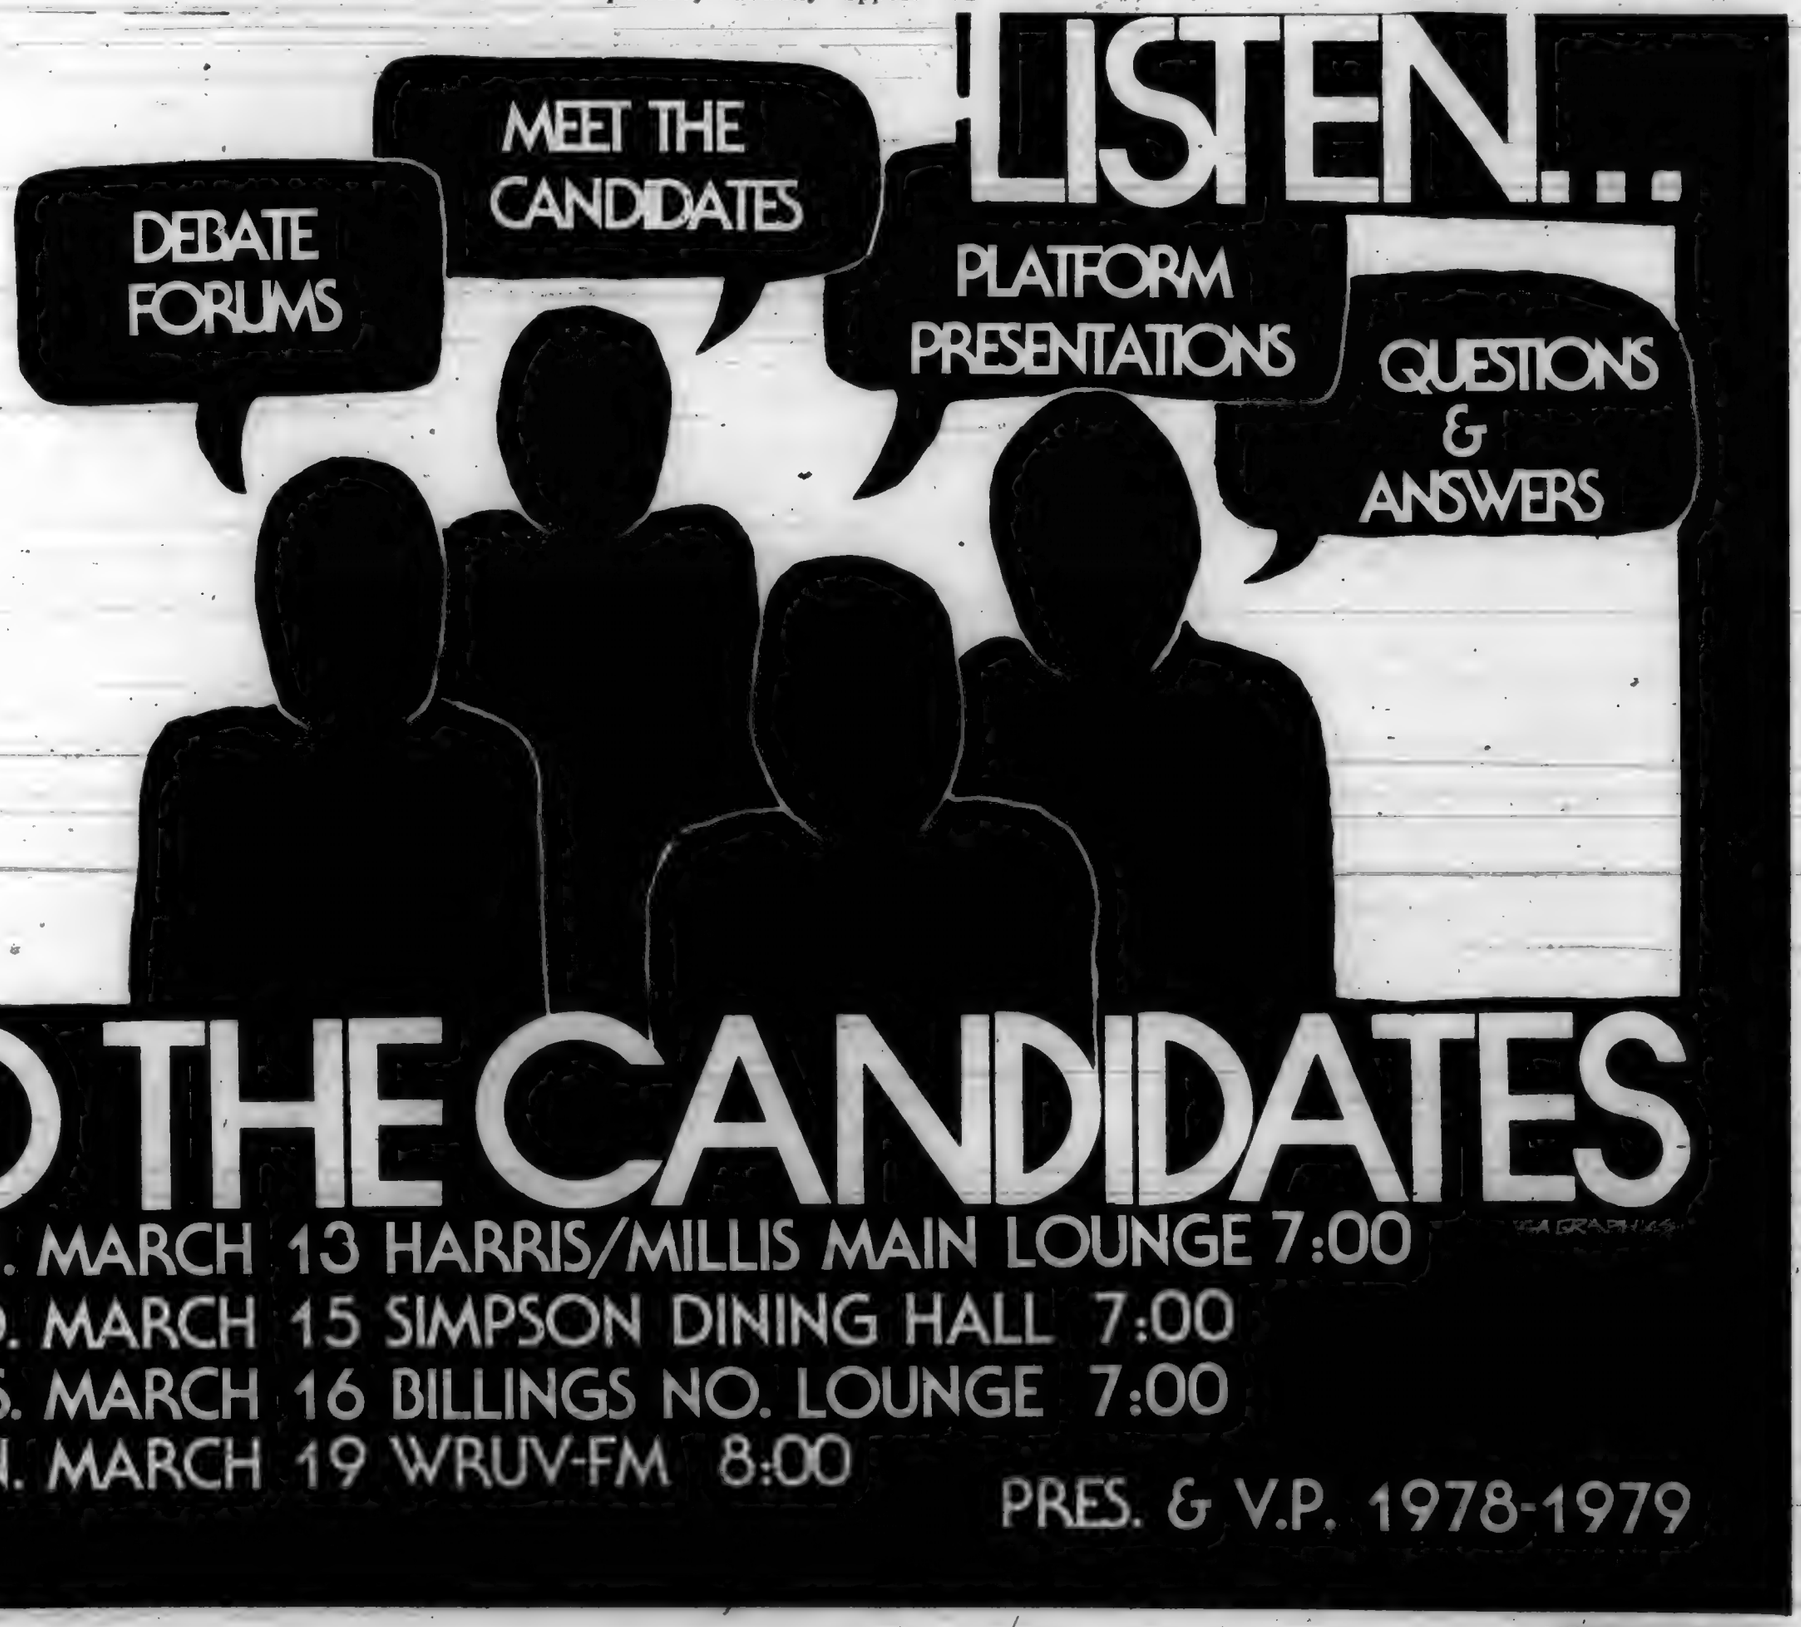
Proponents of this way of life in any form are countless: Ghandi and diehard 60's cults are prime examples. Communes abound, and families motivated by the 'new' American Dream – to escape the rat race – have dotted the country in the last 15 years.

Voluntary Simplicity is not limited to the unsuccessful. Many young single upwardly mobile people with strong educations are actively pursuing this mode of life. It is, as many contracts say, 'without regard to creed, color...'

Yet disillusionment remains in many people's minds as to the nature of this simple living. It is an attempt to ride away from the plastic life, often coming from job-boredom.

VS is not limited to countryside confines. City dwellers and urbanites are not excluded as a matter of their residence, because each person picks his own level of simple lifestyle. Nor is it a back to nature movement or a contemporary trend. Henry David Thoreau in his two year visit to Walden Pond has become infamous because of his common lifestyle and writings that evolved from it. Thoreau said, "I am convinced, both by faith and experience, that to maintain one's self on this earth is not a hardship but a pastime, if we live simply and wisely."

This simplicity does not mean living in poverty either. Poverty implies struggle. VS implies limiting desires of material nature. People in poverty usually oppose VS because they are unwilling to forgo the opportunity to strike it rich. Goal-oriented capitalists see it as a threat to their well-being.



The essential concept behind this philosophy might be easily expressed as a sense of urgency and social responsibility felt by many bewildered citizens distraught with 'modern economic growth' and 'progress' that continually threatens the environment and their own lifestyle.

Voluntary Simplicity is a lifestyle with positive social benefits and not to be confused with a fad or hippie retreat. It is simply self-determination.

The original printing of an article on Voluntary Simplicity – Simple Living – is by Richard Gregg in 1936, which was reprinted in the Summer '77 edition of Co-Evolution Quarterly.

Lake Champlain Island's Trust

Protecting The Grand Isles

By Curtis Haynes

Still on the drawing board but moving into action is a novel plan to protect Lake Champlain's Islands and shoreline from the threat of development. The "Lake Champlain Islands Trust" is the brainchild of Darby Bradley, Staff Attorney for the Vermont Natural Resources Council, in response to the need to protect the islands, as pointed out by the Audubon Society.

Though few exist, land trusts are not new to Vermont. In the spring of 1977, Bradley was instrumental in setting up the Ottauquechee Regional Land Trust in the Woodstock area. This trust, which laid the guidelines for the Islands Trust, was formed to acquire conservation restrictions or open space easements in land. A conservation restriction or easement leaves the land title and responsibility for management in the owner's hands, but restricts his uses of the land. In essence, the landowner gives up the right to develop it. The Ottauquechee Trust was granted tax-exempt status so that contributions of land or conservation restrictions are deductible for income tax purposes. In addition, for land under restrictions, the property taxes are assessed according to the use value of the land, not the usual (and higher) fair market value. Thus the trust offers considerable economic incentives and relief for landowners who feel development pressure. Since a landowner's participation in a trust is voluntary, it would complement existing regulatory approaches, such as local zoning or Act 250 — Vermont's Land Use and Development Law.

The Islands Trust is a unique innovation in land-use planning. It lets the island owner take an active part in the island's preservation effort, rather than be subjected to it. In fact, a main goal of the Islands Trust is to educate island owners how to be good stewards of their island's resources.

Protecting the Lake Islands present some special problems, particularly in that they are critically important to the bird populations (black crown night herons, common terns, black duck, etc.) as nesting habitat. The difficulty with these critical nesting areas is in preventing people from visiting the islands at nesting time in the late spring. Most islands have shallow soils which are not suitable for development. Moreover, fragile soils must be protected, as they support the vegetation needed for nesting cover. The aesthetic significance of islands is further linked to vegetation maintenance and non-development.

In 1788, all the islands in the Lake were granted to James Whitelaw as a reward for surveying several Vermont towns. The 71 islands in Vermont and New York cover 3,400 acres and ¼ of the islands are publicly owned. The islands vary greatly in size, accessibility, and fair market value. For the most part, the islands are undeveloped. One notable exception is Butler Island near St. Albans which has 35 houses and may soon be subdivided into 39 additional building lots. Prices for islands have skyrocketed. For example, 85-acre Stave Island is on the block at $295,000. As a result, a main problem in setting up the Trust is determining what is fair compensation for conservation restrictions.

Without a doubt, pressures for more public access to the Lake, and for second homes on islands are growing. No island is further than 2 miles from shore, and none is further than 5 miles from a marina. Even the most remote islands are visited several times each season for picnicking, swimming, exploration or camping, and vandalism is not uncommon. The islands have great appeal because of their sense of isolation and wildness. But the level of activity on the islands is worrying environmentalists.

The Islands Trust will seek to protect strategic islands and stretches of shoreline. More public acquisition may be necessary. Fred Dunnington, a '77 UVM graduate and author of the Champlain Islands Study, mentioned Juniper Island off Burlington harbor as key. In December, Dunnington persuaded the Burlington Waterfront Board to look into the possibility of purchasing the island as a recreation site.

Not long ago, the University of Vermont purchased the Four Brothers Islands from John Jacob Astor III with the understanding that the islands would remain a natural area, and be used only for educational and scientific purposes. The Four Brothers provide nesting grounds for a wide variety of birds — some of which are known to nest virtually nowhere else in the region. The University strongly discourages visits to the islands during the nesting season. The Four Brothers are tax-exempt as part of an educational institution. Nonetheless, according to Mark Lapping, acting director of the Environmental Program, UVM spends money every year to try to keep the islands pristine.

Death

The Ultimate Trip

By Susan Heller

"I went from a place of total darkness to a place of pure light, pure emotion, pure thought. I went through to the light and I felt pure bliss. It was the most beautiful, emotional loving experience I've ever been through. I felt like I was being greeted in total love and total acceptance."

That's how Leslie Davison described her encounter with death at a Parapsychology meeting on Monday.

For those who have wondered about death, those who anticipate life after death, and those who believe that death is final, Ms. Davison's experience will seem incredible.

She and her husband went to California for a brief visit and although Ms. Davison had a premonition that something would happen that would change her life, things were fine. On the tenth day, however, she was involved in a serious car accident which was followed by eight hours of surgery to repair a punctured lung and eight broken ribs. It was at this time that Ms. Davison claims her heart stopped for three minutes, during which she realized "I have no fear of death."

When she went to this place of pure light, she described three spirits dressed in translucent white gowns. They were her grandmother, her aunt, and a man she later determined was Jesus. These spirits then asked, "Are you ready to come with us, you have the choice." Remembering her husband and children; Ms. Davison told the spirits she was not yet ready.

As soon as Ms. Davison made that decision she recalls taking a deep breath and being thurust into pain and anguish.

As Ms. Davison recovered from her injuries, she said; "I had to put together my body and had to put together life because I had no fear of death." She explained how this experience changed her life when she said, "I know if I wasn't afraid to die, I won't be afraid to live either."

Some might wonder why Ms. Davison isn't anticipating death or even dying if it is such a pleasant experience, but she says that she is responsible and committed to her body because "we put our bodies through so much."

Through her three minutes in the world of the dead Ms. Davison made many realizations. She discovered, "We're here for a reason, we will know why on the day we die." She also reassured the attentive group who listened to her that God is not a judgmental figure, we judge ourselves."

Ms. Davison's partner is Bobby Green, "Bobby has worked out his fear about death without having to go through the experience I went through."

Ms. Davison is planning to dedicate her life to dealing with death and dying. She considers Elizabeth Kubler-Roos, who has done amazing work dealing with terminally ill patients, a saint. On the other hand, she does not like hospitals because, "The doctors get too caught up in healing and if you die it's their failure. I don't feel it's a failure to die – it's just a passing on."

"We're here for a reason . we will know why on the day we die."

Ms. Davison and several members of the group went on to discuss psychic and outerbody experiences. She tells of an outerbody experience which occurred after her accident. "I saw this person lying there on the ambulance. They kept putting something over her mouth so she couldn't breathe, then I realized it was me."

Death – it is reassuring to believe one is emotionally aware and experiences no pain hereafter, but it is a belief that each individual must determine. Ms. Davison ponders, "You wonder who's going to die next in your family."

Death is a subject that no one likes to think about, but it is fascinating and frightening to hear about death from someone who has died and returned to tell her feelings to the living.

Urban Youth Center

Read All About It

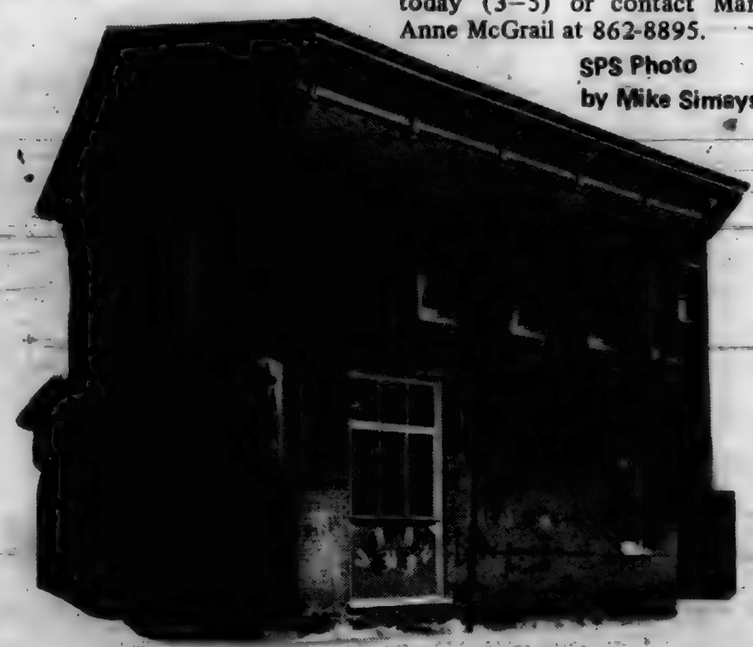
By Peter O. Hewitt

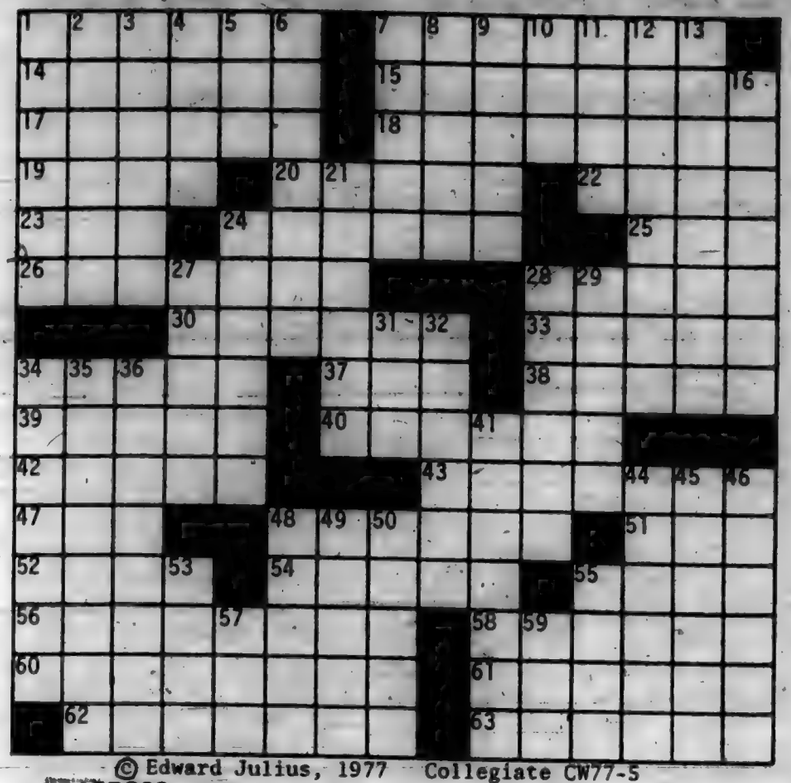
In 1976, the Urban Youth Center (UYC) was founded by the University of Vermont Extension Service in response to pre-existing conditions in the North end of town. This area contains the highest concentration of poor people in the entire state of Vermont, where the median family income slips to $5,775 annually. Forty-two percent of the population is under the age of twenty-four and youths in the area are often the objects of juvenile complaint.



For ten years, the UYC has operated as a drop-in Youth Center for kids from ages five to eighteen; and every year 180 kids 'hang out.' One of the primary goals of the organization and its director, Mary Anne McGraill, is to provide an educational and recreational environment where the kids can develop a sense of community responsibility. Also through informal counseling procedures, an attempt can be made to integrate the kids with the community. It is a place where the kids can go and be themselves. Many of today's youth feel trapped. A lot of kids need some sort of attention, as well as answers to their many questions. In many cases, they have no one to turn to. They have no one to take them out of the dilapidated environment that constantly surrounds them. The UYC is the filler for that missing void in their lives.

For the past two years, the UYC has been funded by a Community Development Block grant through the City of Burlington. That supply has nearly been depleted.

The efficient functioning of the UYC has been made all the more difficult by this financial crunch. The present building that houses the UYC also has no heat due to the furnace cracking during a recent cold wave. Regardless, the landlord has sold the property to another buyer who plans to turn the building into office use.



Consequently, not only does the UYC need a new location but they also must dig up funding sources to procure financial stability. Several work-study slots are open to students at UVM and positions to work for course credit. With the present skeleton-crew they are trying to make ends meet. They are determined not to let a necessary and useful organization that has been around for ten years fold up. So, come on, all you potential social workers out there looking for a very worthwhile experience. The UYC could use your help. Call the UYC at 656-2062 or drop by today (3–5) or contact Mary Anne McGrail at 862-8895.

The Urban Youth Center has lost their building pictured above on the corner of North Street and N. Winooski Ave. Mary Anne McGrail, the Center's director, expressed that they do have some funds and are in the process of searching for a new place to rent. "In that same area there are very few available places that are suitable though." Until a new location is definite the UYC is merely a name of a beneficial social organization that could be helping the youths of this community.

The Black Hole Dilemma

By Vaune Davis

"The noted psychologist, Norman Gronscowitz, theorizes that black holes in space are the ideal place for incurable paranoids."

Far, far out in the unspoiled wilderness of the universe lie as yet unfilled areas known as black holes in space. Essentially, nothing exists in them – no air, no water – but the shriveled corpses of collapsed stars.

Previously of interest only to the writers for Star Trek and thesis-scrounging physics students, black holes have recently been brought to public attention by politicians, sociologists, environmental experts and American Legionnaires. A massive publicity campaign is now underway. Flyers, television and radio announcements and various other propaganda are being prepared for release this spring. Even a bumper sticker, bearing the slogan "Support Your Local Black Hole," has been designed.

But why has all this nothingness suddenly been brought to public attention? Raymond T. Burfid, chairman of the Congressional Sub-Committee on Black Holes, feels that black holes may well be the answer to many of the problems plaguing the United States today. "As the population is continually multiplying," Burfid stated, "space, not oil or grain as one would think, is becoming our most valuable resource."

Environmental researchers have been investigating the potentialities of black holes. The National Council on Water Pollution Control has set a team of three astronomers and one mathematician to calculating the capacity of Subtericulimex, the closest black hole. The council hopes to begin transporting sludge and sewage from the entire eastern seaboard by next fall. The possibility of storing oil in black holes is also being investigated. This, experts feel, would reduce the chances of oil slicks which deface our beaches and destroy fish and marine wildlife.

Population experts have also developed several ideas for the black holes in space. A bill is currently being lobbied before Congress that requires that the third child of every couple be transported to a black hole. Upper caste members in India have also jumped on the bandwagon and are attempting to transport the untouchables to the black hole Ixteriped. Geologists are in the process of coordinating a project that will alleviate the famine that debilitates Northern Africa by transporting almost one half of the Sahara Desert to Subtericulimex.

Black holes are even being studied by sociologists, who believe that they might be the place to incarcerate all incurable, pathological criminals. Opponents of the death penalty feel that this might be a viable alternative. The noted psychologist, Norman Gronscowitz, theorizes that black holes in space are the ideal place for incurable paranoids. It appears that this hypothesis is not entirely without merit either, as one famous recluse recently contributed 1.5 million dollars to the Black Hole Research Foundation.

Despite the fact that black holes could certainly be the answer to many of the world's problems, there are many serious diplomatic entanglements that must be cleared up. Already, a claims dispute over the black holes has commenced between the United States and the Soviet Union. The United Nations is up in arms over mainland China's plan to plant missiles in Ixteriped. And the situation in the Middle East is now even worse because as Isralis are enraged over the Arab's suggestion that the black hole Musfermytaol might indeed be the promised land.

Nevertheless, the most difficult problem still remains unsolved – after all the black holes are filled, what next?

Listen To "The Spoken Word"

By Chris Yandow

ESSAY

"We tend to move directly from the intellectual to the problematic and hurdle all the emotions in between."

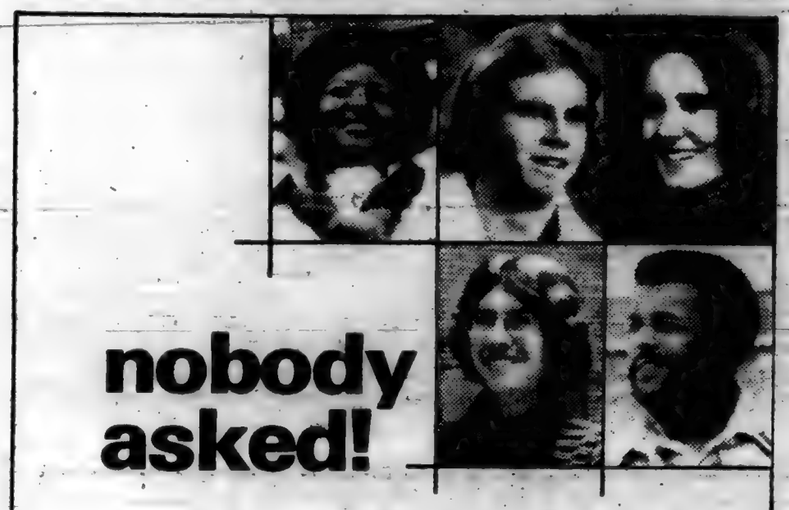
The valuable use of verba interaction as a means of revealing emotion is neglected and to a great extent avoided. Individuals seek alternative ways to express their inner needs and emotions, all of which are indirect and unfulfilling methods when used as communicative tools. Communication is one of man's most prevalent needs.

As a communicative tool, verbal interaction is unsurpassed. We must learn to use this tool to reveal our emotions to others effectively. It's time for us to look each other straight in the eyes and say: "This is how I feel." We've all got a way with words and we need to recognize it and put it to use.



There is an obvious demand for interaction. We are continually searching for new outlets and discarding the old ones because they've proved themselves inadequate. If we would only use the ones we have, undoubtedly the most direct and fulfilling outlet imaginable, speech – surely ultimate satisfaction could be attained if we dared to take such a risk.

With spoken words we are present at the moment of revelation, whereas, in contrast, the art forms do the talking. What's the difference? We are there to clarify possible misinterpretations of meaning or intended expression. It allows us to observe the impact that our disclosure has on the individual who is receiving it. Spoken words are directly reinforced by the beautiful art of gesticulation. Furthermore, oral communication is spontaneous. We take little time to qualify or adjust to our feelings, thus our reactions tend to come from the 'gut' provided we are being honest with ourselves.

The levels of verbal communication that exist can be separated into three basic categories. On the left hand side of the continuum are the intellectual and eventual or superficial types of talk. Intellectual types of interaction would involve discussing topics such as politics and science; eventful conversations would include oration about a day at the ball park or a wrap about the weather. In the center of the continuum are emotions or feelings. Love, friendship, touch, commitment, honesty, compassion, trust, fear, risk, anger, and a host of others comprise this area of discussion. On the right hand side are conversations based on personal problems. The loss of a boyfriend or girlfriend would be one of the more common subjects that falls into this category.

The center of this continuum is avoided too often. We tend to move directly from the intellectual to the problematic and hurdle all the emotions inbetween. Can't we, and don't we express emotions through our words, regardless of how hard we try to suppress them in the presence of another human being? The way we describe an event, for example, surely indicates to some degree how we feel about it. We should allow ourselves to go ahead beyond pure description and confront our feelings directly in a verbal way. If this were accomplished, much of the right hand side of the continuum – conversation based on personal problems – would be avoided; and awareness of our own feelings in relation to our environment would enable us to react and behave more efficiently.

SILENCE IS DEADLY.

When someone drinks too much and then drives, it's the silence that kills. Your silence.

It kills your friends, your relatives, and people you don't even know. But they're all people you could save.

If you knew what to say, maybe you'd be less quiet. Maybe fewer people would die.

What you should say is, "I'll drive you home." Or, "Let me call a cab." Or, "Sleep on my couch tonight."

Don't hesitate because your friend may have been drinking only beer. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't think that black coffee will make him sober. Black coffee never made anyone sober. Maybe it would keep him awake long enough to have an accident. But that's about all.

The best way to prevent a drunk from becoming a dead drunk is to stop him from driving.

Speak up. Don't let silence be the last sound he hears.

A Welcome Set-Back To The Williston Mall

The people of Williston have spoken – they do not want the Pyramid Mall. This past Tuesday, Williston voters chose three anti-mall selectmen to be seated on the town's board over three pro-mall candidates. This decision, in effect, nullifies a town referendum held last September when voters decided to end opposition to the project.

The fact that Tuesday's town meeting day brought more voters to the polls than ever before on the mall issue indicates that no matter how fickle Williston has been in the past, the final tally is in. The board of selectmen now has a 4-1 anti-mall majority, and there is absolutely no doubt at all that the District Environmental Commission will rightly take this fact into consideration when deciding whether or not to grant an Act 250 land-use permit to Pyramid.

The three new anti-mall selectmen are incumbents Dick Bell and Peter McDevitt and board newcomer Douglas Lawson. Bell defeated George Baron, an ardent pro-mall spokesman, and McDevitt and Lawson defeated Herbert Goodrich and Carl Urie.

Bell said after the voting that Pyramid has nowbeen given a message "that they are not terribly welcome here," and McDevitt added that "people felt Pyramid was trying to buy the election." Both McDevitt and Bell said there was a strong possibility that Pyramid had been involved in creating three "slick" brochures for the pro-mall candidates.

While it is not assured that the Pyramid Mall will not be built because of Tuesday's voting, this New York based mall construction company has yet one more hurdle to surmount. But it seems that the obstacles for Pyramid are getting to the point where the mall, which once seemed to be a sure thing, may now become a distant nightmare.

For Decriminalization Of Marijuana

Currently a bill to decriminalize the penalty for small amounts of marijuana is being debated in the state house of representatives. The proposed legislation would reduce the fine for possession of less than one ounce of marijuana from $500 to $100.

Representative J. Daniel Mahoney, one of the co-sponsors of the new bill, put it well when he said the present penalty "far outweighs" the crime of possession and "every year thousands of lives are scarred and millions of dollars are wasted on law enforcement resources while detracting from the prosecution of serious crime."

In fact, we agree with Lt. Governor T. Garry Buckley, who feels the fine ought to be $5 instead of the proposed $100.

So far no private or public studies have come up with conclusive evidence indicating any long-term negative effects of the drug. With this in mind, unquestionably an unfair double standard exists between pot and alcohol, a drug which has more than documented its harmful effects to society.

Vermont is not setting a precedent with this new bill but rather following suit. California, Alaska, and other states have already passed de-criminalization legislation.

Complete legalization would be the most desired action, but this must be debated first on the national level. Until then, however, the Vermont legislature would be wise to enact the current proposal as the only feasible alternative to the presently unfair system.

Today, Equality...

To the Editor:

In his article "Either She Wins or She Wins," Luke Albee has presented the female undergraduate as a self-interested individual. Albee may very well be accurate in this assertion. In today's highly competitive society, success depends on self-interests.

For years, females have done nothing but cater to the male and his ego, regardless of the consequences. Often she sacrificed her own pride for the sake of her self-interested male counterpart. The male and his ego would never submit to the female for help in the financial support of the household. As Albee states, "Until quite recently the job of women in American society was to concentrate on domestic problems and raise children." Equal educational opportunities were unprecedented and, quite often, brilliant women held "unrewarding, menial positions with little consideration given to their prior intellectual accomplishments." After a history of neglect, it certainly is time for the female to conquer the male ego and to obtain her own "self-interests."

Albee fails to recognize that, male or female, we are all human beings. We all have individual needs and goals which we struggle to fulfill. In reference to the female undergraduate, Albee carelessly states, "Always in the back of her mind is the belief that if she does not succeed in her specific field of endeavor, she will still be able to find a husband who will support her." This is certainly an unjust stereotype, especially when one considers the time and money which the female invests into her undergraduate studies alone. Most females simply do not sacrifice over twenty-thousand-dollars into their career plans only to be supported for the rest of their lives by their mates. Some girls may use marriage as a last resort, but they are certainly a minority.

self-interested female in America was long overdue. The capabilities of the female are only beginning to be realized. Today the female strives for equality; tomorrow... superiority!!!

After The Fact, Where??

To the Editor:

As a recent rape victim, I was advised by the Burlington Police Department to seek counseling from the UVM Crisis Center. They informed me that there was a woman at the Center who dealt principally with rape cases.

In need of help to deal with my trauma, I called the Crisis Center. The phone was answered by a woman who, when I told her I wanted to speak with someone who dealt with rape victims, demanded to know "What? Who is this anyway?" I told her my name, that I had been raped, and I needed to talk with someone about it. She then nonchalantly told me just to come down to the Center and that "yea, someone around here will speak with you." As though my problem was nothing more than a common cold.

As a result of my conversation with this woman at the Center, I was so put off that, at great personal expense, I sought help from a private psychiatrist in town. I was financially able to seek help elsewhere. Another rape victim might not be so fortunate and such contact as I experienced with the Crisis Center could well be more harmful than helpful.

If the Crisis Center is supposed to be dealing with serious problems as its name implies, then I believe when one contacts the Center in need of help, a helping hand should be extended immediately, on the phone if necessary. The people who work at the Center should be chosen with care and should be able to deal sympathetically with their contacts. Not put them off or scare them off. I am writing to suggest that the Crisis Center seriously evaluate itself and its workers.

The Late Great American Dollar

By Eric Pollard

There is a move afoot in the international money markets of the world to replace the American dollar with another currency that is more healthy and responsive to the nuances of capital flow. The prime parties in this movement are the Arab oil-producing countries, who understandably desire to conduct business in a more secure tender. Oil purchases alone account for 45 billion of the 196.2 billion dollars spent by the United States abroad last year. There is currently a 19 billion dollar trade deficit which promises to expand as first quarter figures become available and the increased costs of the severe winter and the coal strike are taken into account. The dollar has fallen from 5% to 27.8% against other international currencies. Even the English pound, long the whipping dog of European money-changers, gained 12% against the United States dollar. The dollar has fallen from among the so-called "strong" currencies, those held as hedges against international fluctuations.

The reaction of the Administration to the current dollar crisis is somewhat puzzling. There has not been one. There is a fear within the government that any action to bolster the ailing dollar will only serve to destroy whatever international confidence remains in it. The logic here is shady, but given the proper input can provide an adequate explanation of what the Secretary of the Treasury Blumenthal is suggesting. It is his position that the current dollar problems are the result of an over-excited American economy that is expanding at such a rate as to outstrip demand for American goods abroad. His answer to the problem is to plead with the leaders of the model capitalist countries, namely Japan and West Germany, to expand their economies in such a way as to absorb the American deficit. This has to be one of the greatest cockamamie solutions ever to issue from the lips of an American bureaucrat. How can the United States expect its economic and military allies to subject themselves to the high inflation and interest rates that go hand in hand with rapid economic development simply to rescue it from an economic wallow of its own design? It is as if Blumenthal expects to be able to threaten to take his ball and go home and get away with it. There is no question as to the proper response to such an absurd request. The new giants of capital, the Japanese and the Germans, cannot allow their economic policies to be dictated from Washington, regardless of how much of their present affluence is the direct result of American economic intervention on their behalves.

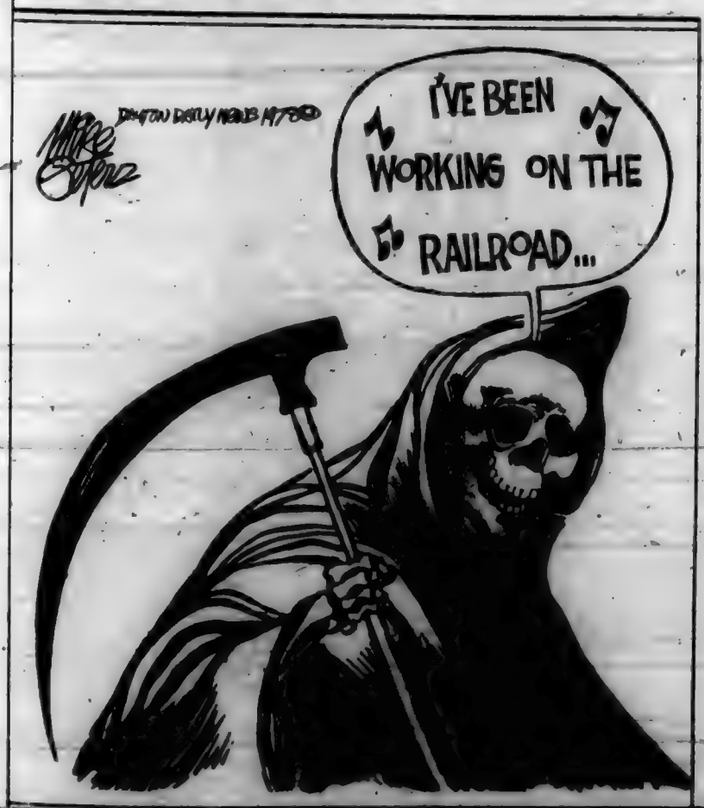
The solution to the problem must start where the problem itself began. The best weapon available to the United States government to fight the decline of the dollar is the legislative manipulation of the balance of trade. In simple economic terms this means drafting and implementing a forceful energy program that will reduce the importance of foreign oil imports. Another tool available to the government is the forced reduction of the interest rate in order to increase the supply of dollars coupled with an aggressive program of currency purchase to absorb the glut of dollars that would occur when the interest rate is dropped. The economy must be brought into line with the growth rates of American trading partners. Such action would allow the trading powers of Europe and Japan to benefit from the effort to re-establish the dollar in the world money markets, a necessary component of any effective form of economic development. An effort must be made to put the American house in order before help from abroad can be expected.



The continued American dependence on foreign energy imports is the key to any permanent solution to the dollar problem. It is absolutely necessary that the current import situation be remedied with all due haste, which puts the burden of action directly on the President and Congress. Between the two branches, an active, dynamic policy of conservation and development of native resources must be constructed. It is indeed unfortunate that the so-called "Carter energy package" has already returned from Congress. It, in itself, is not strong enough to slow the growing American thirst for foreign oil. It is hardly an improvement at all, and yet it is the best program the American people are likely to see for some time. The dollar is doomed, at least in the short term, to shrink and fade in comparison to its stronger competition. The nonchalant attitude of Congress and, sadly, the White House toward inflation and the balance of trade must drastically change in order to at least assure our trading partners that the government does indeed consider economic maladies to be a serious threat to the conduct of international trade. Simply, international economics must precede national politics. When expressed in these terms, the problem of the shriveling American dollar is indeed most depressing.

By Scott Greb

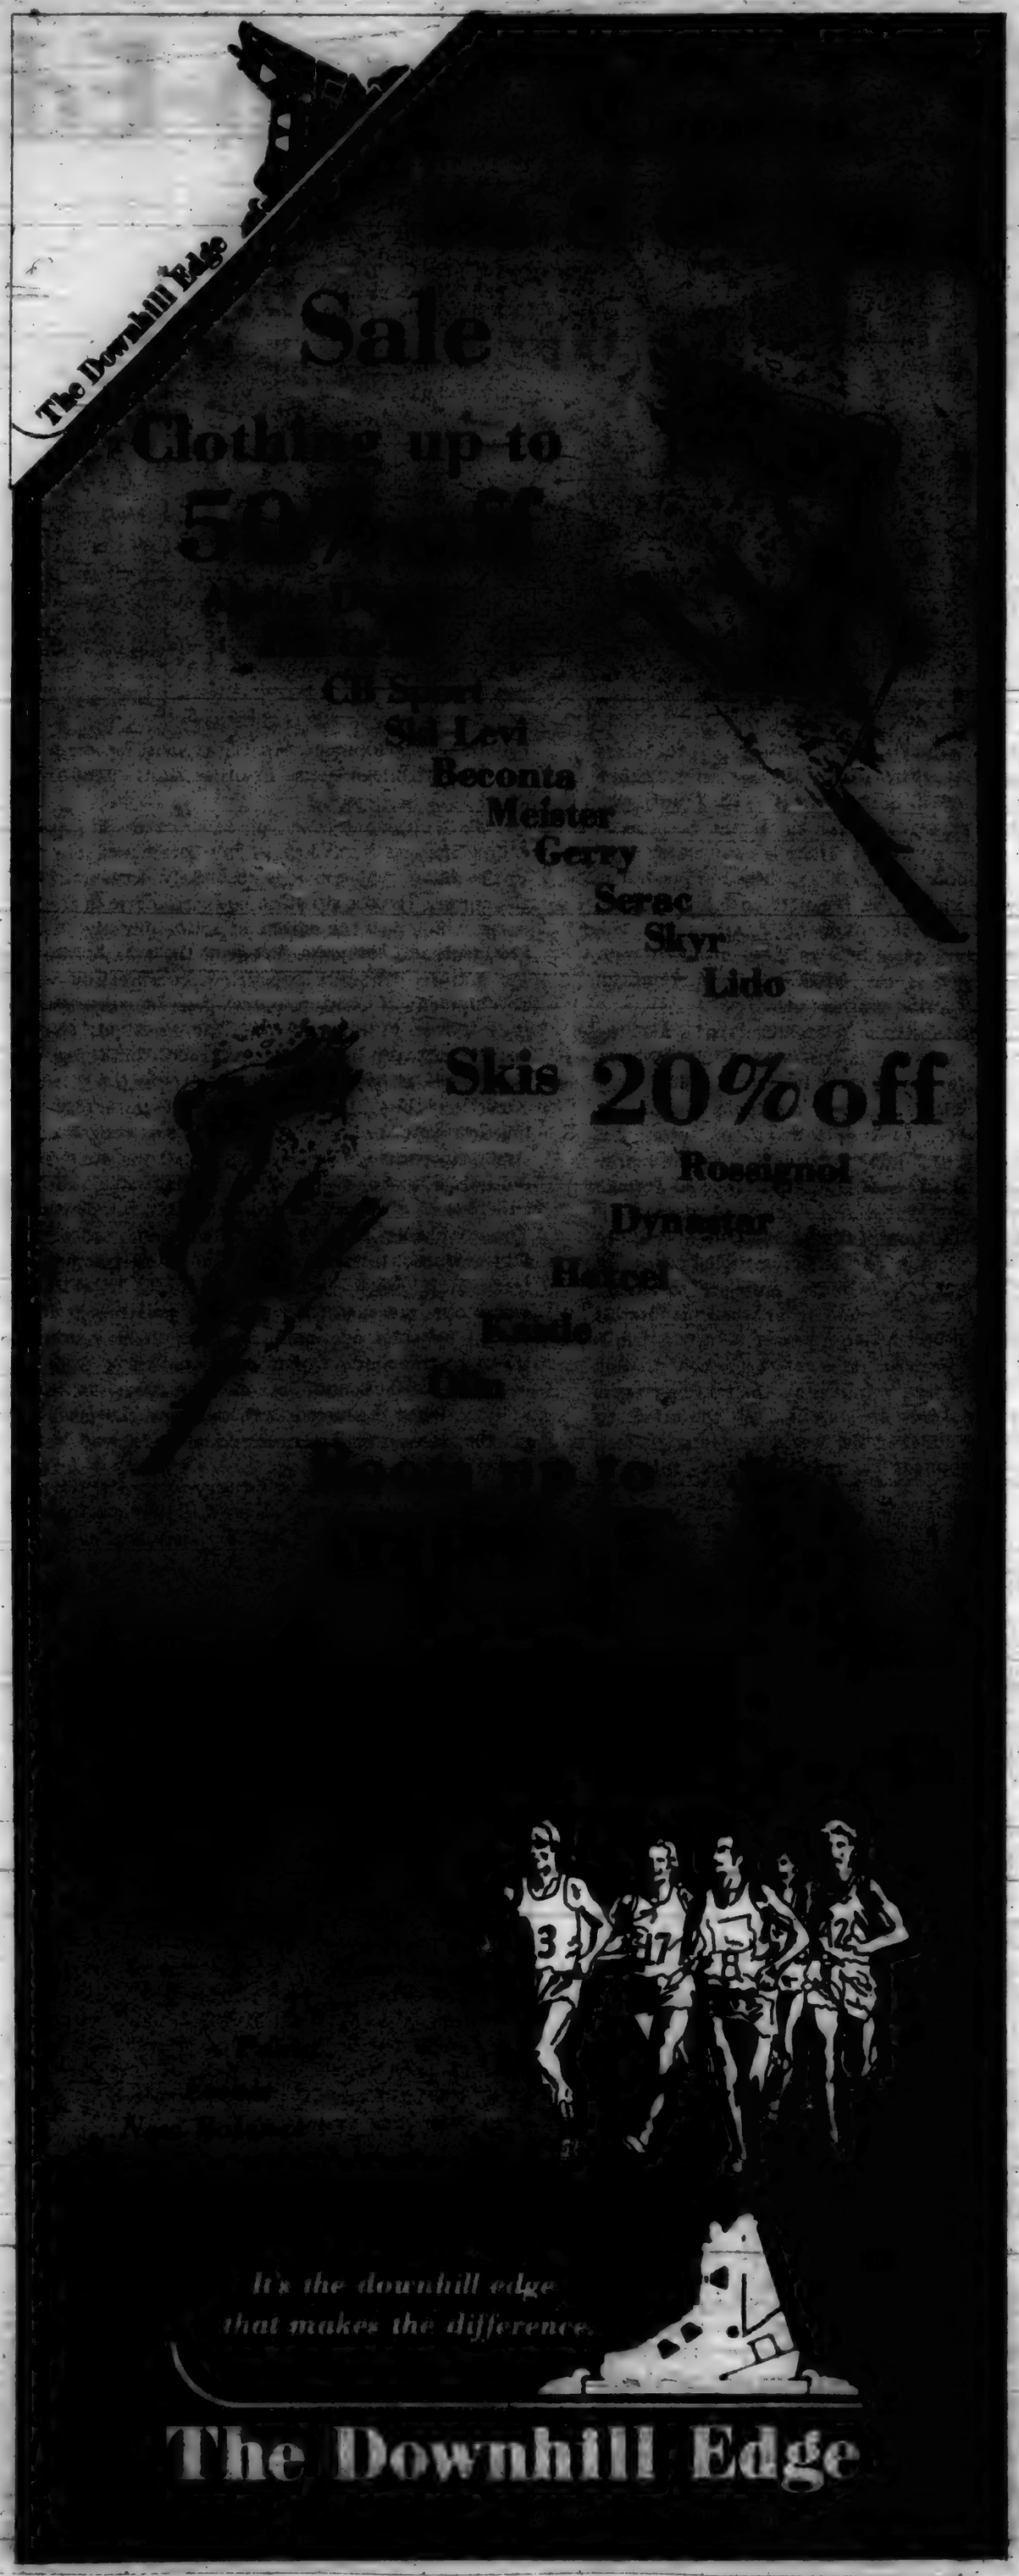
Winding our way out of the inner structure of Torrey Hall, a warm, hospital environment, us rodents with enthusiasm and tremendous excitement, pens dangling in between our claws, scurried over to the Grand Beginning...

Memories, ah those sweet, distant, innocent past recalls. It was but a year and a half ago that I became eligible. This yearly Rat Race entrance fee, 5000 seeds, is located in the highest reaches of the Eastern arm of Mother Amerique, drawing an abundance of furried creatures away from their holes representing every socioeconomic level.

Sponsored and "directed" by the Larry Coors Brewing Society, the Final Finish brings quite the refreshing quench. Yet, there is a catch. Yes, it's catch 4. This yearly race is cumulative, completed, "normally" after four years of participation, or as in many repeated cases, four long years of space occupying presence. After four years you can just imagine the savage, uncontrollable thirst.

Practically half way into the race, I've been witness to a most interesting variety of race tactics, exhibited by my fellow critters. It appears as though some of them, with the highest potential and promise for creativity, repetitively, rigidly preoccupy themselves with their old dusted, less productive habits.

I failed to mention there is the opportunity to partake in varying modes of travel, oh so many different traveling agencies. The quicker, more direct is wearing deep. Remembering army trenches before long this path will surely reach China. Food is abundantly supplied in this womb-like rutted carryonide chute.



Now there are others who prefer the high ground. These latter contestants have shielded themselves from those electromagnetic forces so many have no workable defenses against. They also have the freedom to hunt their own desired type of nutritious fulfillment. Their preyed unfortunates are also traveling towards that Grand Finish Line. You see, back in 1879, the finish line became incorporated into many species migration patterns. So indeed, you can influence where an animal will drink and you can be damn sure you can make him drink it, the bubbling refreshing Larry Coors 3.2 brew. The pace for the outliners is quickened as they healthily huff and puff towards their edibles.

Through my red beady eyes, I've also taken notice to some deep intravelers ever so sensitive towards their reviews. Along the trenches, and spread about over the higher outer reaches, are numerous aging observers, who with aching backs and blind, biased opinions, critique the contestants' performances. Upon receiving the carbonized print outs, the insiders tend to forever dwell and contemplate on their ratings. The outsiders, quite often receiving only average ment, eat the damn paper which, contrary to myth, is extremely high in energy content.

The reason why you are now able to read this is because I am taking one of my rest stops. You are allowed as many rests as you desire.

If only those cave runners would take a glance above and outside. The air is fresher with lakes and mountains, unlike the constant mud puddled insect-havened darkness. Most of us will reach that delicious brew supply after four or five years of travel, yet I can't see the direct, deepened route as being a wise game strategy.

Cockroaches

Nature's Balance Is Askew

It all started last fall, when I, a graduate student at UVM, moved into my present apartment above Mazel's Shoe Store on lovely North St. Many a neighboring tenant shuddered as they watched me ascend the long flight of stairs. Upon opening the door, I became overwhelmed with a bank of vapor which was, in some strange way, reminiscent of the D.D.T. experimentation lab.

It was some time later, while in bed at night, that I began to notice delicate "pitter-pattering" noises coming from above the ceiling panels. Rats? The wind? It was only after feeling something tickling my foot that I dashed open the bed sheets and discovered the answer. There, lying in helpless serenity, lay a lone baby cockroach. With but a heartless tear he was greased into the sheets with my right heel. Oh, but that was not the end. In the coming weeks his brothers and sisters began to make appearances from cracks in the wall, from under the stove, and the kitchen cupboards. It became quite an art for me to grab the can of Raid and zap 'em before they had retreated. Soon I had even installed separate cans of Raid near the T.V., the bed, and the toilet. But the battle was mounting. The cute little babies became huge monsters, well over an inch long with gaping mandibles and shiny round backs. It was interesting how clumsy they became dragging their rear legs behind them with a clearly audible "clip-clop" noise. They were indeed easier to spot and kill, but the sheer numbers had become overwhelming. They reached puberty and the population seemed to be multiplying at an astonishingly logarhythmic rate. In addition to the hundreds I crushed or sprayed to death daily, I even began to find roaches who had died of old age lying peacefully in the refrigerator egg compartments... belly up!

It was three weeks ago that the last of my friends stopped coming to visit. I spoke to the landlord, (a jovial fellow who worked downstairs in the shoe store), and with a casual yawn he assured me that he'd call the local exterminator. The roaches must have overheard me, for as I returned, I could hear them from outside the apartment door buzzing in a frenzy. The apartment had suddenly transformed into a horrifying sight. Roaches covered every fixture and wall in the house. They scurried about in an almost fluid-like manner, seething over the floor and scattering but a few inches from my every footstep. I tried frantically to scoop them with my bare hands into garbage bags, yet it was useless.

The exterminator has still not come. The roaches have now barrackaded the door and eaten my phone off the wall. I estimate I will be able to survive a few more days before I, or (God help me) they, run out of food. It is my last hope that some kind soul will find this addressed letter I have tossed out the window and drop it in a mailbox... that one day people will know of the horrors that exist on COCKROACH FARM.

Discover Who, What We Are

To the Editor:

I am writing to express my opinion that as a Social Worker and educator I found the article in the recent Cynic indeed provoking. I wish to comment that in the undergraduate Social Work Program at the University of Vermont our students are educated in areas of skill, theory and conscious use of self. Much emphasis is also put on professional ethics and values clarification.

The media in general has portrayed Social Workers as insensitive technicians and/or moralists. I believe some people associate us with our clients and see us as responsible for social problems while other professions criticize us as nonprofessional.

I ask that Cynic readers find out for themselves who and what we are, and not accept negative stereotypes that are so easy to attribute to any group. I invite comments by my colleagues, students and others.

Does UVM's Athletic Recruiting Program Need A Boost In Funds?

By Steven Larose
Cynic Co-Sports Editor

Recruiting of new athletes has become a major factor of the modern collegiate team's success. At the University of Vermont, recruiting efforts have suffered from the lack of proper funds over the past few years. If UVM wishes to become a serious contender in Division I they must boost their influx of talented freshmen, but the question is, can they do it on their present budget?

Basketball Coach Peter Salzberg remarked that the lack of money has hindered him severely in his quest to bring top name high school players to Vermont. "We have to bring in talented players, or else we are not going to win. In order to get these players to come to Vermont, you have to be there at the right time with the right answers. If you're not, even though we might think Vermont is a nice place, it's really just a name and a pretty picture."

In order to bring the desirable players to Vermont, Salzberg has to compete with hundreds of other schools, many of which have 15 scholarships to hand out, where Vermont only has nine and a half. This is only the beginning of the money problem.

"With the limited amount of scholarships, we have to be careful in recruiting someone who will give us the best. There is no margin for error." But Salzberg also pointed out that "compared to our other money problems, scholarships are a small part of the problem. We need someone with a good attitude who is an exceptional student. That means that we have to look a little harder and a little deeper to find an athlete who has both of these things and can win basketball games. However, we can't always cover all the bases, because we are operating on a budget the fraction of other Division I schools. As a matter of fact, we are so far away from the 'prime recruiting area' that we should have even a larger budget than the other schools. Also, we are competing against schools that have three or four full time people. When I can only be at a couple of a kid's games, when someone else has had a scout at them all, that puts us in an extra disadvantage."

As a result of the money limitations, Salzberg has had to resort to a 'selective truth' type of sales pitch, using the image of Vermont as a rural school with good academic programs to recruit his new players. "If you're competiting with Ivy League schools, then you'd better sell the idea of quality education. On the other hand, if your competition is UCLA and North Carolina, you have to come up with something impressive to make the kid sacrifice the benefits of those places. You have to vary your sales pitch with each prospect. If your competition is a Division II school, then you push the idea of playing on a team that competes in Division I."

Salzberg went on to say that the athletic facilities at Vermont might look good to some prospects and might turn off others, depending on the competition. "Luckily, we have been fortunate to find good players in the people who other Division I schools weren't very interested in."

Salzberg conceded that Vermont will never be able to win consistently on a national level, because Vermont athletes have to be capable of surviving in a stiff academic program. "What I'd like to do is develop a team that will be competitive in New England, but with what we have now, I don't think that is possible. If we are to recruit the top players, we need a larger budget that will allow us to keep in contact with the prospects. We might have nice product to sell, but if we can't be there to sell it, we lose."

The basketball coach also lamented that Vermont fans will have to get used to mediocre seasons since Vermont does not have the firepower to compete with some of the schools on its schedule. Salzberg closed by remarking "Games are rarely won by coaching. Teams win by talent, and we do not have the money to go out and get that talent to enroll at the University of Vermont."

Salzberg has high aspirations for his team, which he feels are within reach if additional funding is allocated for recruitment. The administration, on the other hand, is more pragmatic and would like the team to remain competitive with schools whose funding is on the same level as UVM. In the administration's eyes, if UVM could blend together an exceptional team every few years, it would be more desirable than having to heavily finance a perennial contender.

Denis Lambert, UVM's Athletic Director, sees only a small problem in the Athletic Department's budget and claimed that UVM has been able to efficiently stretch out the budget dollars to field teams

Terriers Evade Ice Cats 6-5

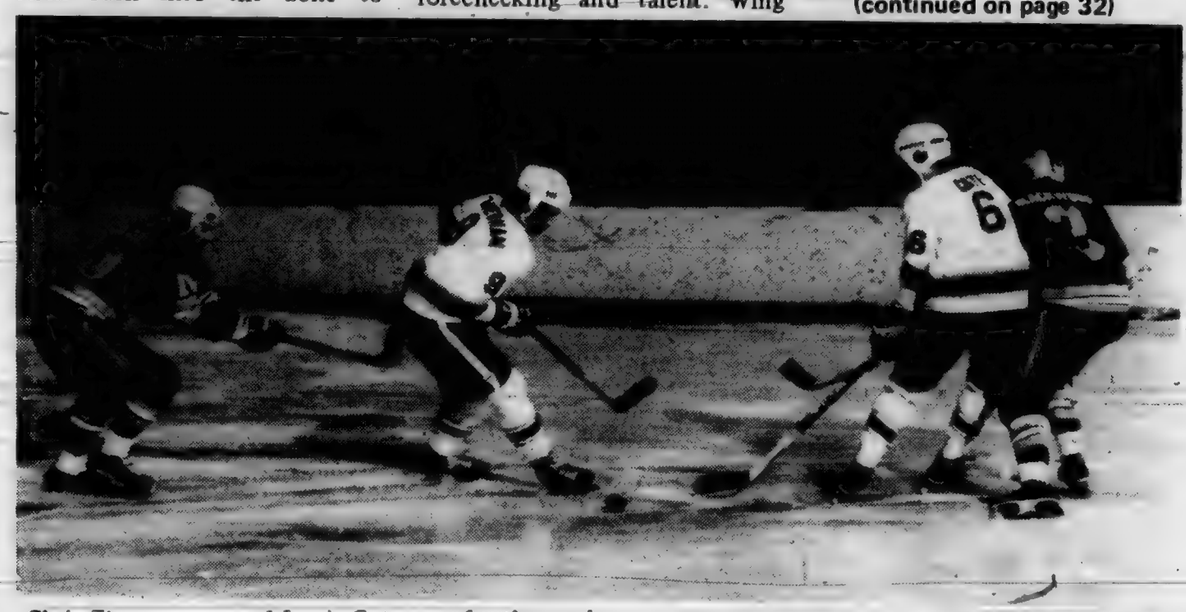
By Paul Gardner

The University of Vermont Men's Hockey team ended a discouraging season with a close but no cigar 6-5 loss to number one ranked Boston University in a game held Saturday afternoon in Boston.

The loss to BU was like a verse in tune that has been sung too often for both teams. It was BU's ninth one goal win in 26 games and fourth 6-5 victory. For Vermont it was the tenth loss by two goals or less. The Cats have lost 3 games by 3 goals, and once to Providence by 5.

The game was a high energy contest between a team that has won on execution and confidence, and one that has been trying to find itself all year. It was by no means a boring game; it was merely the frustration that was repetitive.

There were several unusual plays. Turcotte, who has calmly stopped dumping shots all year, inexplicably missed connections on a 90' slap shot by Terrier Bill LeBlond. Shots of that length are rarely expected to elude the goalie across so much open ice. Their purpose is to get the puck into the offensive zone without having to hassle with off-sides or stand-up defensemen trying to knock it away. The forwards then rush into the zone to pursue and hound opposition puck carriers in hopes of setting up a play. That Turcotte was scored on by such a play had to be demoralizing for the Cats at that stage of the game (8.28 on the third period, 5-3 BU).



In the second period Turcotte was involved in two other wierdos that missed. Turcotte pounced on a loose puck to his right, coming well out of the net to do so. The puck wriggled free, got on a Terrier's stick and rose quickly to the other side of the net for a shot at the yawning cage. Bill McAlduff took charge and blocked a shot. BU was refused as a Cat quickly pinned a dog, and the puck to the boards. Minutes later, after Turcotte grabbed a shot from his right and appeared to hold on, the ref whistled action stopped. The puck, however, continued into the net and the red light flashed in vain. No goal.

BU was not content. LeBlond clicked for his first of two goals with a screamer through a crowd from straight out on the blue line. The play developed after the Terriers disrupted a UVM break-out that has had troubles all year.

Another UVM weak spot has been its powerplay. The Terriers provide a tough test for powerplays with their forechecking and talent. Wing John Bethel went off at 1:51 of the first for charging; it took BU 56 seconds to score shorthanded for a 1-0 lead. The play developed when Craig Homola on the right side boards tried to switch directions and go back behind the Vermont net. Marc Netnik pursued and took the puck away, setting up John Melanson, who put a fifteen footer past Turcotte from the goalie's right.

The Cats did manage a few good shots on the powerplay before the goal, then suffered several minutes of confusion with BU forechecking viciously. UVM got four offsides calls in rapid succession, and BU got a few close calls on Turcotte. This time though, it was Vermont that turned the tables. Homola, whose Minnesota connection line started the game after their hot performances of late, took a pass from Dave Otness and slammed it into the net. That tied the score at 1-1, 9:10 into the period. At 10:41 Mark Brown went off for tripping and it looked like BU would take the lead again. They didn't even come close as BU's feared power play didn't even get a shot off. During the period's last ten minutes, the Cats did it all, as they say. They dumped and chased with aplomb. They disrupted BU's breakout. At the

Cats Hook BC in Overtime

By Paul Gardner

Call it determination. Call it pride. But whatever you call it, the Cats showed they still have guts and a certain amount of talent, by downing the BC hockey Eagles 3-2 in overtime last Tuesday, Feb. 28, in McHugh Forum on Chestnut Hill.

Craig Homola emerged the hero for the Cats and appropriately so. Homola has spent more time around the opposing goal lately than the other team's goalie. Dave Otness started the puck rolling after BC came from a 2-0 deficit in the second period and tied it up on powerplay goals in the third. The Eagles flew into the overtime with the momentum in their favor. However, UVM was able to be the spoiler. Otness led Vermont's charge after BC had controlled the 1st minutes of OT. Louis Cote took a pass from Otness, ripped a shot to BC's Paul Skidmore, who was right there to make the stop, but then again, so was Craig Homola. Skidmore was down and Homola lifted the puck over him to win it at 2:22 of OT. It was his sixth goal in four games.

Ironically, this was not one of Vermont's better games. The first two periods were rather sluggish and BC certainly did not look like a team battling for home ice in the playoffs. BC still has the inside track, but RPI now has a great shot at taking home ice away from them. Unfortunately for the Eagles they did not seem to be aware of this situation till the third period.

The first period ended scoreless. In the second, Gordie MacFarlane put Vermont on the board with two unassisted goals. MacFarlane drew first blood at 11:05, after he stole the puck from BC's Joe Augustine. Faking a pass to Jim Duffy on the ensuing three on one break, MacFarlane slipped into the crease and scored with a backhander. At 15:48 MacFarlane again got an unassisted tally on a pass from McAlduff into the right corner of the BC zone. Homola had stationed himself in the slot and hollered, "Gordie, Gordie, Gordie." MacFarlane responded, but the pass never got there. The puck deflected off a defender's skate and Skidmore was left motionless in shock. Shock pretty well summed up the first two periods for the Eagles who are now 12-8 in Division One. Having played only twice in 3 weeks and having lost both by whopping margins to BU (12-5, 10-5) both times, they were dominated by the Cats for two periods. The Cats who have faced the best the league has to offer, were more than BC expected it seemed (the Eagles should know better, UVM flattened them 6-3 last year at Gutterson).

In the third, BC gathered itself up by the suspenders, threw 19 shots at Turcotte and nearly pulled it out. This has been a familiar scene for Vermont. In their nine losses to top eight teams they have almost always been ahead at some point or tied in the third period. High scoring Joe Mullen got the first of two powerplay goals for BC one minute and 42 seconds after Mark Brown was called for hooking. Mullen's wrist shot evaded Turcotte at 10:13. Randy Koch got tagged for an elbow penalty at 14:20, and at 14:56 Bob Hehir cashed that one in too. Those were the only penalties of the period.

Though this game was not as well played for Vermont as the Clarkson game, there is no denying that the Cats have gelled and are playing well.

Basketball Report

Vermont Win Ends Season

By Steven Larose

Mike Kern closed out the University of Vermont's Basketball season by popping in a whopping 25 point total as UVM slapped St. Michaels College with an 84-70 defeat Saturday at the Ross Sports Center in Winooski.

Kern canned 11 of 15 shots as he used his soft shooting touch to score at will on the inside. Kern's totals would have rocketed further but Coach Peter Salzberg decided to honor his three senior forwards with starting spots.

Mark Sobolewski pumped in 19 for the Cats in his last game as a Vermonter while fellow seniors Kevin Kelly and Charlie Trapani both dumped ten points each into the hopper.

Vermont ended the season on a cheerful note, as the Cats managed to stick to their game plan and control the game from start to finish – something the Cats have lacked since the Ohio State victory. Coach Salzberg remarked "We basically did what we set out to do. That hasn't happened very often, but it did today. We felt we could get the ball inside and did."

Vermont's 69 percent shooting in the second half – 21 of 30– reflected the Cats repeated penetration to the hoop. The Cats also controlled the boards outrebounding St. Michaels 32-26.

Tom Perrin started the Cat attack on the Purple Nights with three straight jumpers to give Vermont an early 11-6 lead, but the Cats faded momentarily and St. Mikes roared back to a 14-11 advantage. Vermont's skin tight zone forced several SMC turnovers, and the Cats strung together a 12-1 streak on three points from Perrin and seven by Kern to take a 23-15 edge.

St. Mikes continued to fall further behind to red-hot Cats as Kern ripped the nets to launch Vermont to a 35-25 intermission edge. A pesky SMC squad failed to die as the Purple Knights crept to within four points twice. Perrin delivered another bomb to the dazed SMC Cagers, put the contest away for good when he hit a jumper and made a lay-up on a steal. Sobolewski chipped in two points, and the Cats were in control, 53-43 for good.

Perrin had his best effort of the year, whipping up a 19 point total. Tyrone Johnson dunked three from the field for six points and Greg Davis tipped in four points to round out the scoring picture.

Vermont finished the year with an 11-15 mark, a disappointment after a flashy 4-0 beginning. But even in the sea of gloom there were some good spots, including a win over Ohio State. One factor that is not taken into account by the win-loss record is that Vermont now has a trained group of contenders in the freshman recruits, and the outlook for next year is considerably brighter.

Randy's Rebounds

Kern & Johnson Spark Optimism

By Randy Briggs

The fine play of Mike Kern and Tyrone Johnson in recent games has given University of Vermont basketball coach Peter Salzberg a lot to look forward to next year. Lately both players have been consistently contributing to Vermont efforts.

Kern has had three excellent games in succession. He has scored 23, 15, and 25 points against Lasalle, BU, and St. Michaels' respectively. He has been playing with a tremendous amount of aggressiveness and poise and is now beginning to show what every Catamount basketball fan expected of him when he came to Vermont. Next year his performance will have to be more stable for Vermont to have a winning season. If he consistently dominates each game, he will be one of the best in the East in 1979.

Tyrone Johnson has been a pleasant surprise in the last few games. Against Lasalle he pulled down eleven rebounds and tallied six points. Johnson has improved tremendously since the beginning of this year. It appears that he has ridden himself of the shyness that characterized his freshman season. His shooting style is very smooth and at 6'5", Johnson can jump with players who are even taller. As a well-rounded player, he will definitely help the Catamounts next year.

The seniors went out in excellent form as Mark Sobelewski scored fifteen points and Kevin Kelly had ten against St. Michael's. These two, along with Charlie Trapani, have been valuable for Vermont basketball. They have enjoyed its successes and have endured its recent difficulties providing a base for the program to grow on. The three seniors are to be congratulated for a fine career here at Vermont.

NCAA BASKETBALL TOURNAMENT

The NCAA basketball tournament gets underway this Saturday as thirty-two teams begin their quest for the championship of college basketball. This year's field is the strongest in the tournament's history. Twenty-three of the thirty-two teams have only seven or fewer losses.

There are six ECAC teams in the field, with two of those coming from New England. Rhode Island, which had a season record of 24-6, will take on 23-6 Duke in an opening round game. Jack Kraft has done a remarkable job at Rhode Island this year. He is taking his team to the tourney on a high note. Twice in the last three weeks of the season they beat nationally ranked and in-state rival Providence. Rhode Island will be underdogs, however, to the Blue Devils, who are led by Eugene Banks.

The other New England representative will be Providence College, 24-7 on the season. Providence will challenge Big Ten Champion Michigan State in the opening round. The Spartans had an excellent 23-4 regular season mark.

Another ECAC team will be Lasalle, which played Vermont here in Burlington a couple of weeks ago. The 18-11 Explorers will take on the Eastern Basketball League champion Villanova, which sported a 21-8 record. This should be an outstanding game between the two Philadelphia schools.

The other three ECAC contenders are Syracuse, St. John's, and St. Bonaventure. Syracuse opens against Western Kentucky. St. John's with a 21-6 record, plays 22-6 Louisville. St. Bonaventure, at 21-7, faces Pennsylvania. The East is well represented in the tourney by fielding ten of the thirty-two teams.

The favorites for the tournament are Kentucky and Marquette. One of the two will not make it to the final four however. Both are in the Mideast Regional and will probably face each other for the Mideast championship.

The dark horse would have to be the Bruins of UCLA. Although they have not been as strong as in recent years, they still are a great shooting power. Led by David Greenwood and Raymond Townsend, the Bruins will be tough.

The NCAA tournament is one of the most exciting sports events of the year. With all the hoopla, the upsets, and the nail-biting games, it may truly be called a spectacle.

Women's Basketball

Vermont Drops Two in Tourney

By Randy Briggs

Stung by the tremendous shooting and extreme quickness of the St. Johns hoopsters team, the University of Vermont women's basketball team dropped a 73-44 contest last Friday night at the Patrick Gym.

Both defenses were tough early in the contest, but Vermont was shooting heavily from the outside and commiting numerous turnovers. Meanwhile, St. Johns was very patient as they worked the ball inside for their shots and quickly bolted to an 8-0 lead. Belinda Emerson finally got Vermont on the board with a lay-up following a nice steal to make it 8-2.

At this point Ling Ling Hou took over for St. Johns. She hit a couple of quick hoops and Vermont was down 14-2. Vermont took a time-out at this point in attempting to solve their errors. For a while it worked. Two free throws and a basket by Gail McWilliam cut the lead to 14-6 and it appeared that the Cats were going to make a game of it.

Gail McWilliam kept the Cats within striking distance in the first half by scoring 11 points, but the quickness and rebounding skills of St. Johns continually flustered Vermont.

With the Cats trailing 22-10, Coach Condon inserted six foot four inch Val Guy into the game to try to get some more scoring power on the floor. Guy responded by hitting two buckets to cut the St. Johns lead to 32-17. St. Johns then outscored the Cats 6-1 in the remainder of the half to put the lid on any Vermont comeback hopes.

The Cats opened the second half with the same 2-1-2 zone defense that they used in the first half. Unfortunately for Vermont, the St. Johns sharpshooter Ling Ling Hou canned her first outside shot of the second half. Gail McWilliam continued to show her offensive skills as she countered Hou's basket to make it 40-20 St. Johns. That is as close as the Cats got.

Vermont's inability to hit its free throws was also a big factor; they converted on only ten of 23. The Cats quickly switched to a man to man defense which was of little consequences as St. Johns continued to shoot with startling accuracy, ending up with a 52% shooting average from the field.

Vermont continued to hustle and scrap, playing good defense in the second half, but continuing to have offensive difficulties. They shot only 31% from the field and had 32 turnovers. Even when the Cats began to penetrate in the second half they missed several inside shots.

In the second half, Coach Condon substituted freely as the fans got a chance to look at all the players. Pafticularly impressive was the play of Sheri Lockwood.

Coach Condon remarked after the game, "we had a terrible shooting percentage and made too many mistakes. You also must remember that St. Johns was the second ranked team in the east."

St. Johns proved to be a very good passing team and because of their quickness played well defensively. Their offense also played well, led by Ling Ling Hou with an amazing 31 points. Gail McWilliam led Vermont with 15 points and Belinda Emerson also put in a solid performance.

In the consolation game of the tournament Vermont rebounded to play a strong game only to lose a close 71-68 decision to Syracuse University.

The Cats played a super first half as they jumped out to a big 14 point lead. But soon Syracuse put on a full court press which Vermont could not handle. The score at half-time was 36-34 in favor of Vermont.

Led by the play of center Martha Magish, Syracuse jumped to a quick six point second half lead. The Cats continued to battle and took the lead 68-67 with less than a minute to go. Mogish then scored the winning basket and Vermont turned the ball over to kill any victory hopes. Syracuse canned two free throws in the final seconds to ice their victory. Syracuse was led by Mogish's 19 points and 22 rebounds. The Cats had a very balanced scoring attack which was led by Judy Ketchum's 15 points. Mary Eddy had 13, Margaret Considine 12 and Belinda Emerson 11.

Cortland State defeated St. Johns for the tourney title by a 61-42 score.

only to have his binding break sending his ski careening off the course and his hopes of victory with it. Jerry McNealus had a good day on the slopes, coming in sixth, followed by Jeff Darrow in ninth and Kent Belden in 19th for Vermont. Tim Itin from Dartmouth led the Big Green to victory in the event as he took fourth, backed by skiers in the 7th, 14th and 22nd spots. Vermont placed second with 29, one point over third place, Colorado, and three over fourth place Wyoming. Needless to say, the loss of Light and Bruce hurt the Cats severely.

The last event was the jumping and once again, Colorado's heavily Norwegian jumping team rallied to its fullest potential and captured the win 48.5 – 34.5 over Vermont. More importantly, the Buffaloes tallied 39 points more than Wyoming, thus seizing their sixth straight NCAA National Championship, 152.5 – 121.5 over Wyoming.

Vermont's Kare Kerjé had an excellent day of jumping tieing for first with Colorado's Tom Holmen Jenson with a combined total of 229.6 feet. Roger Holden landed in sixth for the Cats. Colorado's strength lay in taking fifth and eighth as well as winning the event. Erik Ugelsang was the only Wyoming jumper to place, landing in 12th.

"Roger (Holden) and Kare (Herje) did excellently," said a very pleased Lacasse. "Holden could have been even higher on the first jump. He took off well, but he was off a little on the other two. Herje was excellent. They seem to do better under pressure."

Dartmouth placed fourth overall, one half of one point behind Vermont, followed by Utah in fifth, Northern Michigan and then Middlebury.

"The competition was awesome," Coach Lacasse added. "We didn't ski to our potential, but we had some good individual performances. We really put it together in the jumping. Dave Larson and Dennis Lambert did very well considering the competition. Larson had a good first take-off but had trouble in the others. Lambert has come a long way this season and if his takeoffs had been a little better, it would have been ideal. Darrow, Midtvedt, and Light all had excellent showings."

UVM will be sending four skiers to the All-American team: Holden, Herje, McNealus and Light. Bruce has been there before, and Midtvedt came within seconds of qualifying.

"Alpine coach Mike Shoenfeld was a key factor in this season's success," Lacasse commented. "He did an excellent job in making the team what it is today."

In conclusion, Lacasse added, "We had the team to win it this year, but things just didn't go our way. We have potentially the best team in the nation and we've proven it, when you total up all the figures. Our Alpine teams got nothing but respect from the Colorado and Wyoming coaches, and that means alot. Coming back from fifth place to third is an achievement in itself. It wasn't our major goal, but we were only seven points from second place. Things went our way this season."

Looking to next winter, Lacasse said, "We're going to strengthen a few areas. We're going to build up our cross-country as well as add a few more Alpine skiers. Frankly, I'm looking forward to next season."

UConn Knocks Off Vermont Women Icers

By Melissa Brown

The women's ice hockey team returned from the first Annual Dartmouth Invitational Hockey Tournament as runner up to the University of Connecticut Huskies. In a four-game tournament which featured Dartmouth and Middlebury as well as UConn and UVM, UVM lost to the Huskies in the championship game 1-0. Dartmouth defeated Middlebury in the consolation final 7-4.

In the first game it was no contest as UVM defeated Middlebury 7-2. The Catamounts got off to a quick 1-0 lead four minutes into the first period when right wing Ellen Gray fired home defense Margot Huber's floating shot from the point. Several minutes later UVM center Lynn Rupe broke over the UConn blue line and took a crisp shot which hit the upper post and her wing Kim Nalen quickly drove in the rebound to make it 2-0. In the final minutes of the period Middlebury retaliated with a goal by Anna Gebeleine. But UVM came right back as left wing Melissa Brown skated in on a pass from Ellen Gray. Brown took a low shot which the goalie attempted to stop, but center Carmen Gaudreau banged in the rebound to put UVM up by two.

In the middle stanza UVM continued to dominate as they outshot the Panthers 15-7, but Middlebury managed the only goal of the period to make it 3-2. The UVM defense was especially strong at the point as they got off eight shots including three from Amy Tutwiler.

UVM iced the win with four goals during the third period. Nalen notched her second and third goals in the period for a hat trick with assists coming from Rupe and Casey Nolen. Brown gave the Catamounts their sixth goal on a powerplay with the assist coming from Gray and defense Bonnie Burnhart. Doris Bonner got the final goal assisted by Paula Priestley. UVM's Ann Bartlett finished with 17 saves while Middlebury had 40.

UConn defeated Dartmouth in the other game 3-2.

The championship game was an experience of frustration for the Catamounts as they were unable to capitalize on their scoring opportunities against the physically strong and determined UConn Huskies. The game was highlighted by Ann Bartlett's exceptional saves and coolness during several one-on-one situations. She finished with 35 saves to the UConn goalie's 23.

Donna Bruneau notched the only goal of the game during the latter minutes of the first period. The goal followed an earlier scramble in front during which Bartlett successfully kept the puck out. But Bruneau retaliated about thirty seconds later with a hard shot from the extreme right of the net.

The remainder of the game was characterized by numerous close opportunities and several penalties on both UConn and UVM. Paula Priestley had a breakaway which was thwarted as a UConn player hooked Priestley's left skate bringing her down and denying the scoring opportunity.

The loss to UConn dropped UVM to 7-8-2 overall. The Catamounts close out their season on Saturday, March 11 against RPI at Gutterson

Catamount Women Gymnasts Vault to Second in NE's

The University of Vermont Women's Gymnastics team caused the University of New Hampshire women to "sweat a bit" as they came close to victory in Saturday's Tri-State Tournament held in Keene, N.H. this weekend but had to settle for second place with 120.7 points. The UNH women placed first with 125.3. Keene was third with 118.05 followed by the University of Maine Orono in fourth place with 114.4.

Vermont wound up the season with their strongest team performance of the year. Coach Debbie Kosciusko remarked that the UVM women were well prepared and psyched for the meet. After the first two events, Vermont tallied 61.75 while UNH had 62.9 – an unexpected close encounter. Denise Walker, an elite gymnast from UNH, easily won the meet scoring 36.05 for the All-Around Title. UNH grabbed second place with Schneider scoring 31.85 followed by a difference of .25 with Kris Costello (UVM) scoring 33.16, her record for the season. Anne Berry (UVM) took sixth place in the all around with 29.05. Berry also grabbed second in vaulting with an 8.7. Vermont's Janet Lynch was fourth in vaulting with an 8.5. On the beam, Lisa Duff and Kris Costello placed fourth and sixth respectively. Kris was also fourth on the uneven bars while Kim Chung was fifth. Costello finished off her floor exercise scoring 8.55 taking second place followed with Janet Lynch in third with 8.45.

Although this was the team's last meet this year, two individuals qualified as specialists for the EAIAW Eastern Regional Gymnastic Championships to be held at Pittsburgh this weekend. This is a high honor as only two specialists per event qualified this year. Janet Lynch will be representing Vermont in floor exercise. Anne Berry will represent UVM in vaulting and should provide her with a valuable experience to help the team in competition next year.

The Vermont women's gymnastics team has an exhibition planned for March 17 with the UVM men's team at Winooski High School, after which time the gymnasts will still practice, working on skills and routines for next season.

The University of Vermont will be hosting the Tri-State competition next year.

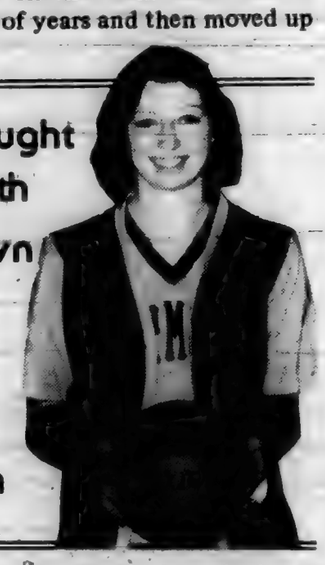
Gail McWilliam -- Giving the Women Hoopsters Support and Skill



By Rich Chalmers

Gail McWilliam, a UVM senior, has played basketball since her freshman year in high school. During her past four years at Vermont, she has contributed much to the women's basketball program.

Although this year's record of 5-10 is considerably lower than the previous season's tally, McWilliam is optimistic about the future of women's basketball at UVM. "It's come a long way," she commented. "We've started playing better schools and competition is much harder now. We used to play many Division II and local teams, but these past few years we've played against more of the big schools around New England. The program has been improving since I arrived here four years ago, and it's going to keep on getting better."

When asked how she became interested in basketball, Gail answered, "I never even considered it. I came from Grafton, a small town in southern Vermont, where I went to a tiny grade school. When I started going to Bellows Falls High School, some of the kids on the team asked me to join. I played J.V. for a couple of years and then moved up to varsity."

"Athletics have brought me into contact with many people, shown me many things and taken me a lot of places"
– Gail McWilliam

McWilliam went on to say that she has been lucky to have two fine coaches. Her high school coach showed her the fundamentals and UVM coach Jean Condon rounded out and developed her skills. "Miss Condon is definitely a good coach," McWilliam said. "She's perceptive and sensitive toward what we need."

McWilliam came to UVM because she wanted to stay in Vermont and the Burlington area appealed to her. "From what I've seen of other schools, I'm glad I came here."

"The last couple of years we've been fourth or fifth in the Northeast. This year our talent is better than our record. We have several talented players, but we just couldn't get them to click." The team was plagued with injuries. Sue Murdock, a key figure, broke her finger early in the season and recovered for only the last weekend of play. Therefore, every team member had to give her all during the season.

"Athletics is an important part of every school. It has brought me in contact with many people, shown me many things and taken me a lot of places that I probably wouldn't have encountered if I hadn't been involved in sports."

In response to questions concerning UVM's facilities, McWilliam responded by emphasizing the need for adequate facilities for any sport. "It's hard to work around different groups, struggling to find time and space to practice. It would help if we had more court-space, as the gymnasts take up one full court and the competition for space is heavy."

"This season had its ups and downs," McWilliam added, "but there were some spectacular personal performances. Margaret Consedine, for instance, really came out and did her stuff. I was disappointed that we couldn't get it together and win more games, but I got a lot of satisfaction from our experiences."

McWilliam is assured that Vermont has not been outclassed by its competitors. The women met nationally-ranked Queens College in the tournament quarter finals last year, and came close to winning. Queens secured the victory by only five points. "I know we can compete with schools like that," McWilliam said confidently.

"It's exciting to win, especially if the team is playing well. Of course there's the personal satisfaction of knowing that you've played well and done your best. It's not so bad when you lose a tough game if you know the team played well."

This year will end Gail McWilliam's UVM basketball career. UVM owes much to her support and skill on the court.

The Greatest Will Try It Again

By Mark Kevorkian

The Greatest is not finished. Former heavyweight champion Muhammed Ali announced on national television this weekend that he will try to regain the crown he lost last month to Leon Spinks.

Ali more than compensated for his pre-fight silence of a month ago. In the press conference on CBS-TV he declared, "I'm deserving, the world is waiting for it."

Ali claimed he should be given the first chance at Spinks' title – ahead of Ken Norton. "It's tradition," insisted Ali. "The first defense goes against the ex-champion. Leon Spinks should fight me. I fought Sonny Liston and immediately gave him a rematch to prove it was no fluke."

"Ken Norton says he deserves the first shot, but I'm truly the number one contender in the eyes of the people. Who is more deserving of a shot at the championship – Ken Norton or Muhammed Ali?"

That question may not be as rhetorical as Ali would think. Before fighting Spinks, Ali avoided a rematch with Norton like he would the plague. Norton was told he would have a shot at the winner of the Ali-Spinks contest. Now it seems that Norton may be put on the shelf again.

Norton was offered a shot at Spinks in May by Bob Arnm, head of the promotional firm Top Rank Inc. Arnm offered Norton $200,000 for the bout, expecting him to turn the sum down as an insult. Norton was indeed insulted, but accepted the offer anyway.

The fight is still not scheduled for May. The money Spinks is to receive will determine whether Norton will participate.

There is an additional ingredient to the recipe – which is, of course, Muhammed Ali. Ali is clearly involved in the contract the new champ drew up with Top Rank, Inc. to defend his title.

"Leon Spinks should fight me. I beat Sonny Liston and immediately gave him a rematch to prove that it was no fluke"
-Muhammed Ali

According to this contract, Spinks would receive one million dollars for his first title defense. If the fight was against Ali, however, Spinks would then collect five million.

These figures would put Ali and Spinks in opposite corners this May – and leave Ken Norton in a ringside seat. "Settle down, Ken," the promoters tell him. "It'll be your turn soon."

NBA Playoffs and Spring Training

The NBA season is winding down into the playoffs (a season in itself). Most of the post-season berths have already been claimed. The division championships have been taken by Philadelphia, Portland, Denver and San Antonio.

Believe it or not, the Celtics are still in the running. Boston must beat New Orleans and Atlanta for the last berth. Currently, the Celtics trail the two clubs by four and three games, respectively. To enter post-season play, however, the Celtics must win almost all their remaining games.

Optimism is the word at the Red Sox training Camp at Florida. Competition for places on the team is high with the new acquisitions the Sox gained over the winter. Jerry Remy, who played for the Angels last year, is the Sox prize newcomer. Remy will play second base, which has been a short coming for the past several seasons. Denny Doyle, the Sox second sacker for the last three seasons, is hoping to be traded or released. Doyle played respectably for the Sox; the club owes him a trade or release soon. But Doyle may find it tough to be traded due to his high salary.

Luis Tiant reported to camp twenty-five pounds lighter than last year, and began working out right away. Last year Tiant had a slow start in Florida, due to a contract dispute.

Headline news in the Sox camp thus far has been the presence of Ted Williams. Williams is working as a batting instructor while the team is in Florida.

The Sox Staff, though certainly not frightening, is healthy. Youngsters Bob Stanly and Mike Paxton are throwing well, and could make Jim Willoughby and Rick Wise expendable on the trade market.

The Sox look strong, but alas, the Yanks do also. Along with Baltimore, the three teams should make the fight for the All East pennant tough until September. And just think, it's only March.

Trivia: Who started at third base for the Red Sox in the first game of the 1967 World Series?

Coaches vs. Administration

How Much Recruiting Money Is Enough?

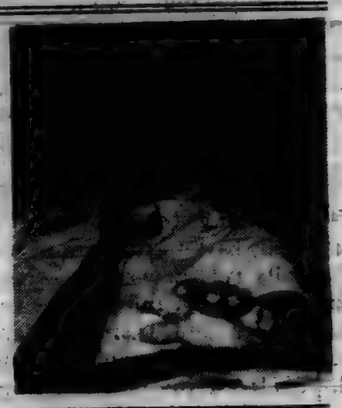
that have been successful in Division I. "We are competitive, even though we are not a dominant force in Division I. The basketball budget has increased, but we have had some tough luck that additional money couldn't help us with. No athletic program here has a lot of money. We have to be efficient and try to produce a winning team by hard work and long hours," remarked Lambert.

Lambert pointed out that Vermont dominated Division II several years ago, and changed to Division I to compete against more challenging teams of top caliber. "Our small budget made it difficult for our teams to compete in Division I, but we are relying on good athletic attitude and desire to bring us a few wins, instead of sheer physical muscle."



Vermont's stiff competition in admissions has greatly hindered the recruiting effort. "Our academic programs are rigid," said Lambert. "Even if a good athlete wants to come to Vermont, he will not get accepted unless his grades and college boards are high. At some institutions you wonder what comes first, education or athletics. I feel comfortable with our sound educational standpoint. Our coaches work hard in recruiting, but the athletes have to compete with thousands of other applicants. The admissions office has to be very selective, which means many good athletes don't get accepted here where they might be easily enrolled at some other school. To me it makes a lot more sense to keep our standards high."

Lambert addressed himself to the complaints of insufficient funds by commenting that he has to take all the programs into consideration when drawing up a budget whereas a coach will only be thinking of his team's needs. "I can't focus on a certain sport. We are running in the race with a handicap, but I feel that it's a good thing to be conservative. Education and servicing the student needs are my priorities and winning comes second."

Money is not the only recruiting program drawback, since Vermont's location is the underlying factor in the ski team's success and the basketball team's demise. Vermont ski coaches are able to attract top notch skiers to UVM but Vermont is isolated from the rest of the basketball community. Lambert remarked, "We have to do the best we can, even if it means some disappointing seasons for a team."

Vermont is not a rich state, and the University relies on contributions and tuition for most of its operating budget. Even though UVM is designated a state institution, the legislature funds only 17 percent of the budget. Lambert favors a tight budget, and stated that "it's like any curve. As you increase the money, you also increase the productivity. But at a certain point you reach an apex, and after that you can still pump in more money, but the output levels off. The idea is to find what is right for Vermont. We are trying to maximize the benefits vs. the costs and squeeze the most out of every dollar."

"The budget is like any curve. As you increase the money, you also increase the productivity. But at a certain point the output levels off."
–Denis Lambert

Lambert concluded by stating that if Vermont returned to Division II the school still would not have a large enough budget and would be taken down a notch in the type of competition. "We have to maintain our image. There are no simple answers for me. We are trying to realize what we are, what we have to work with, and achieving some realistic goals."

The Athletic Council will have to evaluate the direction in which UVM is headed and if the current budget is enough to power the University to the target point. The school must be responsive to the needs of the students, providing a wide variety of sports for every student, while at the same time providing top notch competition for the athletic teams, no matter what the cost.

Vermont Misses Knocking Off No. 1 BU

Vermont blue line, the Terriers found green suited defensemen ready to knock them down and take the puck away. UVM evened up the shooting at nine each.

Vermont flattened out in the second period. After LeBlond made it 2-1, (4:22) Todd Johnson backhanded a rebound that the Cats had failed to clearout (4:53), past an out of position Turcotte, 3-1. The Cats did settle down and kill two more penalties (7:39: Murphy slash; 16:08: Brown trip). Andy Halford took a pretty pass from Randy Koch and beat Brian Durocher backhanded low to the left for a shorthander and a 3-2 score at 8:50. Likewise, a Vt. powerplay at 12:51 fizzled.

Inexplicably the Cats looked totally indifferent at the start of the third. At 1:27 Bethel escaped into the crease and made it 4-2, and as they had been doing all game, the Cats hoisted themselves up by the suspenders and took it to Durocher as McAlduff screamed a left point slap shot past the BU goalie. At 8:28 came LeBlond's second goal on the 90 footer, and quickly BU had its two goal lead back. The Cats did not let go and McAlduff slapped his second goal of the afternoon into the BU net, 10:41, 5-4. The Cats' big chance came at 12:01 when BU co-captain Jack O'Callahan high sticked Gordie MacFarlane out of the game and drew a five minute major in the process. Against Clarkson the Cats came up with three goals during a 5 minute major and were looking for at least a tie out of this one, which they got at 15:05 from Billy Ford. The freshman wing lifted the puck over Durocher out of a scramble for the 5-5 tie. The heartbreaker came from the stick of freshman wonder Mark Fidler. A BU wing set up the play with a drive from Turcotte's left that rebounded straight out to Fidler for the winning goal at 18:08.

Nilsson Paces Vermont Gymnasts to Fifth Place

The superior skill and leadership of Hans Nilsson spurred the University of Vermont Men's Gymnastics team to fifth place in the New England Championships held last weekend in New Britain. Boston State won the title with 179.9 points while second place Lowell tallied 178.1. Dartmouth finished third with 174.9 points as Yale ended in fourth (163.7) and Vermont recorded 153.9 points in a strong effort.

Nilsson remained undefeated for the 1978 gymnastic season as he totalled 45.45 in all-around to claim the title while teammate captain Mark Ricard took the number eight spot with 38.9. Freshman Jon McDonald, the only other UVM finalist, brought home a fourth place medal for the side horse event. Nilsson also made the finals in vaulting, parallel bars and side horse, placing third, seventh and eighth respectively.

With the competitive season at an end, the UVM gymnasts will keep in shape by demonstrations at several Vermont schools, beginning at Winooski High on Friday, March 17.

In ending its first season with official varsity status, the gym team holds a 2-2 record in New England League meets with a 3-4 over-all figure. The senior status of captain Mark Ricard means a 1979 all-around position exists for coach Dunkley to fill, but he is confident that the presence of former Vt. High School champ Steven Rancour and several potential freshmen will show the Cats a more potent gymnastic force in 1979.

The 1979 championships are scheduled to be held at UVM.

Seven UVM Skiers Make All Eastern Team

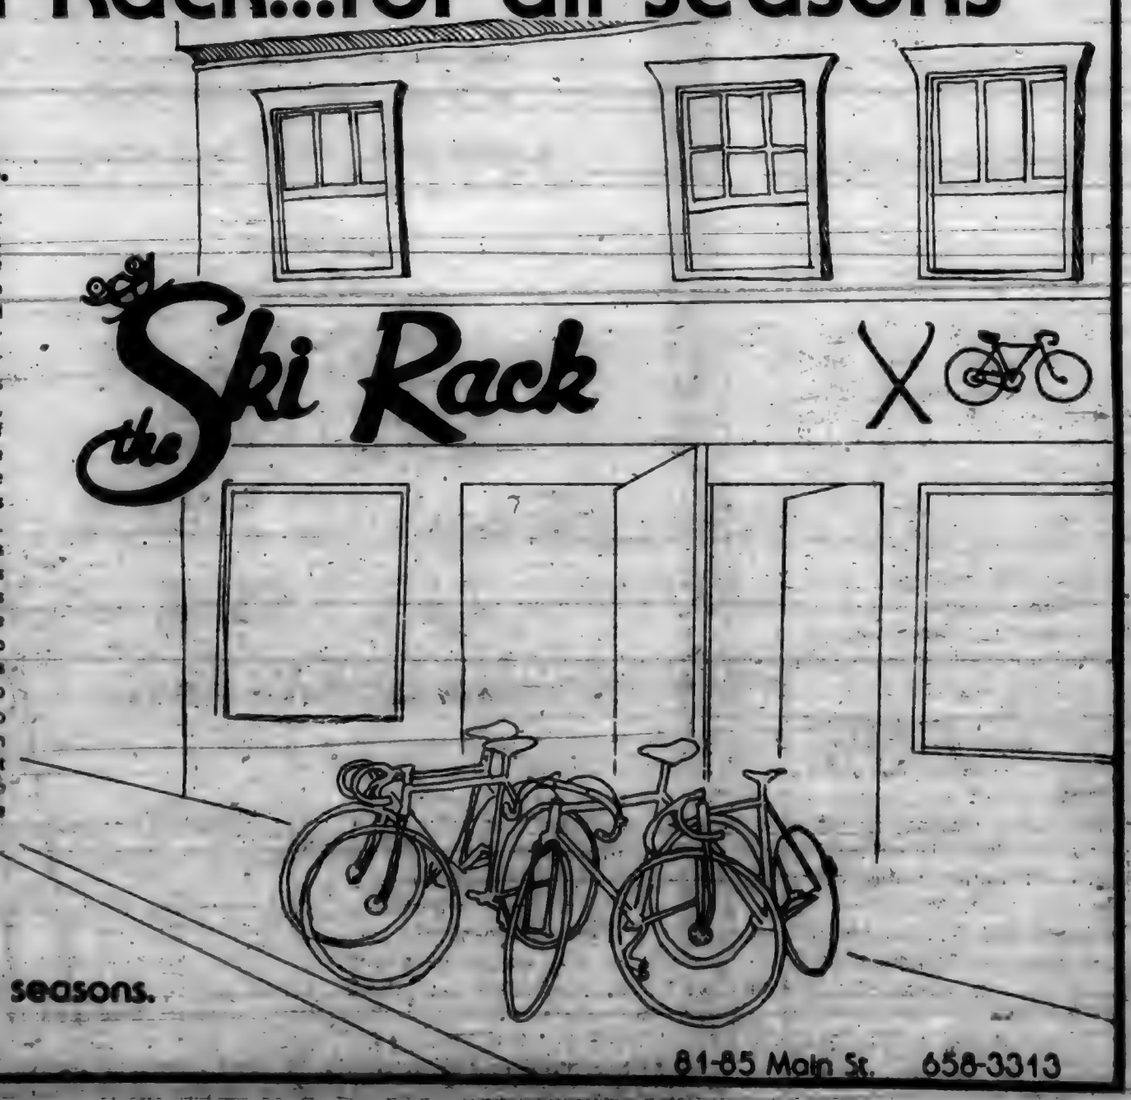
By Amanda Miller

The University of Vermont ski team, Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Association champions, placed four members on the first all-eastern team and three on the second team to once again dominate the Division I all stars.



Kare Herje, the EISA jumping champion, led UVM's first team squad, which included Scott Light, the EISA giant slalom champion, and Karsten Midtvedt, the EISA cross-country champ. Rounding out the Vermont all-star picture was Mark Wagner, a cross-country specialist.

Vermont's members on the second team are Jerry McNealus, Roger Holden and Doug Bruce, three of the squad's most important spark plugs this year.

The Ski Rack...for all seasons

The Ski Rack means Bike Rack when the snow melts.

As the snow starts to melt with the onset of warmer weather the Ski Rack metamorphs into the Bike Rack. While our Winter Sale continues we start to shed our Winter Clothing and cross-country ski equipment to uncover our line of Raleigh, Vista and Windsor bicycles. Just as the Ski Rack provides you with a complete line of accessories, parts and service to accommodate all of your cross-country ski needs, our bicycle business provides you with the same complete service. Our bicycle mechanics can service and repair all makes of bikes. Our bicycle parts and accessories department can outfit you from spokes to saddlebags. We offer bicycle mechanics classes so you can learn how your bike works and what you should do to maintain its proper condition. Our sales staff will spend all the time necessary to educate you on what bicycle choice to make. We then fully acquaint you with that bike and assemble and adjust it to fit you. After you've logged a hundred or so miles on your bike, we'll give it a free checkup.

Now you know why...

The Ski Rack is for all seasons.

Class Officer Elections

Attention Freshmen, Sophomores and Juniors! Elections for Class Officers will be held on March 20, 21 and 22 concurrently with Student Association elections. To place your name on the ballot for President, Vice President, Secretary or Treasurer of your class for the coming year, you must obtain fifty signatures from your classmates on a petition. Petitions and more information are available at the Alumni House, 86 South Williams Street, or call 656-2010. Petitions must be returned to the Alumni House by 5 p.m. on Monday, March 13. There is a $50 limit on campaign spending.

Panhellenic

The UVM Panhellenic Council is hosting the Northeastern Regional Panhellenic Conference at UVM March 17, 18, 19. Twelve schools from New England, New York, and Canada will be attending. The focus of the conference will be a sharing of ideas on issues of importance to the Greeks.

Summer Session

Experimental courses for the University of Vermont 1978 Summer Session will be developed by eight UVM faculty members who have received grants from the University to explore new course topics and approaches.

Dr. David Holmes, director of the UVM Instructional Development Center, said the educational development grants are designed "to promote unique course offerings during the summer, with an eye toward transplanting the ideas to the University's regular fall-spring curriculum."

The grant recipients and their projects are: James Barbour, home economics, and Kay Schmucker, counseling, $2,000 for a program in human sexuality; Chester Liebs, history, $800 for an institute in historic preservation; and Anthony Bradley, English faculty, $1,000 for a program in Irish studies.

Also, Philip Rhinelander, music, $500 for a course on guitar for elementary school teachers; Margaret Roland, art, $950 for a survey of oriental art.

Also, Howard Biel, geography, $780 to develop a course on urban studies; and David Morency, mathematics, $1,400 to develop a course on mathematical modeling techniques.

Dr. Holmes called the grants "part of a continuing University program to provide support resources for faculty in their efforts to reform and improve instructional offerings. Over the past five years 95 grants have gone to over 130 faculty. The Summer Session, which has been a locus for experimentation and innovation for several years, serves as a unique laboratory for trying new ideas and course models."

Dear Mom & Dad

First of all please disregard my last letter entirely. The letter that said I was going to jump off a cliff because I lived three miles from campus, couldn't get into two of my major courses, lost my coupon book and hadn't made any friends. I've discovered this center called the Advising Referral Center that wanted to help me! I'm much happier now and am finally beginning to enjoy this place. Well, have to run, I'm picking up Sally (my new-adopt-a-friend) to play squash and then we've got a lecture and there's a dance at L/L and... If you're having any difficulties meeting people especially for those who are off-campus, drop by the Advising Referral Center and we'll see what we can do. 337 Waterman, x4174.

Barbara Wells Returns

The very popular pianist Barbara J. Wells returns this year in her only Burlington appearance of the season on March 12th, 4 p.m. at Burlington High School auditorium.

The concert will include works of Liszt, Schubert, Chopin and Brahms.

For this year's program she will be bringing in her own, new, 9 foot Baldwin concert grand piano.

Ms. Wells' last appearance here was to a full house so advance ticketing is advised. Tickets are available at the Lane Series office, the Living/Learning Center on the UVM campus and at Bailey's Music Rooms and Hansen & Son, downtown. Call 658-4812 for reservations.

This concert is open to the public. There is no admission charge.

Violin Recital

The University of Vermont Department of Music is pleased to announce a senior violin recital by Cora Cooper on March 10 at 8:00 p.m. in the Recital Hall of the new Music Building. She will be assisted by Carl Recchia, piano, and Mark St. Germain, organ.

The program will include pieces by Corelli, Bloch, Stephen Fisher, and Brahms.

Miss Cooper is a student of Thomas L. Read and Evelyn Read, and will receive a Bachelor of Music degree this May. Miss Cooper has been a member of the University Orchestra, has been a participant of Lyric Theatre, and is a member of the Atheneum Players. In addition, she has attended the Meadowmount School of Music and the Aspen Music Festival. As soloist, she will be performing Beethoven's Romance in F on March 19 with the UVM Orchestra.

The recital is free and the public is cordially invited to attend.

Bottle Drive

The Rice Memorial High School Music Association il sponsoring a bottle drive on Saturday, March 18th. Please save your bottles for collection on that day. The profits will be used to purchase band uniforms. Areas to be canvassed will include Burlington, South Burlington, Winooski, Colchester, Shelburne, Williston and Essex Junction. ## Harpsichord Recital

The Dept. of Music will present a harpsichord recital by Elizabeth Metcalfe on Sunday evening, March 12, at 8 p.m. in the Music Bldg. Recital Hall. The program will include works by Louis Couperin, Bach, Soler, and by the contemporary American composers Daniel Pinkham and Vincent Persichetti.

Interested Students

The Dean's Advisory Committee (DAC) of the college of Arts and Sciences is having an information session for potential members. This brief and informal gathering will be held at 4:00 p.m. Monday, March 13, in the Memorial Lounge, Waterman Bldg.

The DAC is a group of students from the departments in Arts and Sciences concerned with the academic proceedings of the college.

Interested Arts and Sciences freshmen, sophomores, and juniors should contact their department chairperson.

Refreshments will be served!

Seminars

Podiatry and Optometry Seminars

Podiatry: There will be an informal seminar about the profession of Podiatry on March 14th at 4:00 p.m. at the Center for Cultural Pluralism (former Blundell House) on the Redstone Campus. Two area Podiatrists will be talking about what they do, how they got interested in Podiatry, and the pros and cons of the profession.

Optometry: A similar session is scheduled about the profession of Optometry for March 15th at 4:00 p.m. at the Center for Cultural Pluralism. Two area optometrists and a film about Optometry will be presenting information about this career area.

Both of these sessions are excellent opportunities to begin exploring health professions other than medicine. What are the requirements, what is the future of these two professions, and what do these professions offer for you – these are just several of the questions which will be explored at these sessions.

Sponsored by the Premedical/Predental Advisory Committee.

Health Care

There will be a Career Spectrum Program to explore careers in Health Care Administration on Monday, March 13, from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. at the Alumni House, 86 South Williams Street.

The panelists are: John Stevens of Co-operative Health Care Information Systems; Aaron Fuchs, Health Planner, Vermont State Department of Health; William Earl, Professional Services Administration, MCHV; and Betsey Boehner, Director of Maternal and Child Care for the State of Vermont.

Everyone is invited to attend this informal panel discussion. Refreshments will be served.

Newspaper Recycling

Don't throw away old newspaper. Instead, do the environment a favor and recycle it. Each dorm has a place where newspapers can be put and picked up every Friday. Look for signs and flyers indicating where to place newspapers in your dorm. If everyone contributes in some way, we'll all benefit in the long run.

Recycle your newspapers today!

Student Teaching

All students planning to do their student teaching during the Fall 1978 semester must attend an important organizational meeting. Students interested in Elementary Education are scheduled to meet on Wednesday, March 15th. Students interested in Secondary Education are scheduled to meet on Tuesday, March 21st. Both meetings will be held in the Memorial Lounge, Waterman Building from 7:00 to 10:00. Any questions may be directed to the Office of Professional Laboratory Experiences, 409 Waterman Building, or call 656-3477.

Know an Alchoholic?

In Vermont an estimated 22,000 Vermonters are alcoholic. They come from every type of background and from every income level. However, he or she is not the only one hurt by the disease. The alcoholic is directly affecting the lives of their immediate family and others. Nearly one out of every five people in Vermont is either alcoholic or comes from a family where another member of the immediate family is alcoholic. Does someone in your family or a close friend drink heavily? Do you dread going home weekends or bringing friends home in fear of embarrassment? You are not alone. Would you like to get together with others in the same or a similar situation? If you would, contact Jane Baldwin, 431 Harris Hall (656-3896) for more information.

Hibernating this Winter?

Come out of hibernation this winter! For stimulating lectures on current topics, updates on research at the University, and more... join Chittenden County Alumni and Parents and UVM community members in the Spring Chittenden County Lecture Series.

Dr. Lawrence Weed, Professor of Medicine and Director of the PROMIS LAB at the University, will speak on Tuesday, March 14, at 7:30 p.m. at Rowell Hall, Room 111. He will discuss PROMIS (Problem Oriented Medical Information System) in a lecture entitled "The 'Promis' System: Coupling Education to Real Problems."

All UVM alumni, parents, students and community members are welcome. For more information, contact the Alumni Office, 86 South Williams Street, 656-2010.

Juggling is Addictive

The next meeting of the juggling club will be held Wednesday night, March 15 at 7 p.m. Any new people are welcome. The meeting will be held in Commons 115 at Living/Learning Center.

The club is being formed as a result of the generated interest from the successful workshops taught by kinetic artist George Sherwood at the L/LC during February. People come in not knowing anything about juggling and for the next two hours they become absorbed in getting down the regular cascade, forgetting about other problems and leave with a new experience that is growing steadily in America. Anyone can juggle! For further information contact George at 863-5627.

Consumer Hotline

"How to Start Your Own Business" will be the theme of the Wednesday, March 22, Consumer Hotline telecast which is produced by the University of Vermont Extension Service in cooperation with Vermont ETV. When thinking of opening your own business there are many things to consider. Determining which type of business is right for you, costs and financing, location, and personal abilities and qualifications will be among the topics explored by guests Ray Denault, Assistant District Director for Management Assistance, Small Business Administration, Michael Flynn, accountant in CPA firm of Thompson, Kelly, Jacobs, and Gallagher in Burlington, and Chris Barbieri, Executive Vice President of the Vermont State Chamber of Commerce.

Barbara Mair, Program Coordinator for Business and Industry Educational Services for the Extension Service, will moderate the live one-hour telecast and take viewer phone calls that can be dialed direct to the panel at 655-1100. The program can be seen on all Vermont ETV channels at 8:00 p.m. on Wednesday, March 22.

Gil Scott-Heron

"...The rhythm led the band through several stages of jazz, that were at different times Afro-funky, spacey, bluesy, and even progressive..."

Gil and Taj: An Incredible Journey

By Randy McMullen

Gil Scott-Heron and Taj Mahal conducted a journey Friday night at the Memorial Auditorium, which brought many members of the audience out of their seats, toward the stage, and on a social trek that danced across America, and the Caribbean.

Both Scott-Heron and Taj Mahal attempt to communicate with their audiences, but their style and messages are nearly opposites.

Scott-Heron is more direct and damning. He'll bring out the best or worst of anything he writes about, depending on how he sees it. His voice and articulation, as well as stage mannerisms, are sensuously charismatic, yet half of the energy he creates comes from his gut-level lyrics:

Home is where the needle marks/ Tried to mend my broken heart./ ...and it might not be such a bad idea/ if I never went home again...

Scott-Heron's words cover a wide scope of social aspects: heroin addiction, nuclear power, politics in America, and carnivals in France; and what he says about them is indeed worth listening to.

Taj Mahal's music, with a few exceptions, seems to predominate his lyrics. His music is the kind that should float through you, whispering daydreams into your ears and rhythm into your legs. Issues aren't inherent with his performance, and while Scott-Heron was a poetic realist, Taj Mahal was a carefree escapist. The two complimented each other beautifully. Scott-Heron's social lesson was followed by a recess in the schoolyard by Taj Mahal.

Gil Scott-Heron and the Midnight Band led off, and it seemed that their last performance in Burlington (in October) was well remembered. He was greeted warmly by a crowd unwilling to remain in their seats.

"The drums are going to be with us this evening!" Scott-Heron exclaimed; and his band broke into a heavily rhythmical number while he invited everyone to get up and dance. Many accepted, and as the front aisle filled with moving people, the concert security muttered and tried to keep the view clear for all.

The Midnight Band, whose music is written by Scott-Heron and keyboardist Brian Jackson, is supported strongly by its percussion section. "The drum," said Scott-Heron, "is capable of 360 degrees of communication." And Barnett Williams ("the muscular doctor of drumology") was the executor of several 360's during the evening, especially during the song, "Johannesburg," which brought his primordial dancing gestures to a maniacal climax.

The rhythm led the band through several stages of jazz, that were at different times Afro-funky, spacey, bluesy, and even progressive during a Coltrain number that seemed as timeless as a hard-core blues saxophonist winding his way among the alleys of Greenwich Village. Brian Jackson and Allen Barnes, the saxophonist, peaked wildly on solos during the song, and the versatile Midnight Band was at a creative highpoint.

As beautifully uninhibited as it was, however, the Coltraine number did not set the stage for the rest of Scott-Heron's performance. He's too much a realist to be dominated by free-form and surrealistic jazz extravaganza.

Perhaps following the notion that hallucination makes reality even less appealing, Scott-Heron then settled down into his political ways, stinging the audience verbally with moral jabs and desperate warnings. He mourned over the political scene in America ("Winter in America"), and the near loss of some close relatives by nuclear plant mishap ("We Almost Lost Detroit"). His most chilling revelations, however, came across during "Home Is Where The Hatred Is," a saga of a heroin addict waiting to die and wishing the moment would come soon.

Though Scott-Heron's perceptions and views are intriguing, it appeared that the majority of the audience was more interested in applying his music to their dancing rather than their intellects. Many frolicked enthusiastically while he lamented the position of a drug user trying to turn his sick soul inside out, "so the world can watch him die." Whether his messages were taken in or not cannot be speculated, although it would represent a terrible waste if they weren't. Scott-Heron is a powerful spokesman for the "now" generation, and neglecting this aspect of him would be like sawing the singer/composer in half.

Scott-Heron's performance wasn't all heavy and morbid. His band rocked the crowd with an Afro-funkish tune near the end of their first set. Barnett Williams brought the auditorium very close to complete pandomonium with his muscle-bound delirium. It was good craziness, cheer and loving in Burlington that was well appreciated by this writer with no strings attached.

An encore by the Midnight Band was brutally demanded by the audience, who were subsequently treated to "Under the Hammer" and "Johannesburg." The latter tune always seems to be a crowd-pleaser, and indeed, it is a very entertaining song. Barnett Williams tossed a percussion instrument around like a beach ball; and Scott-Heron jived on some audience participation. He asked "What's the word?" and everyone (even those who wouldn't know what apartheid means if it bit them on their transcripts) shouted back "JOHANNESBURG."

When Gil Scott-Heron opened for George Benson last year, he was a tough act to follow. Taj Mahal last Friday didn't have it any easier. But he was so unique that the comparison became complimentary.

Unlike Scott-Heron, Taj was not out to blast reality. He seemed to be making a new one: carefree like cocaine and stupifying like champagne. "C'mon everybody," he shouted. "Let's all dance and have a good time."

His band's music was a novelty in itself, a cultural mosaic as well. A steel drum provided a Jamaican sound, while the rhythm often approached reggae. His sax

A Machiavellic Extravaganza

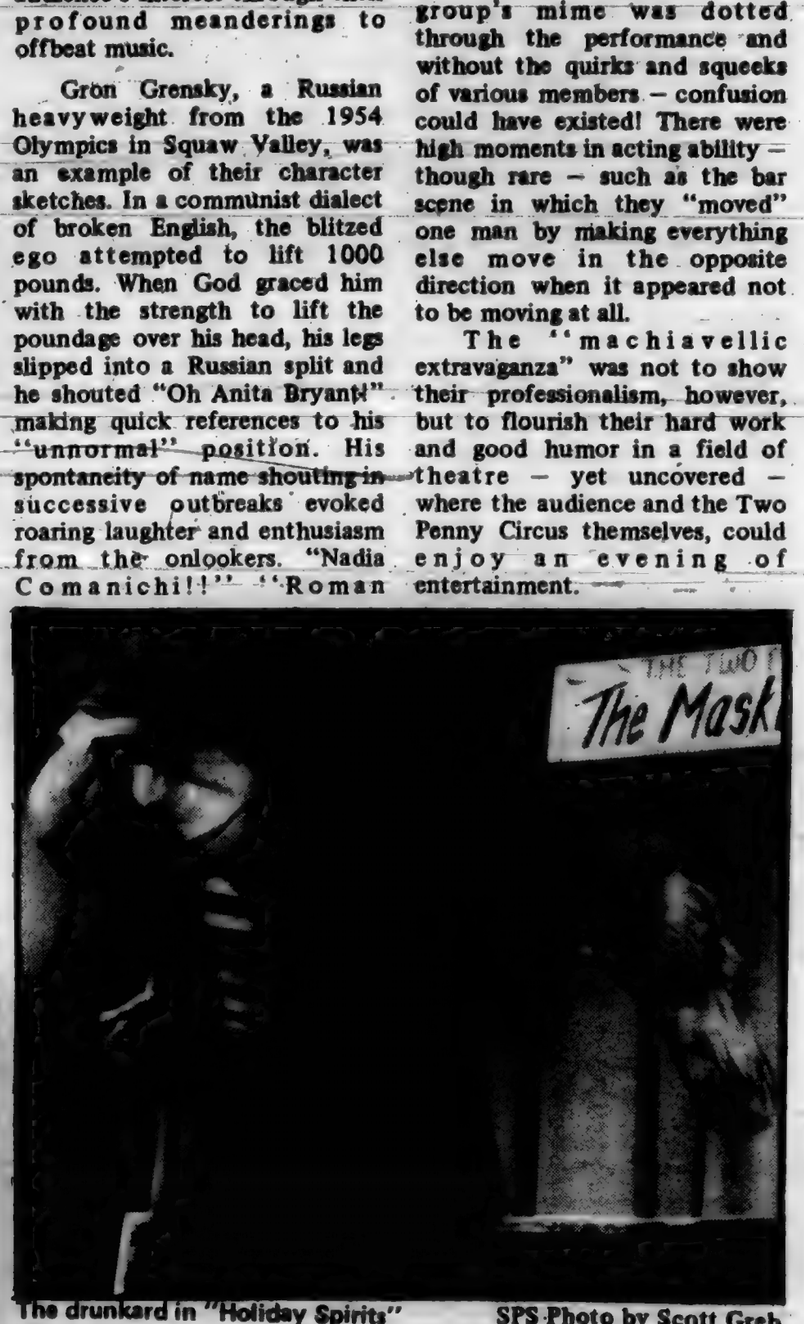
By Alan Marshall

The Two Penny Circus, an experimental theater group based in Plainfield, Vermont, with dazzling ingenuity and impeccable wit, presented the "Masked Mime Show" for a well-receiving and well-rounded audience last Saturday evening in the Living-Learning Center.



The Two Penny Circus, with deep regard for kid-humor, solicited innocent laughs and passed a quick two hours in a series of skits. "Forms of Beings" was one scene of awkward figures maneuvering about the stage in strange, cosmic ways. Blank, oblong masks drew imagination to life-as the black robed beings kept the audience's interest through their profound meanderings to offbeat music.

Gron Gronsky, a Russian heavyweight from the 1954 Olympics in Squaw Valley, was an example of their character sketches. In a communist dialect of broken English, the blitzed ego attempted to lift 1000 pounds. When God graced him with the strength to lift the poundage over his head, his legs slipped into a Russian split and he shouted "Oh Anita Bryant!" making quick references to his "unnormal" position. His spontaneity of name shouting in successive outbreaks evoked roaring laughter and enthusiasm from the onlookers. "Nadia Comanichi!!" "Roman Polanski!!" he shouted as he found himself in increasingly difficult positions with his iron weight.

In exhibiting their creativity the group played out "Jabberwocky" a poem with illusive meaning and 'gobbly-de-gook' words leaving interpretation to the eyes and ears of the beholder. There were Holiday Spirits and Lulu's Street Corner Sonata but nothing was more entertaining than the "Monkey Business" skit which unveiled the youth in the audience. Under the melody of an accordian a little monkey collected pennies from offering children for the performance's general revenue.

The finer points of the group's mime was dotted through the performance and without the quirks and squeeks of various members – confusion could have existed! There were high moments in acting ability – though rare – such as the bar scene in which they "moved" one man by making everything else move in the opposite direction when it appeared not to be moving at all.

The "machiavellic extravaganza" was not to show their professionalism, however, but to flourish their hard work and good humor in a field of theatre – yet uncovered – where the audience and the Two Penny Circus themselves, could enjoy an evening of entertainment.

player seemed dixieland at times, and was reminiscent of the Chicago blues sound at others. Taj himself was all over the world, strumming a guitar and dancing about on the stage in his loosely fitting white clothes and floppy hat. He was a bulky troubadore with a noncommital attitude whose only message was simply: "Boogy and enjoy it." He laughed, whistled and sang his band through numbers like "Ain't Nobody's Business But My Own," "Ain't Gonna Whistle Dixie No Mo'," and "Baby You're My Destiny." His voice was somewhat scratchy, sometimes nasal, but always strong and fun to listen to. He is not exceptional on the guitar, but he uses the instrument well as a dancing partner.

Perhaps the most appealing aspect of his band was its multi-faceted individuality. Each member was playing to his own thoughts, reaching his own peaks, and traveling to his own mecca. The sound was phenomenal: the climatic blending of strong musicians from varied ranges of the unconscious.

Taj had something for everybody. For dancers, he struck onto "Shake That Booty;" for lovers of Latin music he supplied "Queen Bee;" and for Peter, Paul and Mary fans (and a sweet good night) he played "Autumn To May." This last song was masterful, a dynamic and beautiful piece that left this writer lying amongst sand and seagulls with the sun setting somewhere over St. Croix. And while Burlington was ten degrees and snowing, Memorial Auditorium was shuttled off to Shangri-La, and remained there until the last wineskin was taken home.

The Last Chance Talent Contest

Burlington Counter-Culture Emerges At Last

By Vaune Davis

It was indeed the "last chance" for many of the performers in the 4th annual Last Chance Talent Contest last Thursday evening as the majority of the acts transcended the outer limits of absurdity.

By 9:30, the bar was almost full and the crowd busy quaffing large amounts of alcohol, perhaps to fortify themselves against the upcoming onslaught of deranged entertainment. There was an aura of desperation in the air as the emcee announced, "Any act will be accepted, no matter how bad." Meanwhile, the Last Chance staff was having their own talent contest as each tried to blow the "excursion horn," a not-so-euphonius instrument used to celebrate the arrival of a tip larger than ten cents, the loudest. My associate, a perceptive individual, suggested that this was but a slight indication of what was to come.

Nevertheless, it was evident that some serious entertainment might bechance the Chance. In one corner, a long-haired banjo picker with a lemon strapped to his forehead was tuning up. When sitting on the floor, various instrument cases could be seen scattered throughout the room, stashed between barstools and buried beneath tables: one could only guess what they might contain. And making his first theatrical appearance since his role as the astrologer in State of Siege was Dr. Harley Walter Kidder. During a pre-contest interview, Kidder showed considerable enthusiasm, saying "Because I am the final performer, the management has given me the privilege of extending the performance as long as I wish, so the show will not end too soon."

After the emcee had almost convinced us that he was kicking off the contest with a catchy number called "Testing – One, Two, Three," the first two performers crept up to the stage. Dave, a guitarist and Jill, a very talented singer, played a few tunes by Dan Fogleberg and Neil Young. Unfortunately, they were backed by a strong chorus of rowdy barroom banter and it is doubtful if Jill's pure, sweet voice was heard more than ten feet. It is interesting that the audience, after quieting not in the least for the performance, applauded Dave and Jill for about two minutes. My associate, an astute observer, suggested that this was an indication of just who the crowd really liked to listen to.

Following this act were Mike Casey and Leo. Together, the two managed to complete their entire perversion of "Rocky Raccoon" while making rude hand gestures at the audience, many of whom were audibly expressing their hostility. Nevertheless, the crowd eventually relented and clapped along with the selection, perhaps because it dragged on interminably, and gave these two musical assassins a boisterous round of applause for their effort.

A rumour of a wet t-shirt contest swept through the room, bringing with it a mixture of obscene enthusiasm and raucous anticipation. Although the event never materialized, the audience was not disappointed as they were treated to a show by (Straight from New York!) The Caucasian Version of the Supremes. The three Supremes, dressed in long, pastel gowns, danced dementedly in unison while singing exactly like their darker counterparts – with a little help from the jukebox. It was evident that the Supremes were well-received as hysterical shrieks of "Encore, encore!" reverberated through my brain.

An onerous task it was, performing after the Supremes, but Bunky, Mitch and Donna not only equaled them, but far surpassed this display of talent. With Bunky on the banjo, Mitch wailing away on an enormous harmonica, and Donna playing the spoons, the trio captivated the crowd with their rendition of "Get a Good Buzz On." Donna's talent as a percussionist was overwhelmingly apparent as a group of disdainful drinkers were transformed into a foot stompin' swarm by spoon-work alone. Donna later said, "My hands were so slippery I could hardly hold the spoons," but her rhythm was as true as any haughty virtuoso's. Her spoons, made out of solid silver, were given to her by her grandmother, who also instructed her in the art.

Bunky returned to give a solo performance. This feat, so daring and so difficult it was, is considered to be the pinnacle of his musical career. Claiming that he "never did it before," Bunky stood on his head and, at the same time, played the banjo for three minutes and twenty-three seconds. Little else can be said about this, as the achievement speaks for itself.

Back by popular demand were the Supremes (the caucasian version). Clad this time in black leotards with white shirt fronts, black stockings and black slippers, the Supremes furiously shook their booties with their gyrations at times resembling spastic convulsions. Following this final presentation, the Supremes were given a standing ovation, pelted with white carnations and propositioned profusely.

As each draft faded into the next, the evening slowly spaced by. A look of fear and loathing crossed the faces of all as Mike Casey once again sauntered on stage. The threat of physical violence seemed imminent, until, with a relieved cheer from the frenzied crowd, the microphone broke. Nevertheless, all was not well. Casey proceeded to sing "Old MacDonald" and, after the repairs were made, massacred "Helly Dolly." But by that time, the audience was immune.

The validity of the emcee' announcement "The only thing missing from our show tonight is talent, ladies and gentlemen," was further proven by Red and the Redstones. Swaying back and forth, beer mugs in hand, the Redstones made their debut with an original song "Wet Dreams." Possessing a rational disposition, my associate explained that even inebriation was no excuse.

Other notable performers included Chris Harmon, claiming to be Elvis Presley, who sang "Lord, Won't You Buy Me a Mercedes Benz," Terry Tyler on the hand organ and, last and certainly not least, Dr. Harley Walter Kidder. After singing his "Archapela," Kidder lived up to his promise and went into three encores, bringing screams of reverence from the raving mob.

Honorable mentions went to Terry Tyler, Chris Harmon and, of course, the Supremes (the caucasian version). Bunky, Mitch and Donna were awarded the third place prize, Last Chance T-shirts, and Dave and Jill came in second, winning two free records. There was no dispute over who should win the first place as Dr. Kidder took it hands down, winning a dinner for two at the Sirloin Saloon. Even Bunky expressed satisfaction with the judge's choice. "We didn't want first place anyway," he said, "we're all vegetarians." And Mike Casey did not care just as long as he could get up and sing "Hello Dolly" again.

Following the awards, Kidder recited a poem in place of an acceptance speech. "What is your philosophy on life?" he began. An obnoxious clatch in the back of the bar yelled, "Sin, sin, sin!" Nevertheless, Kidder continued, delineating an optimistic approach to life. "You have to be sure of yourself before you can ever win a prize," he said, "It's all in the state of mind."

Despite these few displays of talent, however, the contest was more a display of devoted insanity than anything else. A realist at heart, my associate suggested that the Last Chance Talent Show was but a mere foreshadowing of more hideous arrivals, looming on the horizon of the Burlington entertainment scene.

The New Wave

Returning To The Roots of Rock and Roll

"For he knew what that joyous crowd did not know, that the plague never dies or disappears, that it can remain for tens of years dormant, and that perhaps the day would come when, for the misfortune and the instruction of men, the plague would wake up its rats again and send them off to die in a happy city" Albert Camus
The Plague

"If you're not part of the solution, you're part of the problem."
Johnny Rotten

By David L. Kimmet

The foundations of popular commerical music are giving way. Music moguls and the masses are peering out from their lofty perches taking wary notice of the underground sub-cultural phenomenon called Punk Rock.

Spearheaded by the now nonexistent Sex Pistols, the media has preyed upon Punk Rock's outrageousness. Johnny Rotten is as controversial with his "I don't fuckin' care" attitude as Elvis Presley was with his pelvic shimmies. What the general media failed to pick up on was Rotten's extraordinary ability to articulate the anger and frustration of today's youth. Thus, John Rockwell of the N.Y. Times points out, "The irony was that he screamed (the song) with such passion and terror – with such caring – that you realized instantly that he cared a whole lot."

Moreover, the grossest misconception played up by the media is that every rock 'n roll band now arriving on the scene is a carbon-copied clone of the Sex Pistols. Every new band that appears is not a "punk" band.

Debbie Harry of Blondie, a major proponent of power pop

The Ivy Leagueish Talking Heads and the "droogish" Sex Pistols are about as far apart musically as two bands can get. What is needed then is a more definitive, more encompassing overview of contemporary rock 'n roll.

The New Wave marks a certain point in time and space where there is the urge to generate new life, new vitality, and new energy; and a daringness to rebel against the established order of things. It is a direct confrontation with the Hollywood sludge and the Disco dirge that is being passed off as music these days. "The New Wave represents those moments when a full spiral turn is completed – when the music stands over the same spot as it did when it began, but at a higher level than before," said Eric Van in The Harvard Independent. The New Wave not only stands directly over mid-fifties rock-a-billy and the British Invasion of the mid-sixties, but it reaches back and incorporates some of their basic elements. Criticism against New Wave for being a rehash of what we have heard many times before forgets that any form of expression becomes a fresh statement about an old problem. And the New Wave is the freshest statement we've had since the Beatles.

Recalling the early music of the Beatles, the Stones, the Kinks, the Who, and the most American of American bands, the Beach Boys, that trend of New Wave which has the greatest potential for mass appeal is "Power Pop." The pop song is classically upbeat, both in rhythm and melody, and lyrically optimistic with humor, satire, and adolescent sentiment. Support this with an awesome energy level of drums, bass, and guitar; and you've got Power Pop. Currently, the two most commercially successful American New Wave bands are the Ramones and Blondie; both are major proponents of Power Pop.

Both bands appeared in Montreal last year as opening acts for Johnny Rotten's godfather, Iggy Pop. I still stand by the statement I made in the Cynic a year ago. By way of her voice and stage theatrics "Blondie's yellow-haired Debbie Harry fashionably combines virgin innocence with femme fatale bitchiness." Her girlish feminity is the kind the older, more established ladies of rock 'n roll could only hope for. Meanwhile, the Ramones do nothing to distort the image of the Queens, New York youth. Clad in black leather jackets, jeans, and sneakers, their music is straightforward; fast, furious, and fun. Each song is a small expressive "joie de vivre."

People who feel that jazz is the only progressive music are not listening to New Wave. The thing that makes New Wave credible is its diversity. Patti Smith, New Wave's artist in residence, is close to being blacklisted by New York's radio stations. Her musical poetry represents a rebellious voice that has been missing since the 60's. The Talking Heads, highly acclaimed by critics, play intellectual and sophisticated rock 'n roll. As college graduates they bring their degrees to New Wave. Elvis Costello, a Buddy Holly look and sound-alike, is a product of media hype. Only

Feld Ballet Communicates Through Choreography

By Tricia John

"Whatever I have to communicate to people, it's through my choreography, not sitting here talking with you." Eliot Feld may not be an interviewer's dream-come-true, but what he said in an empty Memorial Auditorium last Wednesday afternoon seemed very true: if there is a message, the message is dance. Not words.

Eliot Feld has been choreographing for years; he started a dance company in 1969, ran out of money, began again in 1974, and is now hailed by Clive Barnes (New York Times dance critic) as one of the most talented young choreographers today. In his mid-30's now, Feld continues to dance a little himself and has choreographed over 20 ballets, with music ranging from Dowland to Prokofiev. His approach to dancing is unique, exciting, and appealing, but he is careful not to make sweeping statements about his place in the history of dance. When asked about what departures in style he has taken from Balanchine (choreographer of the New York City Ballet) or Robbins (of the American Ballet Theatre) he says "I honestly never think about it. I just do what I do – I have the need to make ballets. Other people apparently felt that what I do is significant enough to be supported. Like I've said, if I do have something to say, it's not sitting here commenting on my work."

What can he say about his choreography and about the creative process of choreographing ballet? "I want to engage my eye." Feld does not "manufacture" themes to his ballets and work around a pre-conceived idea. Rather, the ideas are developed as the dance is created. Many times it is not until after a piece is choreographed that Feld fully understands the direction of his creativity. "The work has a life of its own, and you cannot ask me 'what effect does this storm have?' because I am the storm. I can't say what my effect will be."

Choreographers have a unique creative problem: "his work only exists through its performance, and so every mistake is irrevocable." This is one reason why dance has recently generated so much popularity in America. Its immediacy and energy is only for the moment, not for the past not for the future. Plastic art is permanent, music is notated and recorded, even drama can be read and studied, but dance is dancing.

As with any creative process, choreographing a ballet is often grueling, sometimes non-productive. Many times no creative process can flow, and unlike sitting in front of a typewriter in your quiet living room, a choreographer will have 20 bored, sweaty bodies to contend with as he slowly works out the problems of the dance. "You need patience most of all, and must ask the others for their patience." Rapport with his dancers is sometimes negative and not constructive, but much of the time Feld and the dancers help each other to work out their physical and creative difficulties.

Feld's dancers are not spectacular Baryshnikovs or Kirklands, but are consistently smooth and versatile. In every movement there is clarity and sensitivity to the ballet as a whole. Feld choses dancers who not only dance beautifully but who can display "disciplined imagination" ("I don't want an imagination that runs rampant") in their work. Their performance in Memorial Auditorium evoked great understanding of the choreography and undying vitality and grace.

Although Feld may or may not be satisfied with a finished ballet, critics play no role in his estimation of his work. "I want people to like what I do, but no critic is going to tell me what to think about my own work. An artist who listens to critics is out of his mind. We're not running for office. A critic should write for the public, and not presume to help the artist through his criticism."

Not that bad reviews are much of a problem for Eliot Feld. From city to city Feld and his dancers get rave reviews, and response is just as enthusiastic from audiences that are continually growing more astute about dance, more interested. Dance companies have sprung up in many major cities in the past few years, not to mention the substantial increase of people taking ballet lessons. And of course, movies like The Turning Point have also made average Americans more aware of the fascinating world of dance. Now people throughout the country are understanding for the first time what Eliot Feld has been communicating to us for several struggling years: the message is dance.

Synthesizers and Jazz - A New Marriage?

By Tom Nuccio

Lenny White, *The Adventures of Astral Pirates

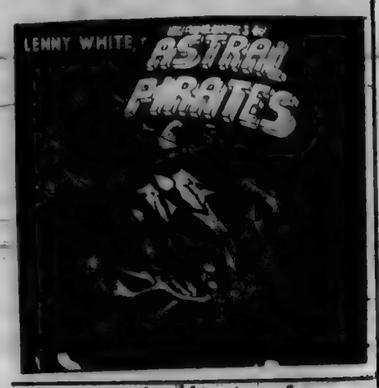
Many of my jazz reviews have expressed a hatred toward synthesizers. Their applications in progressive jazz usually result in the formation of musical waste products. Many things led me to believe that Lenny White's latest waxing, The Adventures of Astral Pirates, would be a poorly synthesized affair. I envisioned my ears wincing with pain upon hearing Don "Captain Keyboards" Blackman pounding out distorted electric fuzz. Drummer White would also corrupt my hearing via his spaced out use of synthesized percussion and keyboard. I was prepared to witness a totally depressing musical experience. However, while actually listening to the album, I found my prediction to be incorrect. Yes, I could hear the synthesizers but this was a rare and very special occasion — they were employed tastefully!



The new Lenny White group possesses no big name sidemen. Nevertheless, this album reveals a new fusion band, arising from the ranks of anonymity — destined to reach stardom. Revolving around the established percussive nucleus of Lenny White, they play crafty and extremely difficult licks with a brightly controlled electric sound. Each instrument is perfectly balanced thus preventing potential synthesizer drown-out.

Side A, titled Pursuit, consists of finely crafted fusion tunes, each containing a distinct melodic pattern. "Pursuit" begins with a sequence of rapidly difficult runs, shifts to a steady four beat rock tempo and ends with an oriental lick. Each of these cuts follows this pattern of varying between different progressions and rhythms. This factor creates exciting songs — tunes that explore new and surprising directions. The musicians capitalize accordingly and shine tremendously on these cuts. Guitarist Nick Moroch exhibits a truly amazing talent. His loud sound remains undistorted as he plays complicated lines with relative ease. Bassist Blake maintains a solid bottom line and guides the group through various directions by providing smooth transitions. Don Blackman fits in perfectly by adding a special fullness to the group's sound. Meanwhile, Lenny White contributes off-beat fills and tricky lead-ins. Other than that, he carries the mere role of "beat-keeper."

A heavily metallic "Stew, Cabbage and Galactic Beans" commences proceedings on Side B. This set of songs, in contrast to the previous one, predominantly consist of heavy handed four beat rock tunes. The synthesizer lines add tremendous color and substance to portions that might otherwise have been empty. These songs lack the complexity of their predecessors but still possess that characteristic electric brightness — the sound of success.

The musical arrangements and instrumentalists excel for the most part, but they lack a key element as a vital musical being is absent in most cases. This practically disregarded component is known as Lenny White. He solos only once on the entire album while his fellow "Astral Pirates" receive many more opportunities. He merely serves the function of a human metronome — pounding out a beat suitable for his friends to vamp on. White's percussive genius should not be overlooked. His talent is not wasted on this album — it just is not sufficiently and vividly shown.

Regardless of this serious oversight, The Adventures of Astral Pirates exposes to the world of jazz, a talented group of young guitarists and keyboardists who will certainly achieve future recognition. More importantly it teaches an important lesson — synthesizers, when effectively employed, can be compatible with progressive jazz. On many jazz albums, synthesizers detract from the overall effect. This album, however, reveals synthesizers actually adding color, brightness and melody to basically bland songs. This surprising fact puts opinions such as mine to a temporary rest and yields a tremendously exciting fusion album.

The Outlaws 'Kick Ass'

By Russell Flannery

The Outlaws, *Bring It Back Alive

Live albums generally tend to serve as commercial breaks for bands suffering from either a weakened inner core, or a decline in popularity. As opposed to featuring new material, such albums are usually "Greatest Hits" albums under another cover.

Artists of the latter 1970's have occasionally produced a memorable live feat: Frampton Comes Alive surely would have terminated the ex-Humble Pie guitarist's solo career had it been unsuccessful. Fortunately for Frampton, the double album sold millions of copies, and the artist rose from near obscurity to the heights of commercial success. Additionally, Love You Live, the Rolling Stones' 1977 offering, successfully followed the critically reviewed Black and Blue album. In both cases, the performances were exceptional, yet the overall absence of newer material was disturbing.

The Outlaws have indeed suffered internal realignment. The 1977 departure of original member Henry Paul prompted the addition of a second drummer (David Dix) and a new rhythm guitarist (Freddie Salem). In accordance with these changes in membership, the band's absence from the recording studio is now approaching two years. The new live album, Bring It Back Alive, is apparently an effort to keep the band commercially afloat until the 'chemistry' settles for a studio effort. Fortunately for the Outlaws, the new album captures the spirit of their performance, and should temporarily satisfy owners of their previous albums.

Bring It Back Alive, an album of previous releases and one new effort, actually exemplifies the growing maturity of the Outlaws. Musically, Hughie Thomasson, Billy Jones, and Harvey Arnold have jelled beyond the expectations of only two years ago. For example, the live versions of "Holiday" and "Hurry Sundown" are immeasurably more energetic than the originals. The vocals, never the focus of the Outlaws' style, have endured the passing of Paul, and compliment the prevalent number of 'rockers' on this album. For any Outlaws fan, the two final sides here are simply awesome.

"For any Outlaws fan, the two final sides here are simply awesome."

Despite their characteristically Southern style, the Outlaws have recently established a wide base of support through extensive touring. Should the band carry their stage enthusiasm into the studio later this year, the Eagles' national dominance may be challenged. Meanwhile, those interested will simply have to watch and wait.

"A Man's A Man"

A Cynical Success

By Alexandra Eschenbrenner

The City Company's production of Bertold Brecht's A Man's A Man was innovative, clever and in a disturbingly cynical manner, delightful.

The story itself on the surface is one of the complete transformation of one man into another. Galy Gay, played by Jeff Kent, is an indiscriminate docker who by the end of the play becomes a blood thirsty soldier named Juriah Jip. The transformation occurs as the result of various happenings proving always that "A man is a man" and is driven only by his desire for pleasure which is often lewd, grotesque and debase.

The characters in A Man's a Man seem at first brutish hedonists, but as always, Brecht makes us realize these characters on stage are really ourselves. This element, common in most of Brecht's works, was depicted particularly well in the City Company's staging of the work. In an effectively innovative style, the director Sam Pierson turned the entire auditorium into a stage and made the audience truly a part of the play. This proved in an embarrassing way that Brecht's sewage "common man" was not only those characters in the play.

Sketch by Mark LaRivière

Such staging and directing used the versatility of the live theater to its utmost and was conducive to the understanding of the play.

The transformation of Galy Gay to most seems pathetic and tragic as he sells his soul and his identity to become Juriah Jip. In addition, the lines used frequently: "One man is like another," "All men are the same," and "One man is no man" are not extremely comforting to those who believe in individualism. But to those who think along the same lines as Brecht, this is "jolly business." Galy Gay comes to no harm as a result of his desires to avoid pain and seek transformation and his basest pleasure are met.

The roles in A Man's a Man are demanding. The actors are singers and stagehands as well and perform frequently in a three-ring circus arrangement. The demands of the roles were met with ease as if each player was born into the part. The scene transitions were quite smooth; a necessity since they occurred before the audience.

Indeed, the play was excellent, and the performance, in addition to being highly enjoyable, was a philosophically educational experience.

The New Wave

time will tell if his rock 'n roll aim is really true. Of course I couldn't forget the ultimate punk nihilists, the Dead Boys. Punk Rock of this sort is just a small part under the umbrella of New Wave. There are many other wellknown New Wave bands, too many to mention.

There is even a greater number of New Wave bands who have yet to receive any critical attention, but their use of odd chord progressions and vocal arrangements and their unwillingness to abide to rock's unwritten rules gives these bands their inherent appeal.

The real beauty of New Wave is that it is happening, in many forms, on an intimate level of give and take between band and audience. In many of the major urban areas, the New Wave audiences have established their own favorite local bands. Such favortism arises from a love for great rock 'n roll. In this sense, it's anybody's ballgame. A band's popularity is totally dependent upon the appreciation of its audience.

Two weeks ago I ventured to Boston for a taste of New Wave rock 'n roll. In a small and dark Knights of Columbus Hall I found what I had always felt rock 'n roll should be. At the head of the hall was La Peste, a captivating three-piece band who play like their lives depend on it. They play purist rock 'n roll in the now contemporary Power Pop tradition. Remarkably there was no distance between La Peste and the wall of dancing bodies that surrounded them. Above all, I discovered in La Peste that rock 'n roll is meant, first and foremost, to be fun; and anyone who refutes this denies the very truth upon which rock 'n roll has evolved.

Burlington will have an excellent opportunity to hear first rate New Wave rock 'n roll when La Peste appears at Nector's-Upstairs tomorrow and Saturday night. Furor, a Boston Punk band, is scheduled to open the show for La Peste.

SCI-FI

By Jim Wright

A few weekends ago I was down in Boston attending the New England Science Fiction Association's annual convention (Boskone). This is one of the big events within the SF community where fans, authors and editors gather for three days to talk, sell things, have panel discussions and party. One of the panels I attended was on publishing and included authors, editors and book publishers. A question was asked as to what single factor influences a publisher's decision in buying a story or book from a new author. The answer given by everyone on that panel was the Hugo Awards.

There is a channel through which you can communicate your opinion to all of the book industry, in a way forceful enough to demand their attention. This channel is available to everyone of you, if you'll only get up off your hindquarters and use it. I'm not talking about letters to the publishers, or sending letter bombs through the mail or even forming vigilante groups to hang the hacks from the housetops. I'm talking about the above-mentioned Hugo Awards.

Once each year the entire SF community gets together over the Labor Day weekend for one big four day convention humbly termed the "World Science Fiction Convention" (like Boskone only about twice as big). People gather from all over the world to celebrate, sing, drink, and generally have a good time with friends, but they also hand out the Hugo Awards. These are annual awards voted on by the readers (the only literary awards so given), in several areas (ie, best short story, best novella, best professional artist and so forth), and are named after the father of modern SF – Hugo Gernsback. The big one is, of course, the Hugo given for best novel of the year.

But I hate to tell you the number of votes that were cast in last year's Hugo balloting. The awarding of the term "World's Best" was done by less than six hundred people. Think of it! The event which most publishers list as the single most important factor when they are looking at new young authors was decided on by less than 5% of the people who registered for the convention.

You do not have to attend a world "Con" to vote. Anyone can, anyone in the world. You don't have to be a certain age, or blood type, own land or be vaccinated. It will cost you $7.00, a few postage stamps and a little time.

You write to Iguanacon, 36th world science fiction convention, P.O. Box 1072, Phoenix, Az., 85001 and you slip them $7.00. The money is used for about a million things that, taken together, make a convention run, from paying the pros to sit around and BS to paying the poor sad suckers who are going to count your ballots. In return you get a slew of literature, a tin plated mars bar, the hearty thanks of a convention committee that came out in the black after all, and, most important, the right to cast your vote for the Hugo Awards. It is too late to get in on the nominating – I received my nominating ballot a few weeks ago, but it is not too late to vote – the final ballots should be sent out around the end of June.

I heard you. You, the cheapskate who just said, "Seven bucks? Jeez."

Well, don't hit me with that jive. I know that most of you out there spend more than that on books each month and then complain about the quality of them.

Phooey – spend one month's seven bucks on improving the overall quality of next year's SF. The return on your investment will be literally priceless.

Make your wishes known, people. For far too long the Hugos have been given out by too few hardcore devotees: tell the publishers what you want.

Lost Nation Theater In The Apse

A theatrical troupe may have any number of members, but rarely will it have only two. Kim Bent and Deborah Gwinn make up the Lost Nation Theater, which will perform in the Apse at Billings Center Friday and Saturday nights, March 17 and 18.

Bent integrates pantomine, interpretive dance, and song, characterizing the energy and turmoil of the 60's. Swinging from childishly fearful to playful, he recreates the sense of discovery and idealism which was so intense at the time. Ms. Gwinn displays her theatrical talents by first performing a high energy sketch in which she sings, craddling a baby in her arms in a portrayal of cuddling motherhood.

Both Gwinn and Bent are masters of song and dance. Each perfects an already fine performance with impeccable timing and rhythm. Their themes differ, but they share a high level of expertise and professionalism, which combine to make a fascinating evening of theater.

Both performances will begin at 8:00 p.m. and a question and answer period will follow each performance.

"McCepp and the Movies"

This department has been alerted to an offer put together by McCepp and the Merrill Theatre people that is simply too good to pass up. McCepp and Mr. Merrill sat down and thrashed out the details in a room filled with "Blue Hawaii" movie posters.

Every Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday night you can come into McCepp's for a special dinner of Teriyaki Steak, Baked Stuffed Haddock, Barbecued Chicken, or Baked Stuffed Pork Chops all with baked potato, rice pilaf, or French fries, ice cream and beverage for $6.95. After you've polished off the last bit of coffee, McCepp will give you a coupon which gets you into any of several movies playing at the Merrill Theatres in Burlington.

Now this means you can take a date to dinner and the movies for just under $15.00. Try that on a weekend bunkie! It's such a good offer that McCepp is now being considered for an Academy Award. Can't you see Jane Fonda presenting the Oscar to McCepp as "Humanitarian of the year?"

This is just the latest in a whole array of special offers which McCepp is putting together in appreciation of all you fine readers and friends. The place may be a touch unusual, but you've made it one of Burlington's favorite dinner spots.

Plagiarism: Committees Propose Review of Academic Honesty

By Scott Sartorius

A system to set up a single committee to review all questions of a student's academic honesty has been proposed by two university committees and the concept has been endorsed by Robert Arns, UVM vice president for academic affairs.

The two committees, the Administrative Committee on Undergraduate Affairs, and the Committee on Academic Honesty of the College of Arts and Sciences, have drafted separate proposals which would create a uniform procedure for handling cases of cheating and plagiarism, the two main components of academic honesty.

The current system, under which such cases are reviewed by the individual's particular college, has been shown to be inconsistent in both the handling of appeals and weighing penalties.

In a letter drafted by Arns to the University Academic Honesty Committee, he states, "Recent events have convinced me of the need for a University-wide academic honesty system in place of the current arrangement in which individual colleges and schools have local autonomy."

The letter continues, "We cannot defend a policy in which the same situation can lead to different procedures and different sanctions in two different colleges of the university." It is this university's honesty committee that will ultimately shape the proposal which will become the new honesty policy.

Under the proposal, dated March 2, presented by the Arts and Sciences honesty committee, a student who has been accused of plagiarism (the report focused on plagiarism), would be subject to the following procedure: first, the instructor would advise the student that a report was being filed against him, and the student would then be told that he should consult the Dean of Students for counseling. The instructor would then inform the assistant dean of that student's college of the infraction, at which point the assistant dean would then assume control of the case.

Second, if the assistant dean determines the action to be severe enough to warrant formal charges, a letter would be written to the student saying action is being taken and informing him of the right to a hearing. If the charges are not severe enough, no charges will be brought and the student is then given the option to withdraw from the course without penalty.

Third, if the student then admits guilt, the student's dean determines what penalty the student will receive. If the student wished to contest the charge, then a hearing (at which the Dean of Students presides) is set up.

Fourth, the hearing, which is a closed session, takes place. Those present at the hearing are the Dean of Students (or his representative), the assistant dean, the student, and a hearing panel consisting of three students and two faculty members. The student is allowed to have an advisor at the hearing and requested witnesses may also be present. The hearing panel then determines the guilt or innocence of the student by a majority vote.

Under the proposal, the penalty for plagiarism will usually result in the student being suspended for one year, unless the offense has been committed previously or if the offense is "especially serious," in which case the student will be dismissed. The report provides for lesser penalties if extenuating circumstances exist.

The proposal presented by the Administrative Committee on Undergraduate Affairs presents essentially the same sort of procedure as presented by the Arts and Sciences committee. In the opening pages of the Feb. 21 report, the proposal states: "It seems that (UVM) colleges approach violations of academic honesty with greatly different

> "It seems that (UVM) colleges approach violations of academic honesty with greatly different knowledge, perception, attitudes and competence. These inequalities tend to weaken an overall system, impede the students rights to due process, and lead to unequal penalties for similar offenses."

Campus Elections Rapidly Approaching

Elections for Student Association President and Vice-President will be held early next week, March 20 through the 22, simultaneously with IRA, VPIRG, and class elections.

Voters will be able to cast their ballots Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday nights from 5 to 7 p.m. at Simpson, Living/Learning Center and Harris/Millis dining halls. Voting at Waterman will be from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. while Billings Center and Bailey Library will hold voting from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. respectively.

There are five candidates for S.A. President: Jesse Gadson, Eric Kilburn, John Martin, Charlie Clark and Peter Reigelman. The two candidates for S.A. Vice-President are Henry Chamberlain and Missy Burke. Gadson and Chamberlain are running-mates, as are Clark and Burke.

John Allen and Steven Bushey are the only candidates for IRA president. IRA has both a first vice-president and a second vice-president with David Maurice, Lynn Morse and Monique LaFrance contending for the positions. Eileen Maloney and Sue Vessels are running unopposed for secretary and treasurer.

Six UVM students will be elected to VPIRG's board of trustees. The ten candidates running are: Krista Billings, Bill Gehr, Lewis Heyman, Beth Reiman, John Matarese, Lisa Shulock, Tom Storrow, Lori Stratton, Don Taylor and Cindy Wemple.

Candidates for next year's senior class officers are: president — Tony Dubuque and Greg Boardman; vice-president — Robby Koff and Karen Amet; and treasurer — Lisa Wittner. Next year's junior class has Jeff Beckerman, Mike Hoyt and David Maurice running for president; John McConville is running unopposed for vice-president, as is treasurer candidate Douglas Mohns. The class of 1981 has only one candidate running, Glenn Turner, a presidential candidate.

SA Candidate Debates Marred by Low Attendance, Apathy

By Robert J. Moore

The high degree of apathy surrounding the Student Association was clearly evidenced by the poor attendance at the candidate debates for SA president and vice-president, held last Tuesday night at Harris-Millis.

The debates were not only poorly attended by the general student population but by the SA senators as well.

According to one reliable source, the low attendance can be partially attributed to the fact that SA distributed only about 100 small signs to inform students of the debates.
